Morocco Promises Western Sahara Autonomy Plan Next Month. The AP (3/2, Thorne) reports a statement by a key Moroccan official that Rabat "will present an autonomy plan for Western Sahara to the United Nations next month in hopes of ending a three-decade conflict that has stranded 160,000 refugees in the Sahara." Khalihenna Ould Errachid, King Mohamed VI's "chief adviser" on the Western Sahara, said the "plan would give the disputed region a parliament, a chief of state, Cabinet ministries and a judiciary that would oversee day-to-day life." Rabat "says autonomy is the only way to end a conflict with the Polisario Front, an Algerian-backed independence movement" that "insists on holding a referendum on independence." The AP says the "stalled conflict has left refugees in bleak camps in the Algerian Sahara, poisoned relations between Morocco and Algeria, and inflicts heavy costs on Morocco, already struggling with widespread poverty and unemployment."

Former Official Lauds Moroccan Plan. In an op-ed in today's New York Times (3/3, A15, 1.16M), former Deputy Assistant Secretary of State and Ambassador Frederick Vreeland says the status quo "has envenomed relations among its neighbors and immiserated the Saharan population." Mohammed VI's proposal "is a rare instance, in the post-9/11 world, in which a little encouragement from the United States and other nations could pay large dividends, fostering not only a final resolution for the region's refugees but also creating a stable North African peace for the first time in decades — a peace that would serve as a bulwark against Islamic extremism." The US "must be forthright in its support for the Moroccan proposal. We would be aiding a modernizing, moderate Islamic country, and a strategic ally. More urgently and no less important, we would be helping the Western Sahara's people to regain their lost liberties and their right to peaceful existence."

Morocco Sentences Eight In Terror Attacks. The New York Times (3/3, A7, Smith, 1.16M) carries Moroccan state-run media reports that "a Moroccan court on Friday sentenced eight Islamists to prison terms of up to 15 years for plotting terrorist attacks in France, Italy and Morocco."

Tehran-Caracas Weekly Flights Highlight Alliance. A brief New York Times (3/3, A7, Romero, 1.16M) piece notes, "Iran is already Venezuela's closest ally outside Latin America, with ventures to produce oil and build cars and tractors together. Now, travelers between the countries can also take a weekly flight between Caracas and Tehran." The joint Conviasa-Iran Air flight "includes a stop in Damascus." The Times adds that Caracas "has tightened relations with Iran and expressed explicit support for its uranium enrichment program. … Venezuela is considering extending its economic cooperation agreements to the military sphere. It is discussing a venture with Iran to produce remotely piloted aircraft that could be used for surveillance along the border with Colombia."

Haitian Juvenile Justice System Reflects Nation's Poverty. A 1,600-word front-page Washington Post (3/3, Roig-Franzia, 690K) piece today examines the plight of imprisoned Haitian youth, which "reflects a country overwhelmed by the problems of its young -- more than 200,000 Haitian children have lost one or both parents to AIDS and 300,000 work as unpaid domestic servants in a system of bonded servitude, according to the U.N. Children's Fund."

Putin Ally Ratified To Lead Chechnya. An extensive AP (3/2, Sadulayev) piece notes the Chechen Parliament "approved a widely feared former security chief as president of the war-battered Russian republic in a nearly unanimous vote Friday, a day after President Vladimir Putin nominated him." Ramzan Kadyrov's "nomination won 56 votes in the 58-member, two-chamber legislature, with two ballots ruled invalid." The AP notes that "human rights groups allege that security forces under Kadyrov's control abduct and torture civilians suspected of ties to Chechnya's separatist rebels. Some observers suggest he was tied to last year's murder of Anna Politkovskaya, a journalist who had reported extensively on Chechnya's wars and sufferings." Kadyrov "is credited with a reconstruction boom that he administered as the region's prime minister, under which the capital, Grozny, is being transformed from a moonscape of rubble and shattered buildings in a region devastated by two separatist wars since the Soviet collapse." Kadyrov "has been at the heart of a Kremlin strategy to crush continued rebel resistance and establish order in the mostly Muslim region."

Under the headline, "Chechnya's Reins In Strongman's Hands," the Los Angeles Times (3/3, Holley, 850K) calls Kadyrov "a Kremlin-backed strongman who has spearheaded efforts to pacify war-battered Chechnya through a mix of repression and economic reconstruction." He "expressed his appreciation and loyalty to Putin in televised remarks Friday, declaring that 'there is support and understanding from the supreme commander in chief, and it only remains to serve him hand and foot.'" delivered another clear message about the kind of state Russia is becoming. He did so by nominating" Kadyrov, who "has done Mr. Putin a great service: Using his own militia -- gang might be a better term -- he has imposed order in the name of the Kremlin on most of the rebellious republic, allowing the Russian president to declare victory in the war he started more than seven years ago. The Chechen's reward is to be installed as official head of the republic's government, where he can be expected to promote a cult of personality, employ state resources for his personal aggrandizement and murder his opponents with impunity."

Ex-Ambassador Decries Congressional Resolution On Armenian Genocide. In an op-ed in today's Wall Street Journal (3/3, A8, 2.04M), Brookings Institution scholar and former US Ambassador Mark Parris says congressional passage of an Armenian genocide resolution "will be a train wreck with an important, longstanding American ally: Turkey." This year is "a particularly sensitive moment in Turkish politics," with key government institutions possibly "inclined to loosen the strict barriers set up by Ataturk between religion and state." In addition, 2007 "will highlight the country's pivotal geography and relevance to U.S. strategic goals," including Iraq, Iran and energy policy. Turkey "goes into this defining year with its anchors to the West drifting or under strain. … The responsible choice for Congress's current leadership is to join their predecessors in concluding that passage of an Armenian genocide resolution does not serve American interests."

Today's Events In Washington ... 29

TERRORISM NEWS:

Calls For Return Of Hicks Come From Across Australia's Political Spectrum. The New York Times (3/3, A6, Bonner, 1.16M) reports, "The decision by the United States military to charge an Australian citizen, David Hicks, with one terrorism-related offense comes as Prime Minister John Howard is under mounting pressure, even from conservatives in his own party, to have Mr. Hicks charged, tried and brought home. Mr. Hicks is the first detainee from the American base at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, to be charged under the Military Commissions Act of 2006. But the single charge, of providing 'material support for terrorism,' after Mr. Hicks has been held for five years in Guantánamo, has been met with skepticism, disbelief and some anger here, from conservatives and liberals alike."

4th Circuit Upholds Dismissal Of al-Masri Suit Against CIA. The Washington Post (3/3, B5, Markon) reports, "A federal appeals court yesterday upheld the dismissal of the case of a German citizen who says he was wrongfully imprisoned by the CIA." The Post continues, "Khaled al-Masri had sued former CIA director George J. Tenet and 10 unnamed CIA officials in U.S. District Court in Alexandria. Sources have said that Masri was held by the CIA for five months in Afghanistan because of mistaken identity." The Post adds, "U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III last year sided with the Justice Department, which invoked a state-secrets privilege to argue for dismissing the lawsuit. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit upheld Ellis's decision."

El-Masri Seeks Apology From US Government. In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (3/3, 850K) Khaled El-Masri, identified as a "a German citizen born in Lebanon," who "was a car salesman before he was detained in December 2003," writes, "On New Year's Eve in 2003, I was seized at the border of Serbia and Macedonia by Macedonian police who mistakenly believed that I was traveling on a false German passport. I was detained incommunicado for more than three weeks. Then I was handed over to the American Central Intelligence Agency and was stripped, severely beaten, shackled, dressed in a diaper, injected with drugs, chained to the floor of a plane and flown to Afghanistan, where I was imprisoned in a foul dungeon for more than four months. Long after the American government realized that I was an entirely innocent man, I was blindfolded, put back on a plane, flown to Europe and left on a hilltop in Albania — without any explanation or apology for the nightmare that I had endured. My story is well known. … Why, then, does the American government insist that my ordeal is a state secret?"

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush To Visit Tornado-Ravaged Alabama Today. The AP (3/3) reports President Bush "heads to Alabama today to visit areas damaged by this week's vicious storms and deadly tornadoes. Among his stops will be the high school where eight students were killed Thursday when a twister demolished their school." The AP (3/2) reported earlier that on Friday, the President "offered condolences to victims" of the storms, saying he "he had spoken to Alabama

Gov. Bob Riley on Thursday afternoon and Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue on Friday morning." Regarding his trip today, Bush said, "I go down with a heavy heart. I go down knowing full well that I'll be seeing people whose lives were turned upside down by the tornadoes. I'll do my very best to comfort them."

Reporting on the tornadoes dominated the broadcast network newscasts Friday night. ABC World News (3/2, Gibson, 8.78M) devoted its first eight minutes to the storms. The CBS Evening News (3/2, Couric, 7.66M) gave the story just under five minutes, and mentioned that "President Bush plans to visit this area tomorrow." NBC Nightly News (3/2, Savidge, 9.87M) gave the storms about four and one-half minutes, also reporting that "President Bush will tour the heavily-damaged region tomorrow."

New Orleans Seeks $77 Billion In Damages From Army Corps Of Engineers. The New York Times (3/3, A12, Eaton, 1.16M) reports the City of New Orleans "filed a $77 billion damage claim against the federal government on Thursday, joining thousands of residents who have flocked to the Army Corps of Engineers seeking compensation for their losses after Hurricane Katrina in 2005. The corps, which built and helped maintain much of the levee system that failed, has not tallied the number of claims or the total amount of money sought. It received 30,500 forms by late last month, a spokeswoman for the agency, Kathy Gibbs, said. … The claims were in part prompted by a ruling last month by a federal judge that raised the possibility that suits against the corps could proceed. Normally, federal law does not allow suits for damages resulting from the failures of flood-control projects. But on Feb. 2, Judge Stanwood R. Duval Jr. of Federal District Court in New Orleans ruled that at least one flooding source, the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet, might be considered a navigation channel and not a flood-control project."

The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Simmons, 850K) reports New Orleans officials "did not specify the damages to be covered, but in a statement, City Atty. Penya Moses-Fields said the claim was 'prudent at this stage to file.' Entergy New Orleans, the city's electrical utility that went bankrupt after Katrina, is seeking $655 million in damages and losses, and New Orleans Sewerage and Water is trying to recoup about $460 million. The corps has argued that the 1928 Flood Control Act gives it immunity from lawsuits."

WAR NEWS:

Bodies Of 14 Iraqi Policemen Found Following Abduction. The AP (3/2) reports, "The bodies of 14 policemen were found Friday northeast of Baghdad after an al-Qaeda-affiliated Sunni group said it abducted members of a government security force in retaliation for the rape of a Sunni woman by members of the Shiite-dominated police. ... Earlier Friday, the Islamic State of Iraq said in a Web statement that it seized 18 Interior Ministry employees in Diyala in retaliation for 'the crimes carried out ... against the Sunnis.'" However, an Interior Ministry spokesman "cast doubt on whether the 14 slain policemen were the same men shown on the website photos" posted by the group. The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Zavis, 850K) reports that the men were kidnapped even though they "had taken pains to travel inconspicuously, wearing civilian clothes and riding in sedans. ... It was unclear whether the officers were among the 18 blindfolded men pictured earlier on a website by a group calling itself the Islamic State in Iraq."

Sunni Insurgents "Ascendant" In Iraqi Bloodshed. The Washington Post (3/3, A11, Raghavan, 690K) reports, "More than two weeks into a new Baghdad security plan, Sunni insurgents are asserting responsibility for an increasing number of violent attacks against U.S. and Iraqi security forces and civilian targets, while Shiite militias are lowering their profile. In recent months, al-Qaeda in Iraq and other Sunni groups have begun to use more sophisticated tactics, downing U.S. helicopters and staging large attacks that have claimed the lives of hundreds of Iraqi civilians."

First Post In Sadr City Established By US, Iraqi Forces. AFP (3/2) reports that US forces "will gain their first foothold in Baghdad's Sadr City this week, a fortified joint security station from which to patrol the stronghold of radical Shiite cleric Moqtada Sadr, a senior US military official said Friday." Talks are still under way "with the mayor of Sadr City…and the US military will begin building the security station this week in the populous Shiite district in east Baghdad, said Brigadier General Joseph Anderson."

Anbar Sheik Battles Insurgents. The New York Times (3/3, A8, Wong, 1.16M) reports on Abdul Sattar Buzaigh al-Rishawi, the "public face of the Sunni Arab tribes in lawless Anbar Province who have turned against the Sunni jihadists of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, many of whom belong to other, sometimes more militant Iraqi tribes. ... There is talk that the sheik has received large amounts of money from the Iraqi government or the Americans. His face has been shown in anti-insurgent commercials on the government-run Iraqiya television network." But he "complains that he does not get nearly enough financial or military support." Anbar residents "say the split in the Sunni insurgency is widening, with moderate tribal leaders and nationalist guerrillas pitted against fundamentalist warriors and rival tribes. That has led to a sharp increase in Sunni-on-Sunni violence across Anbar, especially in the past week, deepening the chaos of Iraq's civil war."

More Women Moving Into Combat Roles. The Dallas Morning News (3/3, Kovach, 500K) reports, "More women than ever are close to combat or have actual combat roles, and the government and military leaders continue to struggle with the question of where and how to set limits." This is the "first war in which female U.S. troops have been authorized to shoot back. And they have -- as helicopter gunners, military police, and even truck drivers forced to defend themselves on a battlefield with no clear frontlines." Their service has aroused conflict between those who consider them "vital" and those "who believe the armed forces have already pushed them too far. ... More than 70 women service members have died in Iraq since the start of the war."

The CBS Evening News (3/2, story 6, 2:50, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Tonight, the sacrifices made by American servicemen and women. Two more American soldiers were killed by a roadside bomb outside Baghdad today. The US death toll in Iraq is now at least 3,166, and that includes 71 women."

US Military Doctors Saving Lives In Iraq. In a sympathetic report, NBC Nightly News (3/2, story 6, 3:15, Brown, 9.87M) profiled "the brave American medical teams that work so hard to save the lives of those wounded in Iraq." NBC (Bazell): "On the roof of the Baghdad combat hospital during a quiet evening, the medical team comes to unwind." Dr. Darrell Pugh: "We never saw anything like this when we were training in the United States. There have been a couple of times when I have had to step back and say, how am I going to deal with this?" Bazell: "We weren't allowed to photograph it, but every time an American service person killed in action is transported out of here on a helicopter, the entire hospital staff lines up to show its respect."

Khalilzad Lauds Oil Deal As Template For Reconciliation. In an op-ed in today's Washington Post (3/3, A15, 690K), US Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad says Iraq's oil agreement "points the way forward," will "enable oil wealth to "serve as a vehicle to unify Iraq," and "will give all Iraqis a shared stake in their country's future." He calls the deal "a significant achievement for Iraqis' national reconciliation" and "central to overcoming internal divisions in Iraq." The "effective and equitable management of these resources is critical to economic growth as well as to developing a greater sense of shared purpose among Iraqi communities." Khalilzad says the new law achieves its authors' goals and "is a great success," and concludes, "This is the first time since 2003 that all major Iraqi communities have come together on a defining piece of legislation. … The agreement on the oil law should give us confidence that Iraqis are willing and able to take the steps needed for Iraq's success."

Senior Taliban Leader Arrested In Pakistan. The Washington Post (3/3, A11, Witte, Khan, 690K) reports, "The arrest of a senior Taliban leader in a Pakistani city long reputed to be a haven for the group kindled guarded hope among Western and Afghan security officials Friday that the government here plans to move more aggressively against insurgents taking refuge on its territory." It "marks the first time since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks that authorities here have acknowledged apprehending or killing a senior Taliban commander on Pakistani soil." Obaidullah Akhund, "arrested hours after Vice President Cheney made a visit to Islamabad this week, is a former Taliban defense minister and is viewed in intelligence circles as one of the highest-ranking figures in the Islamic movement."

Roadside Bomb Injures Pakistani Judge. The New York Times (3/3, A7, 1.16M) reports in a three-sentence article, "A bomb rigged to a bicycle exploded near a car carrying a judge to his court in central Multan, seriously wounding him and killing his driver, a policeman and a third man. The judge, Mian Bashir Bhatti, often hears cases against suspected militants and terrorists."

NATO Still Short Of Troops In Afghanistan. The Washington Post/AP (3/3, Baldor) reports in a pessimistic article, "Signs of a new spring offensive by Taliban insurgents in Afghanistan have begun to emerge, but NATO commanders are still short more than 1,000 combat troops, despite repeated requests to allied nations, the top commander said Friday." US Gen. John Craddock said that his forces were "losing the counter-narcotics war, and more work and greater coordination is needed in the reconstruction effort." He added that NATO would never "prevail" as long as Pakistan failed to exercise "greater control of the border areas."

Scholar Says US Must Destabilize Iran To Defeat Terrorism. In an op-ed in today's Wall Street Journal (3/3, A9, 2.04M), the American Enterprise Institute's Michael Ledeen says it "is a good thing" that the Administration is "clearly paying much more attention to Iran than" it did previously. "To restrict our national debate to Iraq and Afghanistan alone is to accept the failure of strategic vision that has plagued us from the war's earliest days." He says it "isn't good enough" to "fight in one place at a time, secure that area, and then move on." Noting that America's "primary enemies are states, which provide the jihadis with much of the wherewithal for their operations," Ledeen calls Iran "by far the most important," with Syria and Saudi Arabia also supporting terrorism. Tehran remains "the keystone of the terrorist edifice," and "it doesn't require more boots on the ground or bombing raids. It requires a traditional American policy: support for democratic revolution against our tyrannical enemies." Ledeen concludes, "We are engaged in a global war, and while we have done well in many respects, we have thus far refused to recognize the real nature of the fight."

DOJ:

White House Approved Firings Of Seven US Attorneys. The Washington Post (3/3, Solomon, Eggen, 690K), in a front-page article titled, "White House Backed U.S. Attorney Firings, Officials Say, reports that the White House "approved the firings of seven U.S. attorneys late last year after senior Justice Department officials identified the prosecutors they believed were not doing enough to carry out President Bush's policies on immigration, firearms and other issues, White House and Justice Department officials said yesterday. The list of prosecutors was assembled last fall, based largely on complaints from members of Congress, law enforcement officials and career Justice Department lawyers, administration officials said." The Post notes that "one of the complaints came from Sen. Pete V. Domenici, who specifically raised concerns with the Justice Department last fall about the performance of then-U.S. Attorney David C. Iglesias of New Mexico. … Iglesias has alleged that two unnamed New Mexico lawmakers pressured him in October to speed up the indictments of Democrats before the elections." The Post adds that "officials acknowledged that the ousters were based primarily on the administration's unhappiness with the prosecutors' policy decisions and revealed the White House's role in the matter. 'At the end of the day, this was a decision to pick the prosecutors we felt would most effectively carry out the department's policies and priorities in the last two years,' said Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse. Officials portrayed the firings as part of a routine process, saying the White House did not play any role in identifying which U.S. attorneys should be removed or encourage the dismissals."

The AP (3/3) reports, "The former U.S. attorney for Nevada said he declined an invitation to testify voluntarily before a congressional panel investigating the removal of at least eight federal prosecutors around the nation. … But Daniel Bogden, who has said he was not given a reason for his removal this week, said he would appear if compelled by subpoena to appear before the House Judiciary Committee's subcommittee on commercial and administrative law." The AP continues, "Bogden did not immediately respond Friday to requests for comment. The 51-year-old prosecutor is one of several federal prosecutors removed in recent weeks by the Justice Department. His last day was Wednesday. No successor has been named. … On Thursday, Bogden told reporters that he remained unsure why he was removed." The AP adds, "Bogden told the Las Vegas Review-Journal that Michael Battle, director of the executive office for U.S. attorneys, did not provide a reason when he asked Bogden on Dec. 7 to step down from the post he had held since 2001. … Bogden said other Justice Department officials told him that the decision was reached at the highest levels of the department. … 'I was given an explanation that seemed to me to be political in nature, that had nothing to do with any issues with my performance or issues with the performance of my office,' Bogden said. … He noted that Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty on Feb. 6 told the Senate Judiciary Committee and the dismissals of federal prosecutors were performance-related."

The Albuquerque Tribune (3/3) reports, "A brief news conference called today by Rep. Heather Wilson on veterans affairs devolved into a grilling over questions about former U.S. Attorney David Iglesias." The Tribune continues, "Wilson, after meeting with officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs, spoke to about four or five reporters about treatment of veterans from Iraq and Afghanistan. … After a couple of questions on that issue, the reporters turned their questioning to Iglesias - specifically, whether Wilson called him in the weeks before the Nov. 7 election to inquire about a high-profile corruption case being investigated by his office. … 'I have said very little about that, and I won't make any additional comment at this time,' the Albuquerque Republican told reporters gathered at the Veterans Administration Hospital." The Tribune adds, "She referred to Iglesias' ouster as she has before, as a personnel issue within the Department of Justice. … When asked how an alleged phone call to a U.S. attorney could be construed as a personnel matter, she replied that she 'did not have any additional comment at this time.' … Wilson offered the same response to a number of other questions on the same topic. … She would not comment on a report published Thursday identifying her and Sen. Pete Domenici as having called Iglesias in October."

Gonzales Dismisses Emanuel's Outside Counsel Suggestion. In his syndicated column, Robert Novak (3/3) writes that Gonzales "has indicated he is too busy to answer letters from Democratic congressional leaders about" the firings "though a lower-level Justice Department official rejected their proposals." Rep. Rahm Emanuel "had written Gonzales two letters suggesting that he name Carol Lam, fired as U.S. attorney in San Diego, as an outside counsel to continue her pursuit of the Duke Cunningham case. … Richard A. Hertling, the acting Justice Department lobbyist, responded Wednesday, 22 days after Emanuel's letter. He contended 'the Justice Department would not ever seek the resignation of a U.S. attorney if doing so would jeopardize a public corruption case' and rejected naming Lam as a special prosecutor."

WPost Plays Down Controversy. The Washington Post (3/3, A14, 690K), in an editorial, writes, "The Justice Department's firing of a group of U.S. attorneys is neither as sinister as critics suggest nor as benign as the department would have you believe, at least on the basis of the evidence revealed so far. But it is, both sides agree, highly unusual and warrants further inquiry. … Pending further investigation, the episode seems to reflect an unusual reaction to the normal tension between Justice headquarters and the would-be autonomous U.S. attorneys, in this case involving disagreements over how much to focus on immigration cases or when to seek the death penalty. Prosecutorial independence is important, but the president is entitled to have prosecutors who reflect his law-enforcement priorities and to replace those who balk at complying."

NYTimes Calls For Appointment Of "Impartial Investigator." The New York Times (3/3, A14, 1.16M), in an editorial, suggests Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "should appoint an impartial investigator to get to the bottom of this unfolding scandal." According to the Times, the Bush administration "trampled on prosecutorial independence."

Gonzales Touts Anti-Terror Efforts In California. The Sacramento Bee (3/3, Korber) reports, "For U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, every day is Sept. 12. … 'My No. 1 priority is protecting our nation and our citizens from another attack,' Gonzales said in a talk Friday at McGeorge School of Law in Oak Park. 'That is what drives me.'" The Bee continues, "While dozens of raucous protesters demonstrated outside, the nation's top cop spoke to a quieter audience of dignitaries and students who attended the invitation-only lecture at the school. … Gonzales' half-hour talk, read rapidly from notes, was a passionate defense of the Bush administration's anti-terrorism strategy on several fronts: domestic surveillance, the detention of foreign terror suspects at Guantánamo Bay, and the importance of the USA Patriot Act." The Bee adds, "Gonzales, who was sworn in as attorney general two years ago, previously served as President Bush's White House counsel. He recalled being with the president on Sept. 11, 2001. … 'I carry the memory and pain of that day -- the brutal murder of fathers and mothers, sons and daughters,' he said. 'Our enemies are smart. They are adaptable. And they are very, very patient. We must anticipate what our enemy is going to do next.' … To that end, he said, the administration must have new tools and rethink some old rules. He quoted a British report that described parts of the Geneva Convention as out of date, and he spoke of clarifying and modernizing those international standards of wartime behavior. … 'This is a new threat that requires a new way of thinking,' he said." The Bee notes, "At the end of his talk, Gonzales was asked how he thought history would judge him. … 'I will let history write that story,' he said. 'I can't worry about my legacy. I can't spend the next two years fighting defensive battles. I have an obligation to take the majestic powers of the Department of Justice and do good for the American people.' … Protesters outside the lecture hall -- primarily law students and some of their professors -- accused Gonzales of ignoring the Constitution in his pursuit of terrorism. They raised issues that have dogged Gonzales since his nomination, including his approval of an administration memo that condoned harsh treatment of suspected terrorists."

CBS 13 Sacramento (3/3) reports, "Protestors made a run for it over to McGeorge School of Law today to speak their mind on the war on terror. The target of their anger-- U.S. Attorney General, Alberto Gonzales who was invited to speak at McGeorge." CBS continues, "With a glance and a wave, It didn't take long for the attorney general to figure out he wasn't exactly being welcomed by some in a group of McGeorge students. … These protestors --many of them law students from McGeorge cut to the chase as they told us, in dramatic fashion, why they were here. CBS adds, "Rights being violated, this group would argue, by the U.S. Attorney General's office: … As they carried signs targeting the man who hired Gonzales-- President Bush. … Protestors ripped the administration and the Attorney General on how they handle so called enemy combatants; the guys at Guantanamo. But that was not all. … The tactics for handling the media's coverage of the attorney general's speech was a bit puzzling today. At first, CBS13 was told we'd be allowed in. Then, they shut all media out."

KNBC-TV in Los Angeles (3/2, 5:05 pm PT) broadcast, "US Attorney General Gonzalez in Los Angeles today touring one of the city's most successful gang prevention and intervention centers. Gonzalez and LA Mayor Villaraigosa toured Homeboy Industries. It's a silk screening business that gives jobs to at-risk youth and former gang members."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ Probing New Century Financial's Stock Sales, Accounting. The New York Times (3/3, Bajaj, Creswell) reports, "Federal prosecutors and securities regulators are investigating stock sales and accounting errors at the New Century Financial Corporation, the biggest mortgage company that specializes in lending to people with weak, or subprime, credit, the company disclosed in a corporate filing yesterday. … The company also warned that a delay in filing its financials may put vital financing into jeopardy." The Times continues, "The troubles at New Century are the latest sign of the deterioration in subprime lending — until recently the fastest-growing segment of the mortgage business. The market has been struggling to contain the fallout from rising default rates and weakening home prices. Late last year, some smaller lenders started going out of business and last month several bigger companies, including New Century, started reporting problems. … Another large lender, the Fremont General Corporation, said yesterday that it planned to sell its subprime mortgage business after reaching an agreement with the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to restrict its activities in that area. As part of the agreement, Fremont will be able to continue taking deposits." The Times adds, "The investigations into New Century, which is based in Irvine, Calif., and wrote $33.9 billion in mortgages last year, started after the company said on Feb. 7 that it would restate earnings for three quarters, which sparked a huge sell-off in its shares. Yesterday, it said its problems had prevented it from filing its annual report, which was to be released Thursday. The board is conducting an investigation of the accounting problems. … The company's shares have fallen more than 53 percent since the start of the year — before the most recent announcement, which came after the stock market closed. Its shares were down $3.73, or 25 percent, to $10.92, in after-hours trading. … On Feb. 22, the company said the regulatory arm of the New York Stock Exchange contacted it about sales in the company's securities before that announcement. On Wednesday, it received notice from the United States attorney's office in Los Angeles that it was conducting a criminal investigation. Federal prosecutors are looking into trading in New Century securities and errors in how the company accounted for home loans that it was forced to buy back from Wall Street firms that buy its loans and package them into bonds. Also, the Securities and Exchange Commission has requested a meeting with its executives."

Ethics Complaint Limits Attorney's Role In Enron Case. The Houston Chronicle (3/3, Hays) reports, "One of the lawyers who represents Enron shareholders in a $40 billion lawsuit bound for trial next month in Houston has informed the judge he is facing an ethics complaint from the Washington, D.C., Bar Counsel." The Chronicle continues, "The lawyer, G. Paul Howes, told U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon in a letter Friday that he will address the matter at a hearing before a committee of the District of Columbia Board of Professional Responsibility on April 11, the week before jury selection is scheduled to begin in the Enron case. … He also said that because of the complaint, he will have a nonspeaking role in the Enron trial and will help the lead trial lawyer, Patrick Coughlin." The Chronicle adds, "The allegations include that in 1993-94, during Howes' 11 years as a federal prosecutor in Washington before he went into private practice in 1995, he made improper voucher payments to witnesses when prosecuting two murder cases. … The Justice Department investigated the allegations and did not file criminal charges against Howes. But the agency said in a 1998 report that he had improperly distributed witness vouchers. The Justice Department forwarded its findings to the D.C. Bar Counsel, which filed the complaint last month. … Howes said in the letter that he has 'always accepted responsibility for my conduct and that of the police officers who worked with me' on extensive investigations that began in 1988. He declined comment beyond the letter."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Jury Seek Clarification On "Reasonable Doubt" Standard. The Washington Post (3/3, A4, Goldstein, Leonnig, 690K) reports, "Jurors in the perjury trial of I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby asked the presiding judge for help yesterday defining a core issue in their deliberations: how to set a standard for determining whether the vice president's former chief of staff is guilty beyond a 'reasonable doubt.' At the end of its eighth day of deliberations, the foreman of the 11-member jury sent U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton a two-sentence note. 'We would like clarification of the term 'reasonable doubt," the note said. 'Specifically, is it necessary for the government to present evidence that it is not humanly possible for someone not to recall an event in order to find guilt beyond a reasonable doubt?' … According to jury and evidence experts, the question…signifies that at least one juror is concerned how strictly to define reasonable doubt."

The New York Times (3/3, A11, Lewis, 1.16M) reports, "The question suggested that at least some of the jurors are wrestling with the imprecise and often vexing definition of reasonable doubt, as well as how to decide whether a false statement should be attributed to faulty memory or willful deception, the issue at the center of the case."

Louisiana Leads Nation In Katrina Fraud Cases. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (3/3, Alpert) reports, "In her application for federal emergency help, Tina Marie Gilmore told officials how she watched hopelessly as her two daughters, ages 5 and 6, were swept through the rushing floodwaters after Hurricane Katrina and was so distraught several months later that she couldn't function -- couldn't drive a car or even be in the same room with children. … But after mailing her a check for $4,358, the Federal Emergency Management Agency learned that not only did the 34-year-old woman not live in New Orleans when Hurricane Katrina devastated the city, but she also didn't have any children. Even her last name was a fake. The government said it wasn't Gilmore, but Winston. … Last month, U.S. District Judge William Stiehl sentenced the Belleville, Ill., woman to four years in jail. 'She took advantage of the taxpayers of this country under very tragic circumstances,' Stiehl said." The

Times-Picayune adds, "Winston is one of about 600 people in 19 states and the District of Columbia who have been indicted for making fraudulent hurricane claims. Louisiana has the most cases, 140, followed by Mississippi, with 105, and California, 71. … One of the most prevalent schemes, according to the government, involved false claims for emergency $2,000 allocations from FEMA, money intended to pay emergency living expenses after Katrina forced hundreds of thousands of people from their homes. … But some of the scams were far more audacious. … U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said he isn't surprised that the Eastern District of Louisiana, which covers metropolitan New Orleans, is on the low end of fraud cases given that the devastation of the storm meant most of the area's residents suffered at least some damage during Katrina. … According to the Justice Department, the Eastern District had 18 cases, although Letten believes the actual number is in the 30s. Still, that's fewer cases than reported for the Eastern District of California, the Northern District of Alabama and middle district of Louisiana, which includes Baton Rouge."

Former DOD Official Pleads Guilty To Embezzlement. The Washington Times (3/3, Seper) reports, "A former Defense Department official yesterday pleaded guilty in federal court to charges of embezzling more than $100,000 in funds destined for use by government intelligence agents, Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said." The Times continues, "John Taylor, who worked at the department as an intelligence contingency-funds officer, admitted in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia that he stole the money while assigned to the 500th Military Intelligence Brigade as part of the U.S. Army Intelligence and Security Command at Camp Zama, Japan." The Times adds, "In his Defense Department role, Mrs. Fisher said, Taylor was responsible for budgeting, disbursing and accounting for intelligence contingency funds for the official duties of government intelligence agents. She said he also was required to manage classified bank accounts and supervise agents engaged in classified intelligence-gathering activity. … As part of a plea agreement in the case, she said, Taylor admitted that from 2003 through January 2006, he used his official position to steal at least $106,000 in department funds designated for intelligence-related activities. … She said Taylor embezzled the money by withdrawing cash from a government bank account whose funds were intended for intelligence agents. To conceal his acts, she said, Taylor falsified Defense Department accounting vouchers and forms."

DOJ Meets With Internet Providers About Monitoring Users. CNET News.com (3/3, McCullagh) reports, "The Bush administration has accelerated its Internet surveillance push by proposing that Web sites must keep records of who uploads photographs or videos in case police determine the content is illegal and choose to investigate, CNET News.com has learned." CNET continues, "That proposal surfaced Wednesday in a private meeting during which U.S. Department of Justice officials, including Assistant Attorney General Rachel Brand, tried to convince industry representatives such as AOL and Comcast that data retention would be valuable in investigating terrorism, child pornography and other crimes. The discussions were described to News.com by several people who attended the meeting." CNET adds, "A second purpose of the meeting in Washington, D.C., according to the sources, was to ask Internet service providers how much it would cost to record details on their subscribers for two years. At the very least, the companies would be required to keep logs for police of which customer is assigned a specific Internet address. … Only universities and libraries would be excluded, one participant said. 'There's a PR concern with including the libraries, so we're not going to include them,' the participant quoted the Justice Department as saying. 'We know we're going to get a pushback, so we're not going to do that.'" CNET notes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has been lobbying Congress for mandatory data retention, calling it a "national problem that requires federal legislation." Gonzales has convened earlier private meetings to pressure industry representatives. And last month, Republicans introduced a mandatory data retention bill in the U.S. House of Representatives that would let the attorney general dictate what must be stored and for how long. …. Supporters of the data retention proposal say it's necessary to help track criminals if police don't immediately discover illegal activity, such as child abuse. Industry representatives respond by saying major Internet providers have a strong track record of responding to subpoenas from law enforcement. … Wednesday's meeting represents the latest effort by the Bush administration to increase the ability of law enforcement and intelligence agencies to monitor Internet users. Since 2001, the administration has repeatedly pushed for more surveillance capabilities in the form of the Patriot Act and a follow-up proposal that--if it had been enacted--would have given the FBI online eavesdropping powers without a court order for up to 48 hours.""

Minnesota US Attorney Cracking Down On Child Porn. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (3/3, Browning) reports, "Bruce Betcher says he began searching the Web for sexually explicit photos of children in 2003, a predilection that led him to photograph two relatives -- both under 12 -- and three of their best friends in lascivious poses. … When he appears in federal court in Minneapolis on Tuesday, Betcher, a 53-year-old Burnsville property appraiser, could be sentenced to up to life in prison -- a longer term than if he had been convicted of first- or second-degree murder." The Tribune continues, "Extraordinary prison sentences for first-time offenders and a willingness of prosecutors to throw the book at them are evidence of an expanding crackdown by the federal government on anyone caught producing, possessing or distributing child pornography. Mandatory minimum sentences have been lengthened twice in the past three years, and a year ago the Department of Justice launched Project Safe Childhood, a no-holds-barred enforcement initiative that has made prosecution of child porn a top priority." The Tribune adds, "Rachel Paulose, the new U.S. attorney for Minnesota, helped draft that initiative and promised vigorous enforcement of existing laws. … A review of Minnesota cases brought by the government in the past year shows that it isn't prosecuting people who accidentally tripped across a photo or two. The cases thus far range from an international Internet consultant snared at the airport with child sex photos on his laptop to the father of three young girls who recorded himself raping and sodomizing them. … One man prosecuted in Minneapolis recently had more than 350,000 images of pornography, some of which included sexual penetration of toddlers. In another case, a Richfield man who worked as a pharmacy assistant sent child porn to an undercover agent and said he could drug young girls so they wouldn't remember being assaulted and photographed. … Though many of the cases were already underway when Paulose took office in February 2006, she's promising to bring more. Several recent search warrants indicate that she means it. … 'You will, over time, see an increase,' Paulose said." The Tribune notes, "Betcher's lawyer, Thomas Shiah, and other defense attorneys worry the federal sentencing guidelines are too harsh, particularly for first-time offenders like Betcher. … But in Betcher's case, Assistant U.S. Attorney Erica MacDonald urged the judge to follow the sentencing recommendation of life in prison. 'The lives of five little girls and their families were irreparably damaged by this man and his deviant behavior,' she said in a memo filed Friday. … Paulose, too, is unsympathetic to any pleas for mercy. … 'To be blunt, no sentence would ever be long enough for a person who takes the innocence of a child,' she said."

Director Spielberg Contacts FBI About Stolen Painting In His Collection. The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Krikorian, Khalil) reports, "A Norman Rockwell painting stolen from a Missouri gallery 34 years ago was recovered and authenticated Friday in the collection of movie mogul Steven Spielberg." The Times continues, "Spielberg's spokesman, Marvin Levy, said the director's staff contacted the FBI several weeks ago after seeing a bulletin from the agency's Art Crime Team seeking clues about the theft of the 'Russian Schoolroom' oil painting. … 'The second anybody said, "I think we have that painting," [our] office got a hold of the FBI,' Levy said." The Times adds, "Special Agent Chris Calarco of the FBI's Art Crime Team and Jessica Todd Smith, curator of American art for the Huntington Library, inspected the painting Friday afternoon at Spielberg's offices on the Universal Studios lot. The filmmaker was not present. … Calarco declined to speculate on the painting's value, but two sources close to the investigation said it is worth between $700,000 and $1 million. … The painting, depicting schoolchildren in a classroom looking at a bust of Soviet leader Vladimir Lenin, was stolen during an exhibit at a small art gallery in Clayton, Mo., in June 1973. … According to the FBI, its whereabouts were unknown until 1988, when it was sold at an auction in New Orleans for about $70,000."

O'Malley Considering Compromise On Death Penalty Repeal. The Washington Post (3/3, B2, Wagner, 690K) reports Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, "who testified last month in favor of repealing Maryland's death penalty, has started exploring a compromise with lawmakers that would limit the possibility of execution to just a few types of offenders, such as inmates who kill prison guards. Aides to O'Malley (D) say that such a deal might be the best hope for passing legislation that would tighten the scope of the state's death penalty. But that could put the governor at odds with advocates of a repeal, who say that the strategy could backfire and result in a bill that differs little from current law."

LATimes Says Police Are Curtailing High-Speed Chases. The Los Angeles Times (3/3, 850K) editorializes that "if you worry…about the dangers of high-speed police chases, don't expect the U.S. Supreme Court to impose new limits on the practice. This week, several justices reacted skeptically to the claim of a Georgia man that he should be allowed to sue a deputy sheriff because he was paralyzed after a police car rammed his vehicle. Fortunately, in Los Angeles and elsewhere, police forces are acting on their own to limit the dangers such chases pose to police, suspects and the public."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Drops Involvement In Virginia Church Zoning Dispute. The Roanoke Times (3/3, Ribeiro) reports, "The Justice Department has dropped an inquiry into whether Bedford County violated a church's rights by limiting their ability to worship in a Moneta barn." The Times continues, "The Rev. Ray Bell of the Cowboy Church of Virginia made the announcement at a news conference Thursday. In a phone interview, he said he's 'puzzled, but not upset' about the agency's decision. … Controversy surrounded the Cowboy Church for months. Services temporarily ceased at the Moneta barn last spring when Bedford County cited violations to a zoning and safety ordinance." The Times adds, "Services resumed last summer after advocates flooded county officials with phone calls. The Constitution guarantees people the right to worship and assemble, supporters have argued -- and that includes followers of the cowboy culture who hold their weekday services on a farm. … A Feb. 16 letter to Bell from the Justice Department states: 'We carefully reviewed the information that you have provided and determined that no further action by the Department is warranted.' … Bell had provided information on the issue to the Justice Department, but only after the agency asked for it, he said. He did not personally request an investigation, Bell said."

The Richmond Times-Dispatch (3/3, Faulconer) reports, "Six months ago, the department began investigating whether the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act was violated. Bell has opposed the county's requirement that a special-use permit be obtained to hold religious services, claiming it violates the separation of church and state."

Seale Attorneys Argue Judge Has Conflict Of Interest. The Jackson Clarion-Ledger (3/3, Mitchell) reports, "U.S. District Judge Henry Wingate and U.S. Magistrate Judge Linda Anderson should step down from the case involving the 1964 slayings of two black teenagers, the attorney for reputed Klansman James Seale said Friday." The Clarion-Ledger continues, "Wingate and Anderson happen to be the only African-American judges in the Southern District of Mississippi, but Federal Public Defender Dennis Joiner made no mention of that fact. Instead, he argued the judges have a prior association with the U.S. attorney's office and the case had been assigned to another judge and magistrate judge initially. … In January, Seale pleaded innocent to the federal kidnapping and conspiracy charges in connection with the May 2, 1964, abduction of Henry Hezekiah Dee and Charles Eddie Moore, reportedly by Klansmen. The teenagers were hitchhiking in Meadville when they were grabbed and beaten before being drowned in the Mississippi River, according to FBI reports." The Clarion-Ledger adds, "Seale, now 71, faces an April 2 trial. If convicted, he could receive life in prison. … Joiner accused U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton of manipulating the system to have these judges hear the case. … 'The U.S. Attorney has had the sole ability to select which specific district court judge he wants to sit on any criminal case in the Jackson Division,' Joiner wrote. 'He does this by asking the grand jury to return an indictment during a month assigned to a particular judge.' … Joiner pointed out Wingate and Anderson both have served at the U.S. attorney's office - Anderson during the time the case was reinvestigated. Wingate was appointed to the bench in 1985. … It will be up to Wingate to rule on the matter."

Rights Group Pleased With Georgia Cold-Case Probe. The Savannah Morning News (3/3) reports, "A civil rights group that has pushed for years to reopen state and federal investigations into the decades-old lynching at Moore's Ford Bridge near Monroe said Friday they are pleased that the U.S. Department of Justice has decided to take another look at the case. … 'You just feel like the rule of law is going to prevail,' said state Rep. Tyrone Brooks, D-Atlanta, who is president of the Georgia Association of Black Elected Officials." The News continues, "The group has pushed since at least 1998 for new investigations into killings of two black couples - Mae and George Dorsey along with Dorothy and Roger Malcom - in the summer of 1946. … Brooks said his group has been aware for more than a year that the FBI was probing the Moore's Ford case again but kept the information quiet to avoid interfering with the probe. … But during a press conference Tuesday, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller announced that the Justice Department was reopening the investigations of some Civil Rights Era killings, including the Moore's Ford case. The Georgia Bureau of Investigation reopened its investigation several years ago on the orders of then-Gov. Roy Barnes." The News notes, "Brooks said local activists have kept up with at least five living suspects who were identified in the original FBI report following the 1946 killings. Brooks' group and local organizations also have been talking to witnesses. … 'We're going to be making an appeal to the suspects to turn themselves in and avoid a long ordeal,' Brooks said."

Judge Halts New York Election. The New York Times (3/3, Whitaker) reports from White Plains, NY, "A federal judge on Friday stopped March elections for two seats on the Port Chester Board of Trustees, finding there was sufficient evidence to make the case that the village's at-large system for voting discriminates against Hispanic residents." The Times continues, "In a 32-page ruling read from the bench, Judge Stephen C. Robinson of Federal District Court found merit in virtually every argument made by Justice Department lawyers seeking an injunction to stop the March 20 elections. The village, however, may still hold a mayoral election scheduled for the same day, the judge ruled. … 'I think what we heard in court says everything,' said Cesar Ruiz, a Hispanic man who filed a complaint with the Justice Department after an unsuccessful bid for village trustee in 2001. 'I'm very pleased.'" The Times notes, "The village trustees scheduled an executive session for Saturday morning to discuss the case and decide whether to continue its fight against breaking the village into six voting districts, one of which would be predominantly Hispanic, to replace its at-large system. …. Anthony G. Piscionere, who is representing the village in the case, said he believed that the village still had a chance of winning, particularly if the case went to appeal. A trial date has been set for April 16 through April 20. … The lawsuit, filed by the Justice Department in December, charges that the at-large system — meaning that all residents of the village vote for all candidates on the ballot — is unfairly weighted against Hispanic residents, a violation of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. According to the lawsuit, the system allows for white bloc voting, which inhibits Hispanic voters' ability to elect their preferred candidate."

The New York Journal News (3/3, Sadler) reports, "In an oral decision, U.S. District Judge Stephen Robinson cited evidence of racial polarization in Port Chester's at-large election system. He said that if the case goes to trial, the U. S. Justice Department was likely to succeed in its claim that the current election system dilutes the Hispanic vote in violation of the federal Voting Rights Act. … 'It is clear to this court that Hispanic voters in Port Chester prefer different candidates, and that non-Hispanic voters generally vote as a bloc to defeat the Hispanic-preferred candidate,' Robinson said, capping a two-week hearing on whether the current election system discriminates against Hispanics. It is the first time a judge has stopped an election in Westchester County." The News adds, "Village officials expressed disappointment, but most declined to comment on whether they wanted to continue to fight the lawsuit. The board will meet with its lawyers today to discuss the next steps. It may choose to settle with the Justice Department and adopt voting districts or go to trial. The village also can appeal the injunction to the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. … It has already spent some $472,000 on lawyer fees and other legal expenses, draining what was a $2.5 million fund balance and raising some questions about whether to proceed. … U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said in a statement: 'In bringing this suit, the Justice Department sought to vindicate the voting rights of minority citizens in the village of Port Chester. I am pleased that Judge Robinson ... found that the United States is likely to succeed on the merits of its claim that the village of Port Chester's system for electing its Board of Trustees violates Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act.'"

Cochran Law Firm Accused Of Racial Bias. The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Garrison) reports, "For decades, the law firm founded by the late Johnnie L. Cochran Jr. has been renowned as a black-run institution fighting for civil rights and against police abuse — not to mention getting O.J. Simpson acquitted of murder charges. … But now, in a development that has dismayed some in Los Angeles' African American community, attorney Shawn Chapman Holley has sued the firm, claiming, among other things, that its leaders discriminated against her because she is black." The Times continues, "Holley said that after Cochran's death in 2005, leadership of the firm was turned over to white men who began to discriminate against black lawyers and black clients. … Neither she nor her attorneys would comment on the suit, although she released a statement through her lawyer: … 'In deference to the memory of Johnnie Cochran and in deference to his family, I do not intend to engage in a public airing of our disagreements. The lawsuit speaks for itself, and this matter will be litigated in the courts.'" The Times adds, "Randy H. McMurray, a partner in the firm, denied Holley's charges. … 'We probably have the most diverse law firm in California. I don't know what race we would be discriminating against,' he said, noting that he and another partner in the L.A. office, Brian Dunn, are black. … News of the suit raised eyebrows among some members of the city's black establishment. … 'Racial discrimination at the Cochran firm?' asked public affairs consultant Kerman Maddox. 'When you think Johnnie Cochran, you think best and brightest in the black community. … I'm shocked. If true, that would be a devastating blow to the legacy of Johnnie Cochran.' … Cochran, the great-grandson of slaves, founded his firm in 1965. He was best known nationally for his successful defense of Simpson against charges that he murdered his ex-wife, Nicole Brown Simpson, and her friend Ronald Lyle Goldman. … But for decades before those 1994 killings, Cochran was well-known in Los Angeles for a string of cases in which he won historic financial settlements and helped bring about lasting changes in police procedure."

SEC Probing TXU Trading Ahead Of Deal. The Wall Street Journal (3/3, A3, Berman) reports, "On Feb. 23, rumors began circulating in Washington that Texas utility giant TXU Corp. was close to striking an agreement with environmentalists opposing the company's plans to build new power plants. The company's shares surged 4% that day, as did trading in its options. … There was a deal, in fact. It was to sell the entire company. And, according to a Securities and Exchange Commission complaint filed late Friday, someone apparently already had begun trading illegally on the information." The Journal continues, "The SEC issued a temporary restraining order on certain unknown accounts Friday, for trading in call options that first began on Feb. 21, two days before word leaked that the utility was to be sold to private-equity firms. These unknown traders -- the SEC plans to identify them in further litigation -- scored $5.4 million in profits, the agency alleges. … Such activity has been at the center of suspicious market moves around a number of recent mergers and acquisitions. The total dollar value of these moves, however, far exceeds the figures involved in this case, which was brought in a U.S. District Court for Northern Illinois." The Journal adds, "In the days leading up to the deal, TXU's buyers were in discussions with a number of outside parties. Their hope was to convince both environmental groups and Texas lawmakers about the merits of its offer. … Such discussions are usually governed by strict confidentiality agreements, which is supposed to guarantee negotiations go on in secret. These agreements are supposed to protect sellers from leaks that might affect its stock price."

The Financial Times (3/3, Grant, Kirchgaessner) reports, "US federal regulators on Friday secured a court order freezing more than $5m in assets belonging to unknown traders who bought TXU call options a few days before the $45bn sale of the US utility to private equity groups." The Times continues, "The Securities and Exchange Commission said the buyers of the options 'engaged in illegal insider trading'. The SEC said the "highly profitable and suspicious purchases" were made through overseas accounts late last month ahead of the deal announced on February 26. … In a sign of the global scope of the case, the SEC was helped by the UK's Financial Services Authority and Swiss counterparts. It comes in the same week that current and former employees of three top Wall Street banks were charged by federal prosecutors with insider trading." The Times notes, "Regulators uncovered the use of overseas accounts to trade options at the Chicago Board Options Exchange in advance of the announcement of TXU's purchase by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, Texas Pacific Group and Goldman Sachs. … The SEC said unknown traders made purchases of call-option contracts three times last week through accounts at Credit Suisse in Zurich, broker Fimat in Frankfurt and UBS in London."

The New York Times (3/3, Dash) reports, "Federal investigators hope to track down the traders by untangling a web of transactions that passed through offshore accounts of several large banks and brokerage firms. … In papers filed yesterday in Federal District Court in Chicago, the S.E.C. froze more than $5.3 million that may be held in the domestic accounts of UBS Securities, Credit Suisse and Fimat Banque Frankfurt. It hopes to recover any gains linked to insider trading. Without the identities of any suspects, the commission said that it would need help from its counterparts overseas." The Times notes, "Yesterday's action comes as securities regulators have been signaling their intent to crack down on insider trading. On Thursday, the S.E.C. and the Justice Department accused more than a dozen people and hedge funds of making more than $15 million from an insider trading ring. … It is unclear whether the Justice Department is pursuing its own insider trading case related to TXU. A spokeswoman for the United States attorney's office in Dallas, Kathy Colvin, declined to comment about whether it is investigating. … But federal securities regulators said they were trying to track down the traders who placed big bets before reports of the TXU deal. Activity in the options market surrounding the stock was unusually high days before the takeover; TXU's shares jumped more than 13 percent the day the deal was announced."

Green Groups Feud Over TXU Buyout Terms. The Wall Street Journal (3/3, A1, Smith, Carlton) reports, "Just days after two of the nation's leading environmental groups blessed an investor plan to buy TXU Corp. and take the controversial Texas utility in a new and 'greener' direction, a battle has broken out in the environmental community over the terms of the deal." The Journal continues, "The Natural Resources Defense Council and Environmental Defense claimed victory Monday when a holding company formed by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co., Texas Pacific Group and other investors announced the biggest buyout in history, a plan to take over TXU for $32 billion plus the assumption of around $12 billion in debt. The environmental groups, two of the most powerful and best-funded in the U.S., said they had extracted a pledge from the investors to cancel a slew of coal-fired power plants, cut emissions and back federal global-warming legislation. … But now, opponents of the deal, in a blizzard of emails and Internet posts, have put the two organizations on the defensive by accusing them of settling for too little. The critics, who encompass a broad range of smaller environmental groups and individuals, say TXU should have been forced to give up all, not just some, of its future plans involving coal-fired power plants. The plants release substantial amounts of carbon dioxide, a heat-trapping gas blamed in part for climate change." The Journal adds, "Even worse, some believe that the environmental interests were snookered. Since the buyout was announced, it has become apparent that some of the concessions involve projects that TXU was already planning to shelve for a variety of reasons. And TXU has fueled the skepticism further in recent days by outlining new loopholes in the pledge. … NRDC and Environmental Defense 'should be hung for what they've done,' fumed Tim Hermach, executive director of the Native Forest Council, a group in Eugene, Ore., whose main mission is protecting public forests from commercial logging and other industrial practices."

EMI Board Dismisses Warner $4.1 Billion Offer.

The New York Times (3/3, Leeds) reports, "The EMI Group of Britain, which releases music by the Beatles and Bob Seger, rejected a $4.1 billion takeover proposal yesterday from the Warner Music Group, signaling the latest turn in a long merger dance." The Times continues, "EMI said its board decided against Warner Music's cash offer, which was subject to "numerous assumptions and conditions," because it was not in the best interests of shareholders and placed too low a value on the company. … EMI, which has issued two profit warnings this year and is undertaking a broad restructuring, also said the offer carried regulatory uncertainty and 'unacceptable operational risk at a critical time' for the company, which has been grappling with weak CD sales and sluggish industrywide sales of digital music. … EMI also said the bid of 260 pence a share, or $5.07, represented an 'inadequate' offer considering the risks and the potential cost savings of a merger. The offer reflects a 17 percent premium over EMI's share price at the time it last announced it had been approached by Warner Music."

The Financial Times (3/3, Terazono, Van Duyn) reports, "The latest twist in the protracted merger talks comes as the European Commission this week launched an in-depth investigation into the merger of Sony and Bertelsmann's recorded music businesses." The Times adds, "Warner submitted its proposals on Thursday evening. EMI's board met on Friday and quickly moved to reject the offer. It said Warner's proposals – which would depend on regulatory clearance – were 'subject to numerous assumptions and conditions', adding that 260p a share was inadequate. … EMI and Warner have been trying to create a combined group since 2000. After several failed attempts, talks revived last year, but were in effect put on ice when a European court ruled that the European Commission had made 'manifest errors' in approving the Sony-BMG deal in 2004, and ordered a new probe on competition grounds. A final decision is expected by July 2."

Bloomberg (3/3, Smith, Jeffrey) reports, "The rejection extends the maneuvering between two companies struggling with declining music sales and piracy. EMI and Warner abandoned $4.6 billion offers for each other in July on concern a combination would be blocked by European Union regulators." Bloomberg continues, "The combined company would have a quarter of the global market, moving ahead of Sony BMG Music Entertainment to rank second worldwide behind Vivendi SA's Universal Music Group. … EMI's rejection follows yesterday's decision by European Union regulators to begin a new investigation of the merger that created Sony BMG Music. A European court's rejection of that combination led EMI and Warner to abandon their bids last year."

Ashcroft Letter To DOJ Criticizes Sirius-XM Deal. Market Watch (3/3, Boles) reports, "Former Attorney General John Ashcroft, hired by opponents of the deal, has blasted the proposed merger of Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. , saying their merger would leave only one provider in the market." Market Watch continues, "Ashcroft, who served as head of the Justice Department for four years until January 2005, was hired by the National Association of Broadcasters to examine the merger scenario. … The NAB, which represents traditional radio broadcasters, has been a fierce critic of the $13 billion merger since it was announced last week." Market Watch adds, "In a letter sent on February 27 to his replacement as attorney general, Alberto Gonzales, Ashcroft concludes '...the proposed Sirius/XM merger, which reduces the number of competitors from two to one, raises most serious competition concerns.' … Ashcroft compared the current merger to the attempted takeover by satellite provider Echostar Communications Corp. of Hughes Electronic Corp. In that instance, he said, a merger would have reduced the competitors in the satellite television market in many areas from three to two. … 'The Department recognized that reducing competition from three to two was anticompetitive and opposed the transaction, which was eventually abandoned,' he said. … He also draws comparisons with the attempted tie-up between Echostar and DirectTV Group Inc. , in which the FCC reaffirmed its rule of not granting a single commercial license for satellite TV. That deal also wasn't allowed. … 'I would submit that a thorough study of consumer demands and preferences would show that terrestrial radio stations should not be considered part of the satellite radio market for the purposes of the review of the current merger...,' said the letter."

Ashcroft Shopped Services To XM Before Signing With NAB. Dow Jones Newswire (3/3) reports, "Former Attorney General John Ashcroft, who sent a letter this week to his successor Alberto Gonzales blasting the proposed merger of Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. (SIRI) and XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc., approached XM in the days after the merger was announced offering the firm's consulting services, a spokesman for XM said Saturday. … The spokesman said XM declined Ashcroft's offer to work as a lobbyist for the company." Dow Jones continues, "Ashcroft was subsequently hired by the National Association of Broadcasters, which is fiercely opposed to the merger. On its behalf he conducted a review of the effects on competition if the two satellite radio companies were allowed to merge. … In a letter sent to Gonzales Feb. 27, Ashcroft concluded the merger would have a significant negative impact on competition in the market and urged the current Attorney General to withhold approval for the merger. … 'After the merger was announced, Mr. Ashcroft's firm contacted us about hiring him to assist us,' said Nathaniel Brown, a spokesman for XM. 'We declined. Apparently the National Association of Broadcasters opted to pay him to parrot their views.' … Dennis Wharton, the NAB's executive director, said Saturday, 'NAB approached former Attorney General Ashcroft to review the proposed XM-Sirius merger and offer his honest opinion as an antitrust expert. We are not aware of any alleged previous discussions between Mr. Ashcroft and officials at either satellite radio company.'" Dow Jones notes, "A revelation that Ashcroft was shopping his services to both sides of the debate over the merger may raise doubts in the eyes of some as to the rigor of his review conducted on behalf of the NAB. … The letter was forwarded by the NAB to lawmakers on the House and Senate Judiciary Committees."

US, EU Near Open Skies Agreement. The AP (3/3, White) reports, "EU and U.S. negotiators made 'decisive progress' in talks to lift restrictions on what trans-Atlantic routes airlines can offer, the European Union said Friday, a move that could mean lower prices for air travelers. … The pact will allow European airlines to fly from anywhere in the EU to any point in the U.S. without strict rules that dictate ticket prices." The AP continues, "The EU said this would bring economic benefits of up to euro12 billion (US$15.8 billion) in five years and create as many as 80,000 jobs in Europe and the United States. … Air travel in Europe and the United States accounts for 60 percent of global air traffic, and an ambitious EU-U.S. open skies deal could allow more airlines to fly the lucrative trans-Atlantic routes, possibly offering cheaper tickets." The AP adds, "Within five years, the deal could put an extra 26 million people on trans-Atlantic flights, the EU said. Just under 50 million travelers now make that trip every year. … But the deal may also mean the EU would be allowed to restrict U.S. investments in European airlines — a tit-for-tat move that follows the U.S. administration's failure to lift a 25-percent ceiling on foreign ownership of U.S. carriers. Dropping the restriction has been among the EU's key demands."

The Financial Times (3/3, Bounds) reports, "The European Commission said it would submit the agreement to EU governments this month after 'a breakthrough' in meetings in Brussels. However, there is expected to be fierce debate when transport ministers meet on March 22, as the US has given little ground on loosening restrictions on foreign ownership of its airlines." The Times adds, "The quest for an 'open skies' agreement has eluded the two sides since talks were launched four years ago. A 2005 deal foundered in December because of congressional opposition to easing the regulations limiting foreign investment in US airlines, which the EU made a condition of the deal. Foreign companies and individuals can own only 25 per cent of voting stock and a further 24.9 per cent of non-voting equity. … The draft agreement merely sets out in writing existing US policy, critics say. In 2004 the Commission sent a similar deal for EU approval, only to see resistance from the UK and Germany sink it." The Times notes, "The UK has in the past been determined to resist the loosening of restrictions on the lucrative market between London's Heathrow airport and the US, without reciprocal US concessions. Only British Airways, Virgin Atlantic, United Airlines and American Airlines have the right to direct fights on these routes. … The UK has 40 per cent of the transatlantic market. Its transport department refused to comment yesterday."

EPA Issues Tighter Restrictions On Diesel Engines. The Washington Post (3/3, A2, Eilperin, 690K) reports the Environmental Protection Agency "issued stringent new rules yesterday curbing harmful emissions from diesel locomotive and marine engines. Over the next quarter-century the regulations…will cut these engines' annual emissions of nitrogen oxide, a key ingredient in smog, by 80 percent and fine particulate matter, or soot, by 90 percent. EPA officials estimated that by 2030 the health benefits associated with the new standards will outweigh the costs by 20 to 1, preventing 1,500 premature deaths and 1,100 hospitalizations a year. 'By tackling the greatest remaining source of diesel emissions, we're keeping our nation's clean-air progress moving full steam ahead,' EPA Administrator Stephen L. Johnson told reporters in a telephone news conference yesterday." According to the Post, "Environmentalists praised the administration's decision."

The New York Times (3/3, A12, Barringer, 1.16M) reports Johnson "said environmentalists, engine manufacturers like General Electric and railroads like CSX had widely differing opinions about the standard. 'Some were concerned about technology not being available in the time frames we were talking about,' Mr. Johnson said. 'Others believed it would be.' … Frank O'Donnell, president of Clean Air Watch, said the proposed rules were 'the final frontier when it comes to the really big sources of pollution.'"

Administration Report On Anticipated Emissions Levels Draws Criticism. The New York Times (3/3, A1, Revkin, 1.16M) reports the Bush administration "estimates that emissions by the United States of gases that contribute to global warming will grow nearly as fast through the next decade as they did the previous decade, according to a long-delayed report being completed for the United Nations. The document, the United States Climate Action Report, emphasizes that the projections show progress toward a goal Mr. Bush laid out in a 2002 speech: that emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases grow at a slower rate than the economy. … Kristen A. Hellmer, a spokeswoman for the White House on environmental matters, said on Friday, 'The Climate Action Report will show that the president's portfolio of actions addressing climate change and his unparalleled financial commitments are working.' But when shown the report, an assortment of experts on climate trends and policy described the projected emissions as unacceptable given the rising evidence of risks from unabated global warming."

Pelosi Seeks "Greening" Of Capitol Hill Buildings. The Washington Times (3/3, Bellantoni, 88K) reports Congressional Democrats "called for the 'greening' of buildings on Capitol Hill, saying politicians have the responsibility to preserve the planet." Speaker Nancy Pelosi and "other top Democrats" wrote a letter "to the chief administrative officer of the House asking him to embark on a 'Green the Capitol' initiative. 'The Capitol complex should lead the nation in preserving our planet for future generations,' the Democrats wrote to Daniel P. Beard yesterday. … The Democrats asked Mr. Beard to provide them with a preliminary report by April 30 and a final report by June 30 on ways to conserve energy inside the Capitol and its adjoining congressional offices."

Congress Credited With Inducing Industries To Support Carbon Caps. The Wall Street Journal (3/3, A7, Timiraos, 2.04M) reports, "A growing number of businesses are calling for federal caps on greenhouse-gases, which could spur Congress to action. … In the past few weeks, three industry trade groups that have long fought such regulation, the Edison Electric Institute, the American Gas Association and the Electric Power Supply Association, dropped their opposition to a cap. That coincided with calls for an emissions cap by the two private-equity firms bidding for Texas utility TXU Corp. Earlier this year, 10 corporations, including Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and General Electric Co., announced their support for mandatory curbs on greenhouse gases. The shift underscores a growing belief that Congress eventually will pass mandatory emissions caps. Many business leaders have concluded it would be better for it to happen now rather than later, eliminating the current uncertainty. Moreover, they fear absent federal government action they'll be left to deal with a patchwork of state regulations. And they believe that by endorsing emissions caps, they'll be given a seat at the table in the negotiations over how such a cap would work."

WSJournal Questions Corporations' Motives For Embracing "Cap-And-Trade." The Wall Street Journal (3/3, A8, 2.04M) editorializes, "There's no market here unless the government creates one, and who has the profit opportunity depends entirely on who the government picks as the winners and the losers in designing this market in the first place. So it's no wonder that almost any business that has ever put an ounce of CO2 into the atmosphere is rushing to show its cap-and-trade bona fides. … The emerging alliance of business and environmental special interests may well prove powerful enough to give us cap-and-trade in CO2. It would make Hollywood elites feel virtuous, and it would make money for some very large corporations. But don't believe for a minute that this charade would do much about global warming."

NYTimes Highlights New Research On Drought Cycles In Southwest. The New York Times (3/3, A14, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "In the American Southwest, climatologists have found a surprisingly detailed record of weather patterns — especially patterns of moisture — in tree rings that show that prolonged periods of drought there are normal. Those findings immediately raise questions about how water is being used in the Southwest, and particularly about the Colorado River Compact, the 1922 legal agreement that governs water distribution in the vast Colorado River basin."

Judge Keeps Divine Strike Legal Issues Alive. The Las Vegas Review-Journal (3/3, Rogers) reports, "Plans for the massive non-nuclear Divine Strake blast at the Nevada Test Site are dead but legal issues surrounding the controversial bunker-buster experiment were resurrected Friday." The Review-Journal continues, "Eight days after a Pentagon agency canceled its plans for the Divine Strake detonation, Senior U.S. District Judge Lloyd George scheduled a status report for April 30. … George anticipates that motions will be filed by U.S. attorneys who want to dismiss a case by downwinders and some members of the Winnemucca Indian Colony challenging the test." The Review-Journal adds, "Opponents fear that the government will conduct smaller blasts that, while not as large as Divine Strake, could still stir up potentially deadly radioactive dust that lies on the ground of the test site and could be blown to their homes. … The opponents' lawyer, Robert Hager, of Reno, wants to keep the case alive by forcing the government to formally define the smaller scale "confirmatory" experiments that a Pentagon agency has said it intends to conduct in lieu of Divine Strake's cancellation. … In his words, George decided to 'keep it on the calendar so we can finally conclude this matter with satisfaction to everyone.' … 'You file whatever motions you choose to file,' he told Hager and Justice Department attorney Caroline Blanco, who presented their respective positions in a conference call at the Lloyd George U.S. Courthouse, named after the judge. … Referring to a Feb. 22 press release from the Defense Threat Reduction Agency canceling the test amid widespread opposition from downwinders and some politicians in Nevada, Utah and Idaho, Hager said he doesn't understand what agency director James Tegnelia meant by 'confirmatory experiments at a much smaller scale" will instead be conducted.'"

Anadarko Revives Suit Over Royalties. The New York Times (3/3, Andrews) reports, "One of the nation's biggest oil producers in the Gulf of Mexico is pressing ahead with a lawsuit that could, if successful, allow energy companies to avoid as much as $60 billion in royalties to the government over the next two decades." The Times continues, "Anadarko Petroleum, based in Houston, is suing the Interior Department to overturn regulations that force companies that drill in publicly owned waters to pay full royalties on oil and gas they produce during times of high energy prices." The Times adds, "Anadarko, which earned

$4.8 billion in profit last year on sales of $10.2 billion, is arguing that Congress guaranteed oil companies a special incentive for drilling in deep water under which the companies could avoid paying the standard royalty on much of what they produced in the Gulf of Mexico. The Interior Department has adamantly argued that the incentives were never supposed to apply when oil prices climbed above about $34 a barrel. … The suit itself was filed a year ago by the Kerr-McGee Oil and Gas Corporation, which Anadarko acquired last year for $21 billion. But Anadarko put the suit on hold last year and began court-supervised mediation talks with the Interior Department." The Times notes, "On Thursday, a federal judge in Louisiana, Patricia Minaldi, declared that the mediation talks had failed and ordered both sides to start filing arguments in late May. The failure of the mediation poses a major problem for the Bush administration, which is already trying to prevent the loss of $10 billion in royalties as a result of a huge leasing error made during the Clinton administration. … If Anadarko is successful, the government would lose many more times that. The Government Accountability Office, the Congressional watchdog agency, estimated in January that the government would lose about $60 billion over 25 years. … The federal government leases millions of acres in the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas producers. Companies are required to pay a royalty of 12 to 16 percent of their sales from the leases, but the government also offers royalty holidays as an incentive for deepwater drilling. …. The Interior Department contends that companies are not entitled to such royalty relief if oil prices climb above about $34 a barrel, as they have for the last three years. … But Anadarko, in its lawsuit, argued that Congress never authorized that kind of restriction and had 'guaranteed' the incentives for any leases signed from 1996 through 2000."

Evangelical Leaders Condemn Peer For Global Warming Activism. The Washington Post (3/3, A4, Cooperman, 690K) reports Focus on the Family's James Dobson and "other conservative Christian leaders" are calling on the National Association of Evangelicals "to silence or fire an official who has urged evangelicals to take global warming seriously. In a letter this week to the board of the NAE…Dobson and his two dozen co-signers said the Rev. Richard Cizik, the NAE's vice president for government relations, has waged a 'relentless campaign' that is 'dividing and demoralizing' evangelicals." The NAE's president, the Rev. Leith Anderson, "defended Cizik as 'a great asset.' He also said that the Dobson letter was released to the news media before it was received by the board. 'I guess that says it all,' he said."

The New York Times (3/3, A9, Goodstein, 1.16M) reports that Dobson's co-signers include Gary Bauer, president of Coalitions for America; Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council; and Paul Weyrich, a longtime political strategist who is chairman of American Values. The Times goes on to report that Evangelicals "have recently become a significant voice in the chorus on global warming. Last year more than 100 prominent pastors, theologians and college presidents signed an 'Evangelical Climate Initiative' calling for action on the issue. Among the signers were several board members of the National Association of Evangelicals."

DOE Routinely Misses Efficiency Standards Deadlines, GAO Finds. The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Hotz, 850K) reports, "Over the last three decades, the federal government has missed legal deadlines for setting stricter efficiency standards for common appliances, resulting in billions of dollars in higher utility bills and millions more tons of the greenhouse gases that fuel global warming, congressional investigators reported. All told, the Department of Energy has missed every one of 34 mandatory rule-making deadlines for setting minimum energy efficiency standards…analysts at the Government Accountability Office reported. The delays ranged from a few months to 15 years, according to the GAO report made public this week."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Faces Questions Over California Anti-Gang Funding. The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Mcgreevy) reports, "After huddling with visiting U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales on efforts to keep kids out of gangs, Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa said Friday that the city would increase dramatically the number of jobs offered to young people this year, to 10,000 — four times the number provided two years ago." The Times continues, "The mayor announced the increase after he and Gonzales toured a silk-screening plant run by Homeboy Industries in South Los Angeles. … The nonprofit group, which received a $650,000 federal grant, hires former gang members who are trying to lead law-abiding lives. … 'Young people, when they feel there are no options, when there are no job opportunities, when they don't have the skills to make it, they lose hope,' Villaraigosa said. 'We are both committed to the idea that in a great and beautiful country like America we can invest in young people, that we have to address the issues of prevention and intervention.' … However, Gonzales' agency faced criticism from one city official Friday for delays in delivering on past promises." The Times notes, "The attorney general had been in Los Angeles nearly a year ago to announce a separate $2.5-million federal grant for gang intervention, suppression and prevention programs in South Los Angeles, but officials conceded recently that the money has not yet gone out to local programs. … 'We have waited too long for federal dollars that were promised almost a year ago,' said Councilwoman Janice Hahn, who represents the area. … 'We know that money is voted for, appropriated and spent much quicker on the war on Iraq. This war on gangs is no less urgent,' she said. … George Cardona of the U.S. attorney's office said federal officials had been meeting with community leaders to discuss the best way to spend the money. He added that the first installment of the funds probably will arrive before May. … Gonzales had been in Los Angeles last March to announce that the city was one of six awarded Justice Department grants, each consisting of $1 million earmarked for gang prevention, $1 million devoted to law enforcement and $500,000 to provide transitional housing and job placement help for released convicts. … Gonzales had said at the time that the money would be focused on a section of South Los Angeles that includes the Imperial Courts, Nickerson Gardens and Jordan Downs housing projects. … 'I don't know the specifics,' Gonzales said Friday when asked about the money. 'The way these things work is that we expect the state and local communities to develop a plan, hopefully an innovative plan that is focused on the needs of the community.'"

WTimes Praises DEA For Busting Mexican Drug Ring. In its "Nobles And Knave" editorial column, the Washington Times (3/3) praises the Drug Enforcement Agency "for busting a major Mexican drug-trafficking ring. … DEA agents arrested 66 persons on Wednesday, bringing the total number for their 20-month investigation of the Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum (also known as Victor Emilio Cazares-Salazar) drug-trafficking empire to 400. Agents seized more than 18 tons of marijuana, cocaine, methamphetamine and heroin, along with $45.2 million and various weapons and vehicles, according to the DEA Web site." The Times adds, "The Mexico-based group would smuggle the narcotics from Colombia and Venezuela through Mexico, then into the United States via points along the Southwest border. They even "built a bridge made of sandbags across the Colorado river near Yuma, Az., which allowed them to simply drive across the waterway," ABC News reported. Once in the United States, the drugs would be distributed to U.S. cells scattered across the country. … The investigation, known as 'Operation Imperial Emperor,' was led by the DEA but included the FBI, ICE and the IRS, among others. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has praised the officers and agents for working together 'against a common foe.' DEA Administrator Karen P. Tandy said Wednesday that 'we ripped out this empire's U.S. infrastructure from its commanders and transportation coordinators to its local distribution cells across the country ... and tossed it in the dustbin of history.' … For keeping 18 tons of illegal drugs out of the United States, the DEA is the Noble of the week."

Authorities Find Million Rounds Of Ammo At Southern California Fire. The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Abrams) reports, "Firefighters responding to a house fire in a Norco (CA) neighborhood were greeted with a dangerous surprise: gunfire. Lots of it." The Times continues, "Authorities on Thursday found a cache containing more than 1 million rounds of ammunition and 75 firearms, ranging from small handguns to assault rifles, throughout the burning home and in a shaft and tunnel under the garage. … The firefighters realized the stockpile was inside when rounds started going off. No injuries were reported. … 'The Fire Department knew exactly what was going on when they heard the sounds,' said Riverside County Sheriff's Sgt. Dennis Gutierrez." The Times adds, "The stockpile of ammunition is probably the largest ever confiscated in Riverside County, said Gutierrez. … A neighbor reported the fire Thursday afternoon and had dragged the homeowner, whom deputies did not identify, from the house, Gutierrez said. … Authorities are checking the serial numbers of the remaining firearms. … 'He could have gotten them from anywhere — a reputable gun store or a shooting range, but who knows?' said Susan Raichel, spokeswoman for the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives."

The Contra Costa Times (3/3, Flaccus) reports, "The day after the fire, an incongruous scene played out in the windy hilltop neighborhood of older middle-class tract homes set against a backdrop of the snow-capped San Bernardino Mountains -- part of a quiet semirural community that bills itself as 'Horsetown USA.' … Riverside County sheriff's deputies and federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives agents carried charred boxes and pieces of furniture out of the house, stacked numerous boxes of ammunition in the driveway and examined seized rifles." The Times adds, "Two weapons were assault rifles that were illegal, and the man had no permit for 75 pounds of black gunpowder that was found, said sheriff's deputy Juan Zamora. … The tunnel, stretching from an entry in the garage 8 to 10 feet into the backyard, yielded three 25-gallon containers of fluid that was being analyzed by hazardous material experts, said Norco fire Battalion Chief Ron Knueven."

The AP (3/3) reports, "On Friday, sheriff's deputies and agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives combed the house for evidence. … Dozens of metal and cardboard boxes filled with ammunition for shotguns, small handguns and assault rifles sat in a driveway. Two of the assault rifles were illegal, Zamora said. … The man had no permit for 75 pounds of black gunpowder that was also recovered, Zamora said. … No arrests had been made. The man, whose identity was not released, was taken to a hospital where he will receive a psychological evaluation, Zamora said."

Hundreds Of Guns Tied To Ohio Police Officer. The AP (3/3, Cohen) reports from Columbus, OH, "There were 501 guns in all, the government says - revolvers and pistols, Glocks and Rugers, a few rifles, too, a giant cache of firearms suitable for sport or self-protection. … Or felonies. … Or terrorism." The AP continues, "Five hundred one guns, tied to one man - 35-year-old Mark Nelson, a former Columbus cop who masterminded a conspiracy that flooded the streets with weapons. … Nelson insists he didn't knowingly do anything wrong. But prosecutors say he enlisted his family and others (including a drug dealer) to illegally acquire 501 guns, then directly - or indirectly - sold many of them. And soon after - within days, in a few cases - some of these guns began turning up in the wrong hands and the wrong places:" The AP adds, "A Raven Arms .25-caliber pistol used in a Brooklyn, N.Y., shooting. A Ruger 9 mm handgun found on a man charged with crack possession in Washington, D.C. A Smith & Wesson .40-caliber pistol recovered in Youngstown, Ohio, in a car driven by a man inexplicably wearing a bulletproof vest and carrying a winter face mask - in May. … It's all part of the shadowy world of gun trafficking, where lies, stealth and cold cash make it alarmingly easy for deadly weapons to be bought and sold - and surface days, months, even years later in crimes. … This is the story of how one trafficking case unfolded and how a handful of people, bogus paperwork, the lure of a profit and the constant demand for weapons combined for a black-market scheme that could haunt investigators for decades. More than 300 guns remain missing."

Washington ATF Center Curbing Crime Through Gun Tracking. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (3/3, Gutierrez) reports, "When a corroded 9 mm handgun surfaced last year in a brushy West Seattle yard, police suspected it had been used nearby to kill a 14-year-old boy three years earlier. … But they needed proof." The P-I continues, "Using the gun's serial number, they traced it through the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives to a man who had bought it from a licensed gun dealer. That man turned out to be related to Demeko B. Holland, who police already considered a main suspect. … Information from the gun trace, which helped lead to a first-degree murder charge against Holland, is collected in the ATF's database. That database, with its lists of crime guns, suspects and firearms dealers, is central to the ATF's Regional Crime Gun Center, which opened last August in Seattle." The P-I adds, "The center is a clearinghouse for weapons that city and state police recover at crime scenes, or simply find in the streets. Its main purpose is to identify trafficking, and to determine how suspected criminals, especially felons such as Holland, get their weapons. … It's also helped identify some key trends in Washington. … One of those is that the state has become a leading source for guns being used in crimes in Western Canada, which has far more restrictive gun laws than the U.S. … 'If you purchase a gun here in Washington for $100, you could sell that for $300 in Canada -- that's U.S. not Canadian (dollars),' said supervisory special ATF agent Doug Krough. … Local police hope the center also will help curb a recent rise in gun violence in the Seattle metro area."

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Reform Seen As Necessary To Combat Farm Labor Shortage. In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (3/3, 850K), David Mas Masumoto, an organic farmer and fellow at the Kellogg Foundation, writes, "Last year, pears in California rotted on trees; two years ago, my raisin harvest was endangered, and for the last three years, I've struggled with peach harvests, terrified that just as the fruit was at the peak of perfection, I wouldn't have enough workers. … The agricultural industry supports federal legislation for a guest-worker program that would bring in temporary farm laborers when shortages arise. This remedy would fix short-term problems. However, a long-term solution lies in immigration reform that could change the nature of farming, especially when it comes to specialty crops and small-scale operations like mine. Without sufficient labor, organic and sustainable agricultural methods are jeopardized."

IRS Audits Marriott's ESOP-Related Deductions. The Washington Post (3/3, D6) reports, "The Internal Revenue Service is auditing Marriott International's federal tax returns for fiscal 2000 through 2002 over $1 billion in deductions the hotel chain took related to its employee stock-ownership plan." The Post continues, "Bethesda-based Marriott said it received 'notices of proposed adjustment' from the IRS on Thursday that challenged most of the federal income tax deductions related to the plan, and the government agency proposed 'substantial excise taxes and penalties.' … 'We believe the IRS' proposed adjustments are incorrect, intend to vigorously defend our positions and are examining various procedural alternatives for resolution of this matter,' Marriott said in a filing yesterday with the Securities and Exchange Commission." The Post adds, "Thomas Marder, a spokesman for the company, said he couldn't provide guidance on the size of the proposed adjustment. When asked if the situation could significantly affect Marriott's bottom line, he referred to a regulatory filing from late last month, which came before the company received the proposed adjustment notice and said no material impact was expected. … He also said companies have used this type of tax transaction for more than 30 years." The Post notes, "The IRS is reviewing the ESOP feature of the company's 'Employees' Profit Sharing, Retirement and Savings Plan and Trust' implemented on June 13, 2000."

Michigan Man Arrested In Tax-Evasion Scheme. The Battle Creek (MI) Enquirer (3/3) reports, "U.S. Marshals on Thursday arrested Charles Conces of Battle Creek, the Justice Department announced." The Enquirer continues, "The arrest resulted from a federal judge's Feb. 23 order finding Conces in civil contempt of court for failing to obey a court order entered on Feb. 8. … Conces, who lives in Pennfield Township, has run for Michigan attorney general and secretary of state as a member of the U.S. Taxpayers Party and has staged public protests against county judges outside the Calhoun County courthouse in Battle Creek." The Enquirer adds, "The Feb. 8 order compelled Conces to disclose to the government the identities of certain persons for whom he drafted or provided advice regarding federal income taxes, the identities of the persons who are responsible for his Web site, and all documents that he drafted or assisted in drafting for these persons no later than Feb. 16. … Conces refused to disclose the identities and documents as ordered by the court. … On Feb. 23, the court held Conces in civil contempt and ordered him to report to the U.S. Marshal no later than noon on March 1, 2007. Conces reported to the U.S. Marshals and was taken into custody. According to the court's Feb. 23 order, Conces will remain in the custody of the U.S. Marshals until he complies with the order to disclose these identities and documents. … 'The Justice Department is not only committed to shutting down the tax scams that cheat the federal treasury and the taxpayers who pay into it, but also ensuring that such tax scams do not resurface later,' said Eileen J. O'Connor, assistant attorney general for the federal Justice Department's Tax Division, in a press release."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Army Secretary Ousted In Wake Of Walter Reed Scandal. Secretary of the Army Francis Harvey became the second top official to abruptly leave office in the wake of the scandal over conditions at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. The story led two of the three broadcast network newscasts Friday night, with ABC, CBS, and NBC devoting a combined nine minutes to the subject. Television and print reports make it clear that both President Bush and Defense Secretary Robert Gates are furious over the conditions at Walter Reed and the Army's response. The CBS Evening News (3/2, story 2, 1:00, Couric, 7.66M) said Bush "is very angry about all of this," with correspondent Jim Axelrod adding, "A former Pentagon official close to the situation says the President is so angry, quote, 'His hair is on fire.'"

ABC World News (3/2, story 6, 2:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that the "major shakeup at the Pentagon" comes following the revelation of "outrageous conditions" at Walter Reed. Bush "ordered a sweeping review of the medical care provided to all veterans and wounded troops." ABC (Karl): "Defense Secretary Robert Gates left no doubt" why Harvey "is out." Gates: "I am disappointed that some in the Army have not adequately appreciated the seriousness of the situation pertaining to outpatient care at Walter Reed." Karl: "Pentagon officials say Gates was upset by how the Army responded to the squalid conditions exposed by the Washington Post, which found some injured soldiers living in a building infested with mold, mice and cockroaches. Gates was said to be especially irritated when the Army named Kevin Kiley yesterday as the temporary commanding general at Walter Reed. Kiley had dismissed the Washington Post story as one-sided and inaccurate. Today, after only one day on the job, Kiley was replaced by Major General Eric R. Schoomaker." President Bush will "use his radio address to announce the thorough review of all medical facilities serving active-duty military personnel and veterans." Bush: "This is unacceptable to me, it is unacceptable to our country, and it's not going to continue." The CBS Evening News (3/2, story 2, 1:00, Axelrod, 7.66M) said that on the day the story broke, President Bush "told Gates to, quote, 'Fix it,' but the decision to fire the Secretary of the Army was apparently made by Gates, not the President. Still, the White House is well aware of the PR nightmare that it faces. The last thing this Administration can afford is another Katrina."

The CBS Evening News (3/2, lead story, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) called Harvey "another casualty of the Walter Reed scandal" as the President "promises an investigation of conditions at military hospitals everywhere. … Firing the general in charge of the Army hospital did not end the national outcry over the shoddy conditions there, not after the Secretary of the Army replaced that general with another one who was just as deeply involved in the scandal. The outcry just got louder today, and tonight the secretary of the Army got the boot." CBS (Martin) said, "Fed up with what he considered the Army's indifferent reaction to the scandal," Gates "demanded and got the resignation of the secretary of the Army. Then he publicly read the Army the riot act." Gates: "I am disappointed that some in the Army have not adequately appreciated the seriousness of the situation pertaining to outpatient care at Walter Reed. Some have shown too much defensiveness and have not shown enough focus on digging into and addressing the problems." Martin:

"Gates' swift sword was immediately cheered by veterans' organizations." Paul Rieckhoff, Iraq-Afghanistan Veterans Of America: "We see massive and catastrophic leadership failures, and it's good to see people being held accountable. And I think it should also illustrate to people that this is a problem that extends beyond Walter Reed."

NBC Nightly News (3/2, lead story, 3:00, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) said that "from the very day this scandal broke," Gates "has been demanding accountability and today he got it. Gates himself made the announcement in the Pentagon briefing room." NBC also says Gates saw Kiley "as part of the problem," and "reportedly felt the army's decision to put Kiley back in charge showed a lack of judgment that led to today's firing of Harvey." But Senate Armed Forces Committee member Jack Reed said "the bigger problem is that the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have produced so many wounded soldiers, Walter Reed was simply overwhelmed." Reed: "We're assessing responsibility. Now we've got to fix the problem and the problem is more resources in terms of personnel for Walter Reed."

The Washington Post (3/3, Abramowitz, Vogel, 690K) says in its front page report that Harvey was "fired," reporting that the Bush Administration "scrambled to contain fallout from the scandal." Kiley's selection "had angered soldiers and family groups -- and, more important, Gates -- because of their belief that he had been aware of problems at the hospital and done little to address them." Friday's events "highlighted the anger at the highest levels of the administration over the problems at Walter Reed, as well as the political danger for the White House. Veterans groups remain among the few strong supporters of the war." BBC.com (3/2) says "America's wounded veterans are regarded by most people in the country as truly heroic, so the fall-out has been considerable."

On its front page, the New York Times (3/3, A1, Cloud, 1.16M) says Gates was "grim-faced" in announcing Harvey's "dismissal," adding that "Gates's aggressiveness in addressing the problem has surprised many Pentagon officials who are still getting used to his style more than two months into his service. ... The scandal at Walter Reed is particularly embarrassing to the administration because many top officials have visited injured troops there." An anonymous Pentagon official said that Gates thought that Kiley's comments earlier "demonstrated a certain insensitivity" and that Gates would have accepted "almost anybody but Kiley" as temporary commander. The Chicago Tribune (3/3, Madhani, Biemer, 617K) also says Gates was unable to accept the Kiley appointment.

McClatchy (3/3, Hutcheson, Adams) says Gates "blamed the problems on Walter Reed's leadership, not its doctors, nurses and other health-care workers." The AP (3/3, Burns) calls it the "most dramatic move in an escalating removal of officials." Harvey "said he offered Gates his resignation because he believed the Army let the wounded soldiers down. ... His last day in the job will be March 9." CNN.com (3/2) says Gates "accepted no questions after his announcement, and didn't explain why Harvey resigned."

Gates Response Said To Differ From Rumsfeld Precedents. The Washington Post (3/3, A8, Ricks, Tyson, 690K) writes that "Harvey's firing sent a strong message across the top of the military establishment that the new Pentagon chief, though a newcomer to the world of defense, would not be a passive manager and would hold senior leaders accountable for their actions." The Post contrasts Gates with former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, saying that while Gates "did not explicitly mention his predecessor, the new defense secretary's approach" has contrasted with the way the Rumsfeld Pentagon "handled allegations of wrongdoing. In the Abu Ghraib prison scandal, Pentagon officials were quick to point the finger at low-ranking soldiers, and only one officer who worked at the prison has faced court proceedings, even after numerous investigations found high-level problems with interrogation policies." Along similar lines, the Los Angeles Times (3/3, Barnes, 850K) reports, "Military officers said the swift response by Gates and his willingness to move against top Army commanders and civilians was partly meant to differentiate him" from Rumsfeld.

Bush Urges Congress To Avoid "Watering Down" NCLB. The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports President Bush "urged Congress to avoid broad changes" to the No Child Left Behind Act, saying Friday that "'watering down'…the Act 'would be doing thousands of children a disservice.' 'It's working,' Bush said. 'We can change parts of it for the better, but don't change the core of a piece of good legislation that's making a significant difference in the lives of a lot of children.'" Bush "spoke to a crowd in the gymnasium of an elementary school in New Albany, Ind." According to the Times, the president "has not said what changes he would accept. But he opposes relaxing testing requirements or requiring a national test to replace state exams. He said Friday that he also favored speeding up the process through which parents learn about a school's test results to make it easier for them to decide whether to seek additional help for their children."

Bush Aides Sought Ejection Of Attendees At 2005 Event. The Washington Post (3/3, A7, 690K) reports, "A volunteer said Friday that he was acting on orders from White House staffers when he helped eject three people from a taxpayer-funded event President Bush was attending, according to the man's attorney. The volunteer, Michael Casper, said in a deposition that two White House employees told him to throw out the three after Casper saw them behaving suspiciously, lawyer Sean R. Gallagher said. Casper named the White House employees as Steven A. Atkiss, deputy director for travel, and Jamie O'Keefe, lead advance staffer for the 2005 event, Gallagher said. … Leslie Weise and Alex Young, two of the three people who were thrown out, filed a federal lawsuit against Casper and Jay Bob Klinkerman, both volunteers with the event's host committee."

Justice Thomas Uses Rare Interview To Criticize Media. The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Savage, 850K) reports that in a "rare interview," Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas "bitterly rejected the idea that he benefited from affirmative action because he was black. 'That was the creation of the politicians, the people with a lot of mouth and nothing to say, and your industry,' Thomas told a writer for Business Week magazine. 'Everything becomes affirmative action.' … Thomas expressed disdain for the news media several times during the interview. 'One of the reasons I don't do media interviews is, in the past, the media often has its own script,' he said. 'The media, unfortunately, have been universally untrustworthy because they have their own notions of what I should think or I should do.'"

Livermore Chosen To Develop New Nuclear Warhead. The Washington Post (3/3, A8, Pincus, 690K) reports the National Nuclear Security Administration "has selected a design from Lawrence Livermore and Sandia national laboratories that could become the basis for the first new nuclear warhead produced by the United States in more than 20 years. The purpose of the new Reliable Replacement Warhead is to provide, beginning in 2012, a new generation of secure nuclear warheads -- initially for submarine-launched missiles -- that would provide a credible deterrent well into the mid-21st century."

The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Vartabedian, 850K) reports the Bush administration "said the program would improve the U.S. stockpile's reliability, security and safety and would allow for a reduction in the thousands of weapons held in reserve for a potential war. Critics reacted sharply, saying the program sent the wrong international message when the U.S. was trying to stop the spread of nuclear weapons. Key members of Congress said the program was moving too fast. 'I have serious concerns with the process leading up to today's announcement, and with the priorities of the Department of Energy,' said Rep. Peter J. Visclosky (D-Ind.), chairman of the appropriations subcommittee that would pay for the program."

The San Francisco Chronicle (3/3, A1, Sterngold, 384K) reports the Energy and Defense departments "have chosen the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory to design the country's first new nuclear warhead since the Cold War, giving the Bay Area institution the central role in a program that could involve billions of dollars. The decision, announced Friday, was a clear victory for Livermore, which bested its storied sister lab, the Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico, in a competition to lead the research." The AP (3/2, Hebert) reports, "One of the assurances given by defense officials to Congress is that the new warhead will not have to undergo actual testing." BBC.com (3/3) reports, "Critics have complained it sends the wrong signal at a time when the White House is leading efforts to curb Iran and North Korea's nuclear ambitions."

NYTimes Urges Pelosi To Institute Independent Ethics Oversight. The New York Times (3/3, A14, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "As the House's special task force considers whether Congress needs an outside monitoring panel to help enforce stronger integrity standards, we suggest that it start with an in-depth briefing on the Abramoff-Ney downfall — complete with cash-flow charts and poll data on how the scandal has tainted the public's view of lawmakers. … The Democratic Senate has already run away from a proposed integrity office. The House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, deserves credit for ordering consideration of the sensitive subject of an outside watchdog. But the study group must not be shrouded in secrecy nor its work be allowed to drag on beyond May 1. For all the tenderness of the task, lawmakers should focus on where and how Mr. Ney went wrong and try to ensure that it does not happen again."

Ornstein Says Congressional Leaders Should Not Be In Presidential Succession Line. In a Washington Post (3/3, A15, 690K) op-ed, Norman Ornstein of the American Enterprise Institute, senior counselor to the Continuity of Government Commission, considers whether the Speaker of the House should "even be in the line of succession" to the presidency. Ornstein details several constitutional flaws in a line of succession that goes through Congress, but says "having congressional leaders in the presidential line of succession is wrong for more than constitutional reasons." Congressional leaders frequently "are of the opposite party and viewpoint of a president; if a president and vice president were to die at the beginning of a term, the country would have four years of a president representing the opposite of what it voted for," and "congressional leaders have a built-in conflict of interest," since they can impeach and remove those above them in the succession line. Ornstein says a "better option would be to include top Cabinet members, such as the secretaries of State, Treasury and Defense, and then allow a president to designate several others -- all requiring Senate confirmation."

OTHER NEWS:

Wall Street Staggers To End Of Dow's Worst Week In Four Years. The Wall Street Journal (3/3, B1, McKay, 2.04M) reports on the end of "a tough week" on Wall Street that saw the Dow Jones drop 4.2%, "the biggest weekly percentage drop since March 2003, ending at 12114.10. The blue-chip average is now off 2.8% this year and more than 670 points below its record close less than three weeks ago." On Friday, "the market's newfound volatility remained on full display. The Dow opened lower, rose to show a gain of more than 13 points prior to midday, but finished near its intraday lows. In the end, the Dow stumbled 120.24 points, or 1%, on the day." The S&P 500 "fell 1.1% Friday, or 16.00 points, to 1387.17, off 4.4% on the week and down 2.2% this year," while the Nasdaq "shed 1.5%, or 36.21 points," and "is now down 2% in 2007."

The Washington Post (3/3, D1, Tse, 690K) headlines its report "Dow Ends Its Worst Week Since 2003," and the AP (3/2, Paradis) also says it was the "worst week in over four years." ABC World News (3/2, story 8, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) NBC Nightly News (3/2, story 5, :15, Brown, 9.87M) briefly reported on the numbers.

The Financial Times (3/3, Brown-Humes, Davies, Beales) says the "turbulent week…more than eradicated all this year's gains, leaving investors on edge over the outlook for next week." The New York Times (3/3, C6, Peters, 1.16M) says "s investors and economists look to the week ahead, they see signs of encouragement but also some uncertainty about what could happen. Starting with a survey on the strength of the service sector on Monday and ending with the Labor Department's monthly employment report, investors will have a buffet of data to soothe or fray their nerves." The Wall Street Journal (3/3, A2, Whitehouse, 2.04M) also says investors "will get something big to chew on" in the form of the employment report.

Crude Oil Ends Week At $61.64 Per Barrel. The Wall Street Journal (3/3, B4, Chambers, 2.04M) reports, "The crude-oil futures market, which usually has an inverse price influence on shares, is closely eyeing U.S. stocks, as traders log their concern over the damage a slowdown in U.S. and Chinese growth could do to oil demand." Crude ended the week in New York "just 50 cents, or less than 1%, higher at $61.64 a barrel."

Bernanke Says Globalization May Have Increased US Inflation. The Wall Street Journal (3/3, A4, Ip, 2.04M) reports that in remarks "prepared for delivery Friday night to the Stanford Institute for Economic Policy Research in California," Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said globalization "hasn't had a significant impact on reducing inflation in the U.S. and may have raised it."

New Jersey Jury Delivers Split Verdict In Vioxx Trial. The Wall Street Journal (3/3, A4, Tesoriero) reports, "A New Jersey state court jury delivered a split verdict in the first phase of the latest Vioxx trial, finding that Merck & Co. adequately warned doctors of the drug's heart-attack risks in the case of one plaintiff but not of another." The Journal continues, "The eight-person jury found that in the case of both plaintiffs the drug maker violated a state consumer-protection statute by misrepresenting the drug's cardiovascular risks in marketing. … The case of Frederick 'Mike' Humeston, 61 years old, of Boise, Idaho, now will move into a second phase to determine whether or not Vioxx was a cause of his heart attack -- and what damages, if any, should be awarded. … Mr. Humeston's case was tried previously in 2005, and Merck prevailed. New Jersey Superior Court Judge Carol Higbee later ordered a new trial after new evidence emerged." The Journal adds, "The other plaintiff in this trial, Kathleen Messerschmidt, sued Merck over the fatal heart attack of her brother, Brian Hermans, who died on Sept. 15, 2002. The Vioxx label was changed to include further cardiovascular risk information in April 2002, making it harder to prove that Mr. Hermans was the victim of a failure on Merck's part to warn doctors. But the jury will now hear evidence to determine whether damages for consumer fraud should be awarded to Ms. Messerschmidt. … Merck withdrew Vioxx from the market in September 2004 following a study that linked the drug to an increased risk of heart attacks and stroke. The company has been hit with some 28,000 lawsuits and has said it intends to fight each case. Since the first trial in the summer of 2005, the Whitehouse Station, N.J., company has won eight trials and lost four."

Bush Raises $2.1 Million For McConnell, NRSC. The Washington Post (3/3, A6, Fletcher, 690K) reports President Bush headlined a Louisville fundraiser for Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell and the National Republican Senatorial Committee netting $2.1 million. Organizers "called it the largest fundraiser in state history. … The event was the second GOP fundraiser in a week for Bush, who continues to be a major Republican draw despite his dismal approval ratings. On Monday, he spoke at a Washington event that raised $10.4 million for the Republican Governors Association."

Surveys Of Party Committee Members Give Clinton, Romney The Leads. The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Barabak, 850K) reports on its front page that Sen. Hillary Clinton and Mitt Romney "have emerged as the leading presidential favorites among party insiders, according to a new Los Angeles Times Poll, which found deep partisan divisions over the country's direction and top issues in the 2008 campaign." The survey showed John Edwards "in second place among Democratic Party leaders, ahead of Sen. Barack Obama," and "pointed up danger signs for Sen. John McCain," who trailed Romney and Rudy Giuliani. It also "signaled GOP concerns about holding the White House for another four years -- 42% of party leaders said it would be tougher to elect a Republican after eight years under President Bush, and just over half said the GOP nominee should campaign on moving the country in a new direction." The survey of 133 of the 165 Republican National Committee members found Romney backed by 20%, with Giuliani 14%, McCain 10%, and Newt Gingrich 8%. And in a "potentially worrisome sign for McCain, just over 1 in 10 RNC members said they would not support him if he won the party's nomination." Among the 313 of 386 Democratic National Committee members surveyed, Clinton was backed by 20%, Edwards 15%, Obama 11%, Al Gore 10%, and Gov. Bill Richardson 9%.

Advertising, Money Look Like Keys To 2008. On its front page, the Washington Times (3/3, Dinan, 88K) looks at the "long-haul strategy for '08," saying that "with a giant set of primaries increasingly likely for Feb. 5, the 2008 nomination will depend far more on television ads, and candidates will need a large bank account to compete."

GOP Hopefuls Woo Conservatives At Annual CPAC Meeting. Reports from the annual Conservative Political Action Conference meeting in Washington cast the mood of the attendees as low, with Democrats in power on Capitol Hill and no clear-cut conservative in the upper tier of Republican presidential candidates. The Washington Post (3/3, A4, Kornblut, 690K) says that at a traditional card game between "a handful of icons of the American conservative movement," the "mood around the poker table could hardly have been more glum. 'Nothing focuses the mind like an impending hanging,' said longtime conservative fundraiser Richard A. Viguerie, paraphrasing the English essayist Samuel Johnson. 'And Republicans feel an impending hanging with Hillary looming on the horizon.'" And while the "possibility of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton as president was bad enough," even worse "is the absence of a Republican candidate to rally around." American Conservative Union Chairman David Keene said the "movement's leaders 'are all pretty much agreed that there is no clear conservative choice…or even an unclear conservative choice."

ABC World News (3/2, story 7, :30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported it was the "first important gathering of Republican Presidential candidates. … Some conservative Republicans said they are not sold on any frontrunners." The Politico (3/3, Martin) headlines its write-up "A Mood Of Gloom At CPAC."

The Washington Times (3/3, Hallow, Dinan, 88K) focuses its more-upbeat front-page report on the GOP hopefuls who did try to convince the crowd of their conservative credentials, leading by saying Mitt Romney "delivered a faultlessly tailored appeal to more than 1,000 grass-roots conservative activists hungry for a renewed commitment to limited government," standing out "from the pack of Republican presidential aspirants that included Rudolph W. Giuliani and Mike Huckabee by promising to end taxes on earnings from interest, dividends and capital gains, and to cap federal spending and veto every attempt to break that cap -- whether proposed by a Republican or Democratic Congress." Giuliani drew "nearly as much applause but not the repeated standing ovations Mr. Romney received" when he spoke.

The New York Times (3/3, A11, Nagourney, 1.16M) says Romney and Giuliani "approached the task" of winning over the conservatives "in similar ways: by presenting themselves as devotees of Ronald Reagan who had tamed Democratic excesses in their communities. Mr. Giuliani talked about cutting crime, welfare and taxes; Mr. Romney talked of cutting taxes and the size of government. Yet they parted company on how they dealt with the more difficult question of their positions on social issues." Romney "portrayed himself as someone who stood at the barricades as his state sought to permit same-sex marriage and to remove restrictions from abortion and stem cell research." Giuliani "made no mention of his support for gay rights, abortion rights and gun control. Instead, he suggested that he and his audience had many more agreements than disagreements." Gannett (3/3, Raasch) says Giuliani, quoting Reagan, "said 'an 80% friend is not your 20% enemy.' Invoking Reagan's optimism and applying it to the war on terrorism, he said victory was inevitable -- if difficult -- because 'the human soul and the human heart is moving in our direction.'"

The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) says "four GOP candidates with more solid conservative credentials but lesser national identities" -- Sen. Sam Brownback, Huckabee, Rep. Duncan Hunter, and Tom Tancredo -- also addressed the crowd. Sen. John McCain was "noticeably absent." McCain "has sought to overcome opposition from the party's conservative base that helped doom his campaign in 2000. But McCain has made little discernible headway among the activists at Friday's event and he skipped it to campaign in Utah and his home state." In his syndicated column, Robert Novak (3/3) writes that McCain "was at a Salt Lake City lunch Thursday and a Phoenix reception Friday." The Denver Post (3/3, Mulkern, 256K) reports on Tancredo's speech, in which he "said it's imperative to crack down on illegal immigration and reject 'the cult of multi-culturalism' that he says is destroying American values."

The Los Angeles paper is alone among major dailies in mentioning in its main report that at the end of her speech, commentator "used a slur to refer to Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards." UPI (3/2) quotes Coulter saying,

"It turns out you have to go into rehab if you use the word 'faggot,' so I'm kind of at an impasse -- I can't really talk about Edwards." The Washington Post (3/3, A2, 690K) does mention the comment in a Dana Milbank write-up that generally focuses on Romney.

McCain Wins Upset Victory In Spartanburg GOP Straw Poll. In an upset, Sen. John McCain "won a Spartanburg, South Carolina straw poll Friday, an early sign of how conservative South Carolinians might view the GOP presidential field," CNN.com (3/2, Mooney) reports. McCain received 164 votes, Rudy Giuliani 162, Rep. Duncan Hunter 158, Sen. Sam Brownback 85, Mitt Romney 80, Mike Huckabee 21, Rep. Tom Tancredo 10, John Cox 4, Rep. Ron Paul 4, Jim Gilmore 1, and Tommy Thompson 1. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice received two write-in votes. South Carolina's The State (3/3) writes that McCain "was third when tallying was suspended Thursday. But by Friday afternoon, McCain had leapt into first in the final vote."

Ridge Says McCain "Prepared To Lead." Former Homeland Security secretary and Pennsylvania governor Tom Ridge discussed his reasons for supporting McCain on MSNBC's Hardball (3/2, Matthews), saying, "I have always admired his courage, his conviction. He doesn't seek to curry favor. A lot of people may disagree with him. He and I disagreed from time to time on issues. But he's not judgmental about other people's point of view. I think from day one he is prepared to lead. He has been conditioned and informed based on his variety of experiences he has had as a soldier, as a prisoner of war, as a congressman, as a senator. I think he's well-respected around the world, not just in this country. And I think he is ready to lead from day one."

Giuliani's Children Absent From His Campaign So Far. The New York Times (3/3, A11, Buettner, Pérez-Peña, 1.16M) reports that "as he embarks on a campaign for the presidency," Rudy Giuliani "is going forward without two people who once played supporting roles in his political life: his children, Andrew, 21, and Caroline, 17. Andrew Giuliani has been at his father's side in campaign commercials and inaugurations since he was a toddler, famously bounding across the stage in a rambunctious manner and mimicking his father's rhetorical flourishes during Mr. Giuliani's 1994 mayoral inauguration." But the candidate's relationship with his son "has grown strained and distant since his very public and bitter divorce from Andrew's mother, Donna Hanover, and his marriage to Judith Nathan," and a similar distance "appears to have developed between Mr. Giuliani and his daughter."

Fred Thompson Reportedly "Seriously Considering" Presidential Bid. Fox News (3/2, Cameron) reported, "The name of a new potential Republican presidential candidate surfaced today at the Conservative Political Action Conference in D.C. Amid some GOP dissatisfaction that the current field is not conservative enough, Fox News has learned Hollywood actor and former US Sen. Fred Thompson of Tennessee is seriously considering a run. He chaired the Senate Government Affairs Committee that investigated questionable Clinton campaign fundraising in the 1990's, rose to prominence as a GOP lawyer during the Watergate hearings, credited with urging lawmakers to ask the famous question, 'What did the President know and when did he know it?' Now he stars in the award-winning TV series 'Law and Order.' Supporters say Thompson has star power, and a consistently conservative record on such core issues as God, guns, gays, and abortion. Sources say no timetable for a decision has been set, but basic planning has begun in anticipation of an increasing conservative dissatisfaction with the GOP field and a Thompson candidacy."

Clintons, Obama To Attend Selma Anniversary March. CNN.com (3/2, Snow) reports, "As they battle for support in the black community in their quest for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama will attend Sunday's commemoration of the historic 1965 Selma voting rights march. However, Clinton will bring along a not-so-secret weapon -- her husband, former President Bill Clinton." Democratic strategist Jamal Simmons said, "There is no white politician in America who is more popular in the African-American community than Bill Clinton. So she has a very strong card to play." Gannett (3/3, Radelat) says Obama spokeswoman Jen Psaki "said the senator -- who was 3 years old when the historic march took place -- wanted to make a 'personal trip' to the famed civil rights site. … But after polls this week showed Obama gaining popularity in the African-American community, Clinton raised the stakes by announcing that her husband" would march with her.

President Clinton's Impeachment Trial Defender Backs Obama. In his syndicated column, Robert Novak (3/3) writes, "Greg Craig, a Washington super-lawyer with close ties to the Clintons, is supporting Sen. Barack Obama for President." Craig, a White House special counsel defending President Bill Clinton in the Senate impeachment trial," called Obama "unique and added: 'I've never seen anyone who has made the impact on people and on me.'"

Pakistani Host Of Clinton Fundraisers Sought By FBI. The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Fields, Neubauer, 850K) reports Abdul Rehman Jinnah, "a Pakistani immigrant who hosted fundraisers in Southern California for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton," is being sought by the FBI "on charges that he funneled illegal contributions to Clinton's political action committee and Sen. Barbara Boxer's 2004 reelection campaign. … A federal law enforcement source said prosecutors had not dealt with the political committees in conducting their investigation and had no evidence that the committees knew the contributions were illegal. Officials for both committees said they were unaware of the investigation or indictments until they were contacted by The Times, and said they would not keep the donations." Jinnah and his family "donated more than $100,000 to the Democratic Party and Democratic candidates. Now friends say they believe Jinnah has returned to Pakistan."

Obama Says US Middle East Policy Has Strengthened Iran. The Chicago Tribune (3/3, McCormick, 617K) reports Sen. Barack Obama, "seeking to woo Jewish votes and contributions," told a Chicago audience that he "considers Iran 'one of the greatest threats to the United States, Israel and world peace' and pledged he would try to end that nation's uranium enrichment program. As he criticized the Bush administration's Iraq policies, the Democratic presidential candidate suggested that the danger posed by neighboring Iran has grown in recent years because of U.S. policy in the Middle East." Obama told an American Israel Public Affairs Committee regional meeting, "One of the most profound consequences of the administration's failed strategy in Iraq has been to strengthen Iran's strategic position, reduce U.S. credibility and influence in the region, and place Israel and other nations friendly to the United States in greater peril." The AP (3/2) headlines a report "Obama Blames U.S. For Stronger Iran," saying Obama "blamed Bush administration failings in Iraq for strengthening the strategic position of Iran, which he says must be stopped from acquiring nuclear weapons."

Genealogists Say Obama's White Ancestors Owned Slaves. The New York Times (3/3, A11, Swarns, 1.16M) follows up on a Friday Baltimore Sun report that Obama's "white maternal ancestors once owned slaves." Genealogists have discovered that Obama's great-great-great-great grandfather and great-great-great-great-great grandmother each owned two slaves.

Dowd Wonders If Obama Is Tough Enough For Campaign. In her New York Times (3/3, A15, 1.16M) column, Maureen Dowd writes, "As I sit across from Barack Obama in his Senate office, I feel like Ingrid Bergman in 'The Bells of St. Mary's,' when she plays a nun who teaches a schoolboy who's being bullied how to box. I'm just not certain, having watched the fresh-faced senator shy away from fighting with the feral Hillary over her Hollywood turf, that he understands that a campaign is inherently a conflict. The Democrats lost the last two excruciatingly close elections because Al Gore and John Kerry did not fight fiercely and cleverly enough. After David Geffen made critical comments about Hillary, she seized the chance to play Godzilla stomping on Obambi. As a woman, she clearly feels she must be aggressive in showing she can 'deck' opponents, as she put it -- whether it's Saddam with her war resolution vote or Senator Obama when he encroaches on areas that she and Bill had presumed were wrapped up, like Hollywood and now the black vote. If Hillary is in touch with her masculine side, Barry is in touch with his feminine side."

Dodd Urges Rivals To Take Part In April New Hampshire Debate. The New Hampshire Union Leader (3/3) reports Sen. Christopher Dodd "urged all his opponents for the Democratic Presidential nomination to participate in the April 5 political debate in Manchester. 'New Hampshire voters deserve a chance to see Presidential candidates on one stage answering tough questions,' said Beneva Schulte, communications director for Dodd." While several Democratic candidates "have committed to participating in the debate, Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama have not.

Dodd Seeks Funds From Banking Industry, Lobbyists. In his syndicated column, Robert Novak (3/3) writes that the "long shot" campaign of Senate Banking Chairman Dodd "solicited banking industry executives and lobbyists -- Democrats and Republicans alike -- for a fund-raising reception Wednesday. Melanie Wong, an experienced Democratic fund-raiser who identified herself as Dodd's 'mid-Atlantic regional finance director,' sent the invitations. They addressed lobbyists by their first names, even those she had never met and who had never contributed to Dodd."

Vilsack Criticizes Early Iowa Polls. The Des Moines Register (3/3, Beaumont, 160K) reports Tom Vilsack "criticized public opinion polls Friday and said his presidential campaign was running stronger in Iowa than early surveys reflected before he gave up his bid for the 2008 Democratic nomination a week ago. I don't want to sound like sour grapes, but you should not pay attention to early polls,' Vilsack said during taping of 'Iowa Press,' a public affairs program on Iowa Public Television." He said, "Iowa polls are not accurate in terms of caucus support. … We were absolutely convinced, and I remain convinced and will as long as I live, that I would have won the Iowa caucuses based on the information that we had that is legitimate."

Bush, Brazil's Lula Will Push Western Hemisphere Ethanol. A lengthy front-page New York Times (3/3, Andrews, Rohter, 1.16M) story reports President Bush, "hoping to reduce demand for oil in the Western Hemisphere, is preparing to finish an agreement with Brazil next week to promote the production and use of ethanol throughout Latin America and the Caribbean." That deal "could lead to substantial growth in the ethanol industry in Brazil as technology and manufacturing equipment developed there is exported to other countries in the region." The Times notes that sugar cane ethanol "is far cheaper to produce than the corn-based ethanol that has been nurtured by protective tariffs and government mandates in the United States." Officials "contend" that "the program could also reduce the influence of Hugo Chavez, the president of oil-rich Venezuela." The US-Brazil deal "calls for cooperation between the countries on research and common standards for biofuels, as well as on helping other countries replicate Brazil's expertise in producing ethanol from sugar," but Times sources claim "the agreement is largely a framework and provides few details."

Treasury "Ready" To Release North Korean Assets. The AP (3/3, Gearan) notes Washington "will soon recommend releasing a significant amount of frozen North Korean bank accounts, officials say, which diplomats hope will keep North Korea from reneging on its pledge to scrap nuclear weapons." The Treasury Department "could announce as soon as next week that several million dollars connected to North Korea are not tainted by links to rogue nuclear proliferation or allegations of counterfeiting, smuggling and other crimes." An unnamed source said "the U.S. move is expected to prompt overseas bank regulators to unfreeze between $8 million and $12 million from about $24 million in blocked assets." Treasury Under Secretary Stuart Levey is quoted saying yesterday, "We intend to handle this matter in a straightforward way based on the evidence and the law. As we have always said, the designation of Banco Delta Asia as a primary money laundering concern is separate from the nuclear talks."

South Korea Conditions Aid Resumption On Complete Dismantling Of Nuclear Program. On its front page, the Washington Times (3/3, Sands, Salmon, 88K) notes South Korean Foreign Minister Song Min-Soon "said yesterday that North Korea must abandon all aspects of its nuclear endeavors, including a suspected uranium enrichment program, as part of a deal to solve the peninsula's nuclear crisis, even if the program has barely gotten off the ground." However, he "sidestepped new questions over the state of Pyongyang's uranium-enrichment program, the key charge in the Bush administration's case that the North had violated past agreements to halt its nuclear weapons programs." Song "said he planned to coordinate closely with Washington as the nuclear deal moves ahead." The Times also reports that Seoul "refused to restore full aid shipments until the North's main nuclear reactor facility had been shut down."

The Washington Post/AP (3/3, A12) keys on the aid announcement, saying Seoul "added pressure on North Korea to comply with an international disarmament agreement, refusing the impoverished nation's demand to restore full aid shipments until after its main nuclear reactor is shut down." The New York Times (3/3, A7, Onishi, 1.16M) notes briefly that both Koreas "wrapped up high-level talks, agreeing to resume reunions of families separated by the Korean War and to test-run a cross-border train in the first half of this year."

Pakistan Tests Nuclear-Capable Short-Range Missile. The AP (3/3) reports Islamabad today "successfully test-fired a short-range missile capable of carrying a nuclear warhead." The launch of the "Haft-II Abdali missile, which has a range of 120 miles, was conducted from an unspecified location inside Pakistan, the military said." The AP notes that "relations between Pakistan and India have improved since they began a peace process in 2004 to resolve all their issues, including Kashmir. They will hold the fourth round of peace talks in Islamabad March 13-14."

In Interview, Qaddafi Redefines Outlook But Stays Faithful To Doctrine. The New York Times (3/3, A3, Slackman, 1.16M) details yesterday's press availability with Libyan leader Muammar el-Qaddafi. "After decades of international isolation, Libya may be changing. But there are very clear limits. A slightly newer and perhaps mellower version of Colonel Qaddafi was on display on Friday for the correspondents, as part of the celebration of the 30th anniversary of the system of government he instituted." The Times says he used "revolutionary words" to describe Libya's role in the world. He "is the same eccentric figure as always, dressed in elaborate Libyan robes jazzed up with striking colors and a modern flair. He still offers unusual ideas, like when he said all the nations of the world would someday meld into seven or eight blocs, and that all formal governments, parliaments, ministries and militaries would be dissolved. Only then, he said, would there be world peace." His remarks suggest "a man thinking about his legacy, and how to retool a system of governance that has failed to adequately administer the state. … He maintained a quiet, almost distant composure through much of the discussion. Occasionally he picked up a pen and jotted down notes, but he mostly spoke in a low voice. What has not changed, and what he made clear, is the core of what he believes."

BBC.com (3/2) keys on a statement by Gaddafi that Libya "has not been given adequate compensation for its decision to renounce nuclear weapons in 2003." He "said the failure by the West to reward Libya meant Iran and North Korea were reluctant to follow Tripoli's lead. He insisted there would be no return to the confrontation of the past, however."

Sudanese President Backs UN Darfur Force In Writing. The AP (3/2, Olson) carries a diplomatic statement that Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir "is sending a letter to Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon expressing his commitment to the deployment of several thousand U.N. peacekeepers to help end the violence in Darfur." The AP says that "deployment would be the second step of a three-stage U.N. plan that would culminate in a 22,000-strong joint UN-African Union peacekeeping mission." Bashir "has given conflicting signals about his commitment to the plan, and Ban asked him earlier this year to state his acceptance of the second phase in writing." Yesterday, "the U.S. State Department called on both Sudan and the United Nations to speed up the deployment of the full joint AU-UN force." Assistant Secretary McCormack "issued the appeal as U.S presidential envoy Andrew Natsios arrived in Sudan's capital, Khartoum, for a 10-day visit that will include stops in the western Darfur region and southern Sudan." McCormack "said the U.S. administration is not satisfied with the yearlong U.N. time frame for the deployment and that not enough countries are pledging troops for the mission."

Oil Could Aid Rebuilding But May Delay Peace. On its front page, the Los Angeles Times (3/3, Sanders, 850K) discusses the short- and long-term challenges of likely oil deposits beneath Darfur. "While exploration may bring needed investment in Sudan, some say it only exacerbates the fighting." Khartoum "is quietly escalating oil exploration inside the Darfur region, a step that has led to protests from rebel leaders in a volatile area where more than 200,000 people have been killed during three years of fighting." The Times adds that some experts believe the "untapped oil reserves might have been an underlying factor in the Darfur conflict all along, explaining why a seemingly barren wasteland of western Sudan would spark such a bitter tug of war between government forces and rebels, eventually drawing the intervention of international players such as the United States, Libya and the United Nations."

Morocco Promises Western Sahara Autonomy Plan Next Month. The AP (3/2, Thorne) reports a statement by a key Moroccan official that Rabat "will present an autonomy plan for Western Sahara to the United Nations next month in hopes of ending a three-decade conflict that has stranded 160,000 refugees in the Sahara." Khalihenna Ould Errachid, King Mohamed VI's "chief adviser" on the Western Sahara, said the "plan would give the disputed region a parliament, a chief of state, Cabinet ministries and a judiciary that would oversee day-to-day life." Rabat "says autonomy is the only way to end a conflict with the Polisario Front, an Algerian-backed independence movement" that "insists on holding a referendum on independence." The AP says the "stalled conflict has left refugees in bleak camps in the Algerian Sahara, poisoned relations between Morocco and Algeria, and inflicts heavy costs on Morocco, already struggling with widespread poverty and unemployment."

Former Official Lauds Moroccan Plan. In an op-ed in today's New York Times (3/3, A15, 1.16M), former Deputy Assistant Secretary of State and Ambassador Frederick Vreeland says the status quo "has envenomed relations among its neighbors and immiserated the Saharan population." Mohammed VI's proposal "is a rare instance, in the post-9/11 world, in which a little encouragement from the United States and other nations could pay large dividends, fostering not only a final resolution for the region's refugees but also creating a stable North African peace for the first time in decades — a peace that would serve as a bulwark against Islamic extremism." The US "must be forthright in its support for the Moroccan proposal. We would be aiding a modernizing, moderate Islamic country, and a strategic ally. More urgently and no less important, we would be helping the Western Sahara's people to regain their lost liberties and their right to peaceful existence."

Morocco Sentences Eight In Terror Attacks. The New York Times (3/3, A7, Smith, 1.16M) carries Moroccan state-run media reports that "a Moroccan court on Friday sentenced eight Islamists to prison terms of up to 15 years for plotting terrorist attacks in France, Italy and Morocco."

Tehran-Caracas Weekly Flights Highlight Alliance. A brief New York Times (3/3, A7, Romero, 1.16M) piece notes, "Iran is already Venezuela's closest ally outside Latin America, with ventures to produce oil and build cars and tractors together. Now, travelers between the countries can also take a weekly flight between Caracas and Tehran." The joint Conviasa-Iran Air flight "includes a stop in Damascus." The Times adds that Caracas "has tightened relations with Iran and expressed explicit support for its uranium enrichment program. … Venezuela is considering extending its economic cooperation agreements to the military sphere. It is discussing a venture with Iran to produce remotely piloted aircraft that could be used for surveillance along the border with Colombia."

Haitian Juvenile Justice System Reflects Nation's Poverty. A 1,600-word front-page Washington Post (3/3, Roig-Franzia, 690K) piece today examines the plight of imprisoned Haitian youth, which "reflects a country overwhelmed by the problems of its young -- more than 200,000 Haitian children have lost one or both parents to AIDS and 300,000 work as unpaid domestic servants in a system of bonded servitude, according to the U.N. Children's Fund."

Putin Ally Ratified To Lead Chechnya. An extensive AP (3/2, Sadulayev) piece notes the Chechen

Parliament "approved a widely feared former security chief as president of the war-battered Russian republic in a nearly unanimous vote Friday, a day after President Vladimir Putin nominated him." Ramzan Kadyrov's "nomination won 56 votes in the 58-member, two-chamber legislature, with two ballots ruled invalid." The AP notes that "human rights groups allege that security forces under Kadyrov's control abduct and torture civilians suspected of ties to Chechnya's separatist rebels. Some observers suggest he was tied to last year's murder of Anna Politkovskaya, a journalist who had reported extensively on Chechnya's wars and sufferings." Kadyrov "is credited with a reconstruction boom that he administered as the region's prime minister, under which the capital, Grozny, is being transformed from a moonscape of rubble and shattered buildings in a region devastated by two separatist wars since the Soviet collapse." Kadyrov "has been at the heart of a Kremlin strategy to crush continued rebel resistance and establish order in the mostly Muslim region."

Under the headline, "Chechnya's Reins In Strongman's Hands," the Los Angeles Times (3/3, Holley, 850K) calls Kadyrov "a Kremlin-backed strongman who has spearheaded efforts to pacify war-battered Chechnya through a mix of repression and economic reconstruction." He "expressed his appreciation and loyalty to Putin in televised remarks Friday, declaring that 'there is support and understanding from the supreme commander in chief, and it only remains to serve him hand and foot.'"

WPost Calls Kadyrov A "Gangster President." Under the headline "Gangster President," the Washington Post (3/3, A14, 690K) editorializes, "This week Vladimir Putin delivered another clear message about the kind of state Russia is becoming. He did so by nominating" Kadyrov, who "has done Mr. Putin a great service: Using his own militia -- gang might be a better term -- he has imposed order in the name of the Kremlin on most of the rebellious republic, allowing the Russian president to declare victory in the war he started more than seven years ago. The Chechen's reward is to be installed as official head of the republic's government, where he can be expected to promote a cult of personality, employ state resources for his personal aggrandizement and murder his opponents with impunity."

Ex-Ambassador Decries Congressional Resolution On Armenian Genocide. In an op-ed in today's Wall Street Journal (3/3, A8, 2.04M), Brookings Institution scholar and former US Ambassador Mark Parris says congressional passage of an Armenian genocide resolution "will be a train wreck with an important, longstanding American ally: Turkey." This year is "a particularly sensitive moment in Turkish politics," with key government institutions possibly "inclined to loosen the strict barriers set up by Ataturk between religion and state." In addition, 2007 "will highlight the country's pivotal geography and relevance to U.S. strategic goals," including Iraq, Iran and energy policy. Turkey "goes into this defining year with its anchors to the West drifting or under strain. … The responsible choice for Congress's current leadership is to join their predecessors in concluding that passage of an Armenian genocide resolution does not serve American interests."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Growing Calls In Australia For Terror Suspect's Return (NYT)

By Raymond Bonner

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

SYDNEY, Australia, Saturday, March 3 — The decision by the United States military to charge an Australian citizen, David Hicks, with one terrorism-related offense comes as Prime Minister John Howard is under mounting pressure, even from conservatives in his own party, to have Mr. Hicks charged, tried and brought home.

Mr. Hicks is the first detainee from the American base at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, to be charged under the Military Commissions Act of 2006. But the single charge, of providing "material support for terrorism," after Mr. Hicks has been held for five years in Guantánamo, has been met with skepticism, disbelief and some anger here, from conservatives and liberals alike.

The charge, which was announced by the Pentagon in Washington on Thursday, represents a substantial reduction in the case the Bush administration has claimed it has against Mr. Hicks, a high-school dropout who was captured in Afghanistan after the American invasion in 2001.

Only two weeks ago, the American ambassador to Australia, Robert D. McCallum Jr., described the Guantánamo detainees as "ruthless fanatics who would kill Australians and Americans without blinking an eye."

Mr. Hicks was initially charged with conspiracy to commit murder and engage in acts of terrorism, attempted murder and aiding the enemy. That was later reduced to attempted murder and "providing material support for terrorism."

Now all those charges, except material support, have been dropped, and there is a question if even that will stick. Mr. Hicks's lawyers argue that material support was not made a crime until 2006, five years after Mr. Hicks trained with Al Qaeda.

The relatively minor, single charge after such a long detention "means they've botched it," said Barnaby Joyce, a federal senator for Australia's conservative National Party, which is part of the governing coalition. "They've completely abused the process of justice."

Mr. Joyce is one of an increasing number of conservative politicians and others who have joined the Bring David Hicks Home movement, which has gained considerable momentum here in the last few months.

In fact, the case has generated such political outrage that members of Mr. Howard's own center-right Liberal Party acknowledge that it is hurting the prime minister in his bid for re-election this year.

For nearly five years, Mr. Howard, one of President Bush's most stalwart supporters, was generally content to allow Mr. Hicks to remain in Guantánamo. But in recent weeks, he has been forced to take account of the strong shift in public opinion around the case, which has become a major irritant in American-Australian relations.

Last month, Mr. Howard raised the Hicks case directly with President Bush in a telephone call, and again with Vice President Dick Cheney when he was here last week.

Whether the charge finally leveled against Mr. Hicks was "the result of my representations to President Bush and Vice President Cheney, I don't know," Mr. Howard told Australian journalists on Friday, as reported by the BBC.

It is an issue that Mr. Hicks's lawyers are expected to explore, for if there was any influence of this kind on the bringing of the charge, it could result in the case being dismissed.

Mr. Hicks's lawyers are in any case certain to challenge the charge on the grounds that there was no such crime when Mr. Hicks was training with Al Qaeda in Afghanistan in 2001. The United States Constitution prohibits ex post facto laws, but in light of recent laws passed by Congress and various court rulings, it is not certain that Mr. Hicks will be afforded that protection.

The next probable step is that the United States government will try to get Mr. Hicks to plead guilty to this single charge, in exchange for a sentence of time served. That would have him back in Australia soon. Australian officials said this would be acceptable.

The groundswell of support for Mr. Hicks here does not arise because Australians believe that he is innocent, but rather because many here believe he has been denied justice by having been held so long without a regular trial.

"He may well be a rat bag, but even rat bags deserve their day in court," is how Senator Joyce put it.

"It is about due process of law, the principles we are fighting for in Iraq," he added in an interview. "In fighting the barbarians, we are starting to imitate the barbarians."

According to American and Australian officials, Mr. Hicks trained with Al Qaeda in Afghanistan, but officials have said he did not fire any shots during the war.

Described by one Australian police official as a "lost soul," Mr. Hicks was a kangaroo skinner in the Australian outback, went to Japan to train horses, and joined the Kosovo Liberation Army, which had the support of NATO in the war against Slobodan Milosevic.

Back in Australia, he tried unsuccessfully to enlist in the army. He joined an evangelical church, but eventually converted to Islam and went to Pakistan. There, he first joined up with Lashkar-e-Taiba, which was not declared a terrorist organization by the United States or Australia until the last week of 2001.

He was picked up by Afghan irregulars and turned over to the American troops for a ransom of several thousand dollars, according to his father, Terry Hicks, a printer by trade.

Mr. Hicks, an online organization, GetUp!, and his son's military lawyer, Maj. Michael Mori, have campaigned with increasing success to bring the case to light.

Often guided by liberal organizations like the Center for Constitutional Rights in New York, which has represented several Guantánamo detainees, Mr. Hicks kept his son's case alive with stunts, such as standing in a make-shift cage in the center of New York.

GetUp!, which is patterned after MoveOn.org, a liberal online organization in the United States, a few months ago hung a huge sign — "Bring David Hicks Home" — on the side of an office building at the entrance to the famed Sydney Harbor Bridge, which is passed every day by thousands of motorists commuting to work.

To the surprise of the organization, within 72 hours, it collected 150,000 Australian dollars, about $118,000, for the cause. Altogether, it has raised at least $196,500, said Brett Simpson, the organization's executive director.

Major Mori has made seven trips here, always in his tightly pressed Marine Corps uniform. Initially, Australians were skeptical that a military man would put up a vigorous defense. Since then, he has become something of a folk hero here, drawing large crowds around the country.

Some American Embassy officials sought unsuccessfully to have the Pentagon bar Major Mori from coming to Australia, said an American official who was granted anonymity in order to reveal information that has not been made public.

The combined public relations strategy has recently gained traction. For nearly five years, the opposition center-left Labor Party stayed far away from the Hicks case, as did the Australian news media. In the first nine months of 2006, there were 63 mentions of David Hicks in The Australian, according to the paper's researchers; in the last five months, there have been 255.

The list of public leaders calling for David Hicks to be given an expeditious and fair trial has grown steadily longer and includes those from the Labor Party.

In January the director of military prosecutions in the Australian Army, Brig. Gen. Lyn McDade, called Mr. Hicks's detention "abominable."

"I don't care what he's done or alleged to have done," General McDade, a former prosecutor, told The Sydney Morning Herald. "I think he's entitled to a trial, and a fair one."

Appellate Judges Uphold Dismissal Of CIA Lawsuit (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

A federal appeals court yesterday upheld the dismissal of the case of a German citizen who says he was wrongfully imprisoned by the CIA. Khaled al-Masri had sued former CIA director George J. Tenet and 10 unnamed CIA officials in U.S. District Court in Alexandria. Sources have said that Masri was held by the CIA for five months in Afghanistan because of mistaken identity.

U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III last year sided with the Justice Department, which invoked a state-secrets privilege to argue for dismissing the lawsuit. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit upheld Ellis's decision.

I Am Not A State Secret (LAT)

By Khaled El-masri, Khaled El-masri, A German Citizen Born In Lebanon, Was A Car Salesman Before He Was Detained In Dece

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

Having just lost in court, a CIA kidnap victim asks why the U.S. won't admit its error.

ON NEW YEAR'S EVE in 2003, I was seized at the border of Serbia and Macedonia by Macedonian police who mistakenly believed that I was traveling on a false German passport. I was detained incommunicado for more than three weeks. Then I was handed over to the American Central Intelligence Agency and was stripped, severely beaten, shackled, dressed in a diaper, injected with drugs, chained to the floor of a plane and flown to Afghanistan, where I was imprisoned in a foul dungeon for more than four months.

Long after the American government realized that I was an entirely innocent man, I was blindfolded, put back on a plane, flown to Europe and left on a hilltop in Albania — without any explanation or apology for the nightmare that I had endured.

My story is well known. It has been described in literally hundreds of newspaper articles and television news programs — many of them relying on sources within the U.S. government. It has been the subject of numerous investigations and reports by intergovernmental bodies, including the European Parliament. Most recently, prosecutors in my own country of Germany are pursuing indictments against 13 CIA agents and contractors for their role in my kidnapping, abuse and detention. Although I never could have imagined it, and certainly never wished it, I have become the public face of the CIA's "extraordinary rendition" program.

Why, then, does the American government insist that my ordeal is a state secret? This is something beyond my comprehension. In December 2005, with the help of the American Civil Liberties Union, I sued former CIA Director George Tenet along with other CIA agents and contractors for their roles in my kidnapping, mistreatment and arbitrary detention. Above all, what I want from the lawsuit is a public acknowledgment from the U.S. government that I was innocent, a mistaken victim of its rendition program, and an apology for what I was forced to endure. Without this vindication, it has been impossible for me to return to a normal life.

The U.S. government does not deny that I was wrongfully kidnapped. Instead, it has argued in court that my case must be dismissed because any litigation of my claims will expose state secrets and jeopardize American security, even though President Bush has told the world about the CIA's detention program, and even though my allegations have been corroborated by eyewitnesses and other evidence. To my amazement and dismay, last May, a federal district court judge agreed with the government and threw out my case. And then Friday, the U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals upheld that decision. It seems that the only place in the world where my case cannot be discussed is in a U.S. courtroom.

I did not bring this lawsuit to harm America. I brought the lawsuit because I want to know why America harmed me. I don't understand why the strongest nation on Earth believes that acknowledging a mistake will threaten its security. Isn't it more likely that showing the world that America cannot give justice to an innocent victim of its anti-terror policies will cause harm to America's image and security around the world?

IN NOVEMBER, I traveled to America for the first time to hear my lawyers argue my case before the appeals court in Richmond, Va. and to meet with members of Congress and their staff on Capitol Hill. (It's obvious that the U.S. government does not consider me a security threat, or I would not have been allowed to enter the country, much less be in the same room with federal judges and members of Congress.)

Although I did not understand all of the arguments made by the lawyers, I was impressed by the dignity of the proceedings and by the respect for the rule of law that I have always associated with America. I'm deeply disappointed to find that this same legal system denies me the chance to fully present my case.

If I were being treated fairly by the American legal system, perhaps we would not have reached the point where German prosecutors are bringing criminal charges against American citizens.

During my visit in November, many Americans offered me their personal apologies for the brutality that had been perpetrated against me in their name. I saw in their faces the true America, an America that is not held captive by fear of unknown enemies and that understands the strength and power of justice. That is the America that, I hope, one day will see me as a human being — not a state secret.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush To Visit Tornado-damaged Areas (AP)

AP, March 3, 2007

WHITE HOUSE (AP) -- President Bush heads to Alabama today to visit areas damaged by this week's vicious storms and deadly tornadoes.

Among his stops will be the the high school where eight students were killed Thursday when a twister demolished their school.

The president told reporters at the White House yesterday he's making the trip "with a heavy heart." He said he knows "full well" that he'll see people whose lives have been "turned upside down." The president's asking Americans to pray for the victims and their families.

At least 20 people were killed in the storms that ripped through Alabama, Georgia and Missouri. Federal emergency teams were sent to damaged areas immediately after the storm. The administration is hoping to draw a pointed contrast to it's sluggish response after Hurricane Katrina.

Bush Reaches Out To Tornado-Struck Areas (AP)

WASHINGTON - President Bush offered condolences to victims of violent storms and tornadoes that roared through several Southern states and said he would visit stricken areas on Saturday "with a heavy heart."

Bush told reporters at the White House Friday that he had spoken to Alabama Gov. Bob Riley on Thursday afternoon and Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue on Friday morning.

He said he told the governors he wanted to express "my personal condolences as well as the condolences of the nation for those who lost their lives in the recent tragedies in those two states."

Bush will visit areas hit by a violent storm system that spawned tornadoes that struck an Alabama high school, killing eight students.

The White House said Bush would make two stops on Saturday, but his destinations were still being worked out with governors in the affected states.

"I go down with a heavy heart," the president said. "I go down knowing full well that I'll be seeing people whose lives were turned upside down by the tornadoes. I'll do my very best to comfort them."

The burst of tornadoes was part of a line of thunderstorms and snowstorms that stretched from Minnesota to the Gulf Coast. Authorities blamed tornadoes for the deaths of a 7-year-old girl in Missouri, 10 people in Alabama and nine in Georgia, and twisters also damaged homes in Kansas.

"I ask our nation, for those who are prayerful, to give a prayer for the victims of the storms," Bush said.

He spoke on the South Lawn of the White House as he prepared to board his helicopter as part of an unrelated trip to Indiana and Kentucky.

Aaron Walker, a spokesman for the Federal Emergency Management Agency said that the Georgia governor was working on a disaster-aid request on Friday.

Some 14 FEMA preliminary disaster assessment teams are already at work in Alabama, he said.

New Orleans Files Claim Against Corps For Billions (NYT)

By Leslie Eaton

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

The City of New Orleans filed a $77 billion damage claim against the federal government on Thursday, joining thousands of residents who have flocked to the Army Corps of Engineers seeking compensation for their losses after Hurricane Katrina in 2005.

The corps, which built and helped maintain much of the levee system that failed, has not tallied the number of claims or the total amount of money sought. It received 30,500 forms by late last month, a spokeswoman for the agency, Kathy Gibbs, said.

The filings that arrived last week “pretty much filled an 8-by-10 room, floor to ceiling,” Ms. Gibbs said.

The forms run two pages, with some including additional paperwork, she said.

The claims were in part prompted by a ruling last month by a federal judge that raised the possibility that suits against the corps could proceed. Normally, federal law does not allow suits for damages resulting from the failures of flood-control projects.

But on Feb. 2, Judge Stanwood R. Duval Jr. of Federal District Court in New Orleans ruled that at least one flooding source, the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet, might be considered a navigation channel and not a flood-control project.

Critics of the corps faulted the outlet, known as Mr. Go, for much of the flooding in eastern New Orleans. The corps has disputed that, but last year it announced a plan to close the channel to navigation.

Similar suits are under way on other canals and channels that flooded. Lawyers representing people who have sued the corps for negligence had urged residents to file claims by March 1 to preserve their rights in case the judge found the corps liable for property damage and personal injuries under maritime law.

The city did not explain how it came up with the $77 billion figure, and it did not respond to a request for more information. The New Orleans Sewerage and Water Board filed a claim for $470 million, said Robert Jackson, a spokesman for the board.

New Orleans Files Katrina Claim (LAT)

By Ann M. Simmons

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

The city is seeking $77 billion from the Army Corps of Engineers.

NEW ORLEANS — With a $77-billion claim, the city of New Orleans led tens of thousands of homeowners and businesses seeking compensation from the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers for losses suffered when levees protecting the city ruptured under the storm surge of Hurricane Katrina.

Kathleen Gibbs, a spokeswoman in the corps' New Orleans district office, said that by Monday at least 34,500 claims had arrived by mail. And the bags and boxes filled with forms from residents who rushed to file before the Thursday midnight deadline could fill an 8-by-10-foot room.

"This is obviously a very significant and very emotional situation for many people," Gibbs said.

Many claimants argue that their properties survived the actual hurricane, but were flooded when the city's flood walls failed because of shoddy construction and corps negligence.

Lawyers said the number of claims could top 100,000. Forms were accepted at corps offices nationwide.

"It is important and necessary for people to let the Army Corps of Engineers and Congress know that they expect to receive compensation," said Joseph Bruno, a New Orleans lawyer who is leading a team of attorneys for hurricane victims. "The debate is simple: You broke it, you fix it."

Claims have run from thousands of dollars to the $77 billion that the city is pursuing.

New Orleans officials did not specify the damages to be covered, but in a statement, City Atty. Penya Moses-Fields said the claim was "prudent at this stage to file."

Entergy New Orleans, the city's electrical utility that went bankrupt after Katrina, is seeking $655 million in damages and losses, and New Orleans Sewerage and Water is trying to recoup about $460 million.

The corps has argued that the 1928 Flood Control Act gives it immunity from lawsuits. But last month, a U.S. District Court judge ruled that such protection is void in cases concerning navigational projects.

The claimants contend that the Mississippi River-Gulf Outlet and the 17th Street drainage canal, which caused much of the flooding, are navigation waterways.

Veda Manuel — whose home, along with her bicycle- and kayak-tour business in the city's Bayou St. John neighborhood, was destroyed by Katrina — said no amount of money could undo the trauma she and other residents have endured.

"The amount of chaos, uncertainty and disturbance … money will never compensate for that. But they must claim responsibility," said Manuel, 50, who is renovating her home using savings and help from friends. She would not disclose the size of her claim.

"Time stopped for us" the moment the levees broke, Manuel said. "I lost an entire year of my life."

WAR NEWS:

14 Iraqi Policemen Kidnapped, Killed (AP)

AP, March 2, 2007

BAGHDAD (AP) — The bodies of 14 policemen were found Friday northeast of Baghdad after an al-Qaeda-affilated Sunni group said it abducted members of a government security force in retaliation for the rape of a Sunni woman by members of the Shiite-dominated police.

Brig. Gen. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, an Interior Ministry spokesman, said the bodies were discovered Friday afternoon in Diyala province. The policemen were kidnapped Thursday on their way to their homes in Diyala for leave, he said.

Earlier Friday, the Islamic State of Iraq said in a Web statement that it seized 18 Interior Ministry employees in Diyala in retaliation for "the crimes carried out ... against the Sunnis," including the alleged rape last month of a Sunni woman by policemen in Baghdad.

In a second statement, the group announced that its "court" had ordered the "execution" of the men and that a video depicting their deaths would be posted later, according to the SITE Institute, which monitors extremist websites.

Photos accompanied the claim, showing up to 18 blindfolded men, seven of them wearing Iraqi military uniforms. All had their hands tied behind their backs.

But Khalaf cast doubt on whether the 14 slain policemen were the same men shown on the website photos.

"We found the 14 policemen's bodies, but they are not those who are in the fabricated images on the website," he told The Associated Press. "The Diyala police told us that they don't know who those people shown on the web site were."

Nevertheless, he blamed al-Qaeda for the killings and said Iraqi authorities would "chase those who assassinated these unarmed people."

Also Friday, two U.S. soldiers and an interpreter were killed by a roadside bomb northwest of Baghdad as they were trying to clear a highway of explosives.

The military also announced that a U.S. Marine was killed two days before in combat in Anbar province, a Sunni insurgent area west of the capital.

The Islamic State of Iraq had threatened to kill the hostages within 24 hours if the Iraqi government did not hand over officers accused in the rape case, and release all Sunni women held in Iraqi prisons.

"This blessed operation is a response to crimes carried out by those infidels in their fight against the Sunnis," the statement said. "The latest of the crimes committed by these traitors was to rape our sister in religion."

A 20-year-old woman told Arab television stations that she was detained in a Sunni area of west Baghdad on Feb. 18, taken to a police garrison and assaulted by three officers. The woman gave a name which identified her as Sunni.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, announced an investigation Feb. 19 but cleared the officers the following day, stirring outrage among Sunni politicians.

Al-Maliki said the rape claim was fabricated to tarnish the reputation of the police and the ongoing security crackdown in Baghdad.

Friday's statement from the Islamic State of Iraq referred to the rape victim by her name, which identified her as Sunni.

However, officials of the Iraqi Islamic Party, the country's largest Sunni group, said the woman used a false name and that she is in fact a Shiite. The party's human rights office had been looking into the case.

Names of the officers involved in the case were not released, and it was unknown whether they were Sunni or Shiite.

In Baghdad, two car bombs killed at least 11 people in attacks Friday. The deadlier occurred at a used car lot near the Shiite militia stronghold of Sadr City, killing 10 people, wounding 17 and setting several cars ablaze, police said.

The other blast was near a police patrol in southwest Baghdad, killing a policeman and wounding two civilians, police reported.

The U.S. military also said Friday that eight suspected militants were killed a day earlier in a raid in Salman Pak, a town just southeast of Baghdad where Sunni and Shiite extremists have frequently clashed.

U.S. forces came under small-arms and mortar fire, and killed three armed men moving toward them, the statement said. Twenty minutes later, troops were fired on again and shot dead four suspects. Another man was killed in a vehicle nearby, the statement said.

Sniper rifles, AK-47s and rocket-propelled grenade launchers were removed from the scene, it added.

In Fallujah, 45 miles west of Baghdad, residents reported finding handbills warning local tribes to abandon checkpoints they had established to detain members of al-Qaeda. The handbills said al-Qaeda would retaliate if they checkpoints remain.

The warning followed reports by Iraqi police of clashes between al-Qaeda members and local residents opposed to the extremist group.

A roadside bomb exploded near an Iraqi army patrol 150 miles southeast of Baghdad, killing one soldier, police said.

Bodies Of 14 Iraqi Police Officers Found (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis,

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

One group said it had kidnapped security forces to avenge an alleged rape.

BAGHDAD — The bodies of 14 missing police officers were found near a school in Diyala province Friday after a group linked to Al Qaeda claimed to have kidnapped members of a government security force in retribution for the alleged rape of a Sunni Arab woman.

Police confirmed that the 14 men, members of a rapid-response unit, were found shot through the head with their hands tied behind their backs.

They disappeared Thursday on their way home on leave to the Shiite town of Khalis, police said. Because Sunni insurgents regularly target members of the Shiite-dominated security forces in the province, the men had taken pains to travel inconspicuously, wearing civilian clothes and riding in sedans.

It was unclear whether the officers were among the 18 blindfolded men pictured earlier on a website by a group calling itself the Islamic State in Iraq. Those men were standing and kneeling in rows with their hands tied behind their backs. Some were in civilian clothes, others in combat fatigues, and at least one wore the insignia of an Iraqi officer.

At least three Diyala officers, who said they were relatives and neighbors of the slain men, could not identify any of the people shown on the website, said Maj. Raul Marquez, a U.S. military spokesman in Baqubah, the capital of Diyala province.

"The quality of the photo was low, so it is very difficult to pull out details," Marquez said by e-mail.

A statement on the site claimed the men were seized in Diyala, but it did not specify when.

"This blessed operation is a response to the crimes committed by those infidels in their fight against the Sunnis," the statement said. "The latest crime committed by these treacherous institutions was to rape our sister Sabreen."

The group threatened to kill the men within 24 hours if the government did not hand over the responsible officers and release all Sunni women in Interior Ministry prisons.

A second statement said that the government had failed to respond to the group's demands and that its court had "ordered God's verdict applied."

Brig. Gen. Abdul Karim Khalaf, a spokesman for the Interior Ministry, said the government did not negotiate with hostage-takers. He cast doubt on the group's claims.

"We can't trust the Internet sites, and those pictures might not be authentic," he said. "Anyone can make a website and put any claim they want on it."

Last week, a 20-year-old woman who called herself Sabreen alleged in a television interview that she had been raped by three Shiite officers.

The woman's tearful claims sparked outrage. Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, who has promised an evenhanded effort to quell the nation's sectarian fighting, ordered an investigation. But within 24 hours, the Shiite premier had rejected the allegations, labeling the woman a liar and insurgent collaborator wanted by the authorities.

The government's handling of the case heightened sectarian tensions and deepened Sunnis' mistrust of the security forces, which authorities acknowledge have been infiltrated by Shiite militias. A second Sunni woman later emerged claiming that soldiers raped her during a raid of her home in the city of Tall Afar.

In a third statement posted Friday, the Islamic State of Iraq group declared it was launching an "honor revenge" campaign and threatened to kill 2,000 police and militiamen "for each sister that was violated."

The grisly find in Diyala province underscored fears that as U.S. and Iraqi forces focus their attention on Baghdad, violence could escalate elsewhere.

The troubled capital has seen an apparent dip in the execution-style killings that are the hallmark of Shiite death squads since thousands of extra troops started pouring into the streets last month. But the stream of bombings typically associated with Sunni insurgents has continued.

At least four bombs exploded in and around Baghdad on Friday, killing 13 Iraqis and injuring dozens. Two U.S. soldiers and an interpreter were also reported killed and another soldier injured in one of the blasts.

One of the bombs exploded in an area of used-car dealerships on the edge of Sadr City, a vast, mostly Shiite district of east Baghdad and a stronghold of the powerful Al Mahdi militia loyal to radical anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr. The blast killed 10 people and injured 17, police said.

U.S. and Iraqi officials, wary of previous confrontations with Al Mahdi militiamen, have avoided major operations in Sadr City, fueling Sunni distrust of the security clampdown that began Feb. 13. But they have said they are nearing agreement with community leaders on plans to establish a permanent presence in the district.

Brig. Gen. Joseph Anderson, chief of staff of Multinational Corps-Iraq, said he expected construction to begin on a joint U.S.-Iraqi security station in Sadr City in the next week.

"That will be the initial footprint, if you will, in Sadr City to begin further operations before increased patrols and those type of things occur, all within a month for sure," Anderson told journalists at the Pentagon by video link from Iraq.

A car bomb targeted a police patrol in a religiously mixed district of southwest Baghdad, killing one officer and injuring three, police said.

South of the capital, a roadside bomb killed two civilians and injured 10 in Sunni-dominated Latifiya, police said.

The two U.S. soldiers and interpreter who died were the victims of an explosive device detonated during a road-clearing patrol northwest of the capital, the military said. At least 3,166 U.S. personnel have been killed since the start of the Iraq war in 2003, according to the website icasualties.org, which tracks military casualties.

Police recovered at least five bodies in Baghdad, apparent victims of sectarian death squads. Another body was found shot execution-style in Iskandariya, south of the capital, police said.

Sunni Insurgents Ascendant In Iraq's Caldron Of Violence (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

14 Police Officers Found Shot to Death After Call for Retribution in Rape Case

BAGHDAD, March 2 -- In the photos, the 18 men were blindfolded, their hands tied behind their backs. They appeared Friday on the Web site of a Sunni insurgent group that said it had kidnapped the men to avenge the alleged rape of a Sunni woman by members of Iraq's Shiite-dominated police force.

The Islamic State of Iraq said on its site that it had demanded Thursday that the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki hand over the accused policemen and free all female prisoners within 24 hours.

On Friday, officials found the bodies of 14 policemen in Diyala province east of Baghdad. All had been shot in the head.

"The government did not give any importance to their blood," the Islamic State of Iraq said. A government official said he doubted the dead were the men in the photos.

More than two weeks into a new Baghdad security plan, Sunni insurgents are asserting responsibility for an increasing number of violent attacks against U.S. and Iraqi security forces and civilian targets, while Shiite militias are lowering their profile.

In recent months, al-Qaeda in Iraq and other Sunni groups have begun to use more sophisticated tactics, downing U.S. helicopters and staging large attacks that have claimed the lives of hundreds of Iraqi civilians.

Meanwhile, the Mahdi Army, the largest and most violent Shiite militia, headed by anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, has faded from neighborhoods it once visibly controlled. Sadr, whose forces have fiercely battled U.S. troops, appears to be cooperating with the security plan, although a statement attributed to him and released Sunday warned that the plan "will not be good if it is controlled and ruled by our enemies, the occupiers."

Mahdi Army militiamen "have certainly reduced their activities in the past couple of weeks," said Lt. Col. Scott Bleichwehl, a U.S. military spokesman. "What is their long-term intention? It is absolutely too early to tell."

The total number of attacks has fallen since mid-February, U.S. and Iraqi officials say. But the resurgence of Sunni militants may represent a change in the dynamics of violence in the capital.

After the February 2006 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra and the killing of al-Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in June, Shiite militias were blamed for many of the atrocities. U.S. officials viewed them as a bigger threat than Sunni insurgents. Dismantling the power of the Shiite militias became a primary goal of the current security plan.

Sunni insurgents say they have downed at least six U.S. helicopters since Jan. 20. Since the Feb. 14 launch of the security plan, the largest attacks, purportedly by al-Qaeda in Iraq or other Sunni insurgents, have targeted Shiite-controlled areas or U.S. troops.

They include two car bombings that killed at least 60 people in a crowded market in the mostly Shiite area of New Baghdad on Feb. 18. The next day, insurgents staged a brazen assault on an American military outpost, killing three U.S. soldiers and injuring 29 in the town of Tarmiyah, 19 miles north of Baghdad.

A suicide bomber detonated an explosives belt Feb. 25 at Baghdad's Mustansiriya University, where most students are Shiite, killing dozens.

In Sunni-dominated Anbar province, insurgents allied with al-Qaeda in Iraq have clashed with security forces and Sunni tribal groups that oppose them. One such battle occurred Wednesday.

And in a new tactic, insurgents recently have blown up trucks containing chlorine, killing seven and injuring dozens.

On Friday, a car bomb detonated in the Mahdi Army stronghold of Sadr City, killing 10 and injuring 17, the most serious attack in the area in several weeks.

U.S. officials say it is unclear whether Sunni insurgents are merely taking advantage of Sadr's decision to pull back his forces or whether they have embarked on a new strategy. Bleichwehl, the U.S. military spokesman, said an array of forces, including criminal elements, are fomenting the violence.

In Friday's Sadr City bombing, witnesses said the bomber drove the vehicle into a used-car market in the Habibiya neighborhood, parked and left. The car detonated just as potential customers gathered.

"We're tired from these ugly bombings," said Ali Abu Hisham, 34, who rushed to the scene when he heard the explosion. "We cannot stand anymore seeing bodies laying on the ground."

By then, in Diyala province, the bodies of the policemen had been found.

About 11 a.m. Thursday, the police officers had left their base in the provincial capital, Baqubah, about 35 miles north of Baghdad, and were returning to their homes near the town of Jdaidat al-Shat, near Baqubah, said 1st Lt. Fouad Ahmed of the Diyala police.

The insurgents, he said, forced the policemen to stop. "They got them out of their cars at gunpoint and took them to an unknown destination," Ahmed said.

Officials learned that the men had been kidnapped only after "the families started to report that their sons were missing," said Interior Ministry spokesman Abdul Kareem al-Kinani.

He added that he doubted that the 18 men shown on the Web site were among the slain policemen. "As for the pictures posted on the Net, we do not recognize the men in these photos. They could be fake pictures."

On Friday, the posting of the Islamic State of Iraq appeared. Nine photos showing the 18 men were displayed. Some of the men wore camouflage uniforms, while others were in civilian clothes.

The group warned that "God's verdict will be executed on them" if Iraq's "infidel government" does not comply with its demands.

The allegations of rape, rarely aired publicly in the Middle East, surfaced last week when a Sunni Arab woman went on television and accused three policemen of assaulting her. Maliki dismissed the allegations, causing a political uproar that widened the sectarian divide.

Also Friday, a roadside bomb killed two U.S. soldiers and an Iraqi interpreter northwest of Baghdad.

US, Iraqis To Build First Post In Sadr City This Week: US Military (AFP)

AFP, March 3, 2007

US forces will gain their first foothold in Baghdad's Sadr City this week, a fortified joint security station from which to patrol the stronghold of radical Shiite cleric Moqtada Sadr, a senior US military official said Friday.

Talks with the mayor of Sadr City are underway and the US military will begin building the security station this week in the populous Shiite district in east Baghdad, said Brigadier General Joseph Anderson.

"That will be the initial foot print in Sadr City to begin further operations for foot patrols and those types of things to occur. All within a month for sure," said Anderson, chief of staff of the Multi-National Forces-Iraq. He spoke to reporters here via video link from Baghdad.

The entry of US forces into Sadr City will be a key test of a new strategy to flood Baghdad with US and Iraq forces to break a cycle of sectarian violence that has engulfed it in chaos.

Sadr City's mayor Sheikh Rahim al-Daraji is close to Moqtada Sadr, but Anderson said the talks have gone well.

"To the surprise of all of us the mayor has been very cooperative, and there is good dialogue going on the future operations and security of Sadr City, which if you'd asked us a month ago we probably wouldn't have thought that," he said.

Daraji said in a telephone interview with AFP earlier that agreement had been reached with US and Iraqi commanders on technical details of the Baghdad security plan, and that a joint security station would begin operating March 13.

He said the fortified stations would be located at the entrance to Sadr City.

But Daraji said there would be no cooperation with a special US-Iraqi unit that has been conducting arrests.

Anderson said levels of violence have subsided but there are still Shiite militia attacks, primarily with armor piercing explosives that the US has charged are coming into the country from Iran.

He estimated that attacks in Baghdad, which typically run from 85 to 90 a day, are down about 10 to 20 a day, he said.

The district's unofficial name honors Moqtada Sadr's father, a prominent Shia cleric, Grand Ayatollah Mohammed Sadiq al-Sadr, who was was assassinated in 1999 -- almost certainly on the orders of former dictator Saddam Hussein.

An Iraqi Tribal Chief Opposes The Jihadists, And Prays (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

BAGHDAD, March 2 — The sheik stared at the cake that the hotel workers had brought up to his room as a gift. Across the red gelatinlike surface was written, “God protect you from the enemies and keep you for the Iraqi people.”

God is indeed his guardian, said the sheik, Abdul Sattar Buzaigh al-Rishawi. So were the three burly Iraqi men standing outside the door of his suite here in the Mansour Hotel, and the five others by the elevators at the end of the hall. They had walkie-talkies, Kalashnikov rifles and camouflage vests stuffed with ammunition clips.

The sheik needs as much protection as loyalty and prayers can bring, not to mention money. He is the public face of the Sunni Arab tribes in lawless Anbar Province who have turned against the Sunni jihadists of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, many of whom belong to other, sometimes more militant Iraqi tribes.

“I swear to God, if we have good weapons, if we have good vehicles, if we have good support, I can fight Al Qaeda all the way to Afghanistan,” he said recently as he sat smoking in a dark jacket and brown robes while meeting with a sheik from another Sunni tribe in his hotel room.

Sheik Abdul Sattar, a wiry 35-year-old with a thin goatee who comes from the provincial capital, Ramadi, is the most outspoken Sunni tribal figure in the country who is fighting, at least for now, on the side of the Shiite-led Iraqi government and the American military.

He has met three times with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki since announcing his campaign in September, and there is talk that the sheik has received large amounts of money from the Iraqi government or the Americans. His face has been shown in anti-insurgent commercials on the government-run Iraqiya television network.

But Sheik Abdul Sattar, as he is known to Iraqis and American commanders, complains that he does not get nearly enough financial or military support. “We don’t have enough weapons, cars, uniforms,” he said.

Part of the sheik’s mission is rooted in the tribal law of revenge. His father was killed by Al Qaeda in 2004 for opposing its kind of fundamentalism. Two brothers were abducted and never heard from again, and a third brother was shot dead, he said. He has survived three car bombs outside the home he shares with his wife and five children.

Residents in parts of Anbar say the split in the Sunni insurgency is widening, with moderate tribal leaders and nationalist guerrillas pitted against fundamentalist warriors and rival tribes. That has led to a sharp increase in Sunni-on-Sunni violence across Anbar, especially in the past week, deepening the chaos of Iraq’s civil war.

Al Qaeda remains a major force, and the relentless violence from all sides has turned the province into a failed region, according to a classified Marine intelligence assessment that was leaked to reporters last year.

As part of a broad review of options in Iraq, President Bush is looking at whether to give greater support to Sunni Arab tribal leaders who have grown disillusioned with the radical arm of the insurgency. It is a strategy long urged by officials in Sunni-dominated Saudi Arabia and now vigorously backed by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

The effort would have echoes of the American military's promotion of South Vietnamese "village militias" during the Vietnam War, which some American counterinsurgency experts say was a relative success.

Sheik Abdul Sattar and the Anbar Salvation Council, the group of 25 tribes that the sheik said he had helped pull together to fight Al Qaeda, would be central to any such move by the Americans.

The sheik said he and his allies, who also call themselves the Anbar Awakening, had recruited 6,000 fighters from the tribes into the Anbar police, helped appoint a new provincial police chief and formed a 2,500-member "emergency brigade" answering to him.

A United States Army civil affairs officer in Ramadi, Capt. Travis L. Patriquin, said in an e-mail message shortly before he was killed by a roadside bomb in Ramadi in December that the tribal fighters in the Iraqi police constituted "the first successful, large force of men we've had since the start of the war."

The captain wrote of Sheik Abdul Sattar, "He is the most effective local leader in Ramadi I believe the coalition has worked with since they arrived in Anbar in 2003."

Once the Anbar Salvation Council began its recruitment efforts, more than 300 people a month signed up to join the Iraqi police, up from just 30 in May, Captain Patriquin said. American commanders have armed the recruits with weapons, munitions and vehicles provided by the Iraqi Interior Ministry. The Americans have also taken the recruits to academies in Jordan or Baghdad for schooling and given them a week of specialized combat training at an American base in Ramadi.

The plan has risks. The Americans and governing Shiite parties could be building up a Sunni militia that will eventually turn against them, as one such group, the Falluja Brigade, did in 2004 after the Marines handed it control of Falluja.

Some moderate Sunni sheiks in Anbar have said that for purposes of survival, they might be forced to ally themselves with Al Qaeda if the American military and, in particular, the Shiite-led Iraqi government did not provide them with more money and weapons, given the powerful presence of Al Qaeda in the province.

Sheik Abdul Sattar speaks of the Iraqi government with ambivalence, praising its stated goals while criticizing its ties to Shiite militias and its ignorance of the power of the tribes.

"They're not cooperative, and they don't want security," he said. "This is true of all the political blocs."

He has been to Baghdad twice to ask senior Iraqi officials for financial backing and equipment. He has met with the prime minister and with Jawad al-Bolani, the interior minister. But he said Iraqi leaders here were reluctant to give him what he needed to fight Al Qaeda.

An adviser to the Iraqi cabinet on tribal affairs, Sheik Minahi Minshid Hussein al-Shammari, said the government had responded to Sheik Abdul Sattar's requests "within a limited capacity," because "this is what the government can give."

"The government extends a hand to anyone who wants to cooperate," he added.

The formation of the group in September shocked many Sunni Arabs. It was the most public stand anyone in Anbar had taken against Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, which was founded by the Jordanian militant Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. In November, Sheik Harith al-Dhari, the leader of the Muslim Scholars Association, a hard-line Sunni religious group that calls itself the "legitimate resistance," denounced the Anbar Salvation Council in a television interview, saying, "They don't represent the Anbar tribes, and they are a group of criminals and thugs."

Sheik Abdul Sattar said his tribe, the Rishawi, which accounts for a tenth of the 400,000 residents of Ramadi, had always tried to make peace with the Americans in Anbar. That was one reason his father was killed while attending a funeral more than two years ago, he said. Al Qaeda had begun killing sheiks and clerics, even selling videos of the crimes.

"They became people who didn't distinguish between right and wrong, and that's when we believed these people were terrorists," he said.

Recent violence in Anbar has underscored the brutality of the fighting among the Sunnis there.

Two soccer players in Ramadi had been shot dead in front of teammates by masked gunmen who had accused them of having ties to the Anbar Salvation Council. On Thursday, a car bomb in Falluja killed at least seven people in a policeman's wedding party, while intense fighting broke out in Amariyat, a community to the south where residents say tribes aligned with Al Qaeda have been battling nationalist insurgent groups.

A car bomb next to a Ramadi mosque killed 15 people on Monday, and a truck bomb exploded in Habbaniya on Feb. 24, killing at least 31 people and wounding dozens, outside a Sunni mosque where the imam had been preaching resistance to Al Qaeda.

In their clashes with Al Qaeda, the sheik's tribal fighters have captured about 80 militants and put them into a "prison" in Ramadi, the sheik said.

Saudis and Syrians were among them, he said. The Saudis, under interrogation, said they had been recruited in their home country by being shown anti-American propaganda, including images of prisoner abuse at Abu Ghraib, the sheik said. Then they were shipped off to Syria to enter Iraq.

The sheik has little love for the Syrian government. One morning as he ate breakfast in his hotel room, a television program about the assassination of the Lebanese cabinet member Pierre Gemayel on Nov. 21 came on. "This is all Syria's doing," he said. "Syria is doing bad things."

Just as nefarious is Iran, with its ties to the Shiite militias, Sheik Abdul Sattar said.

"In my personal opinion, and in the opinion of most of the wise men of Anbar, if the American forces leave right now, there will be civil war and the area will fall into total chaos," he said. "If we complete the police and the army, if we make them strong enough, it'll be possible for the American forces to leave and go home, and they'll be friends of the Iraqis."

The evening call to prayer echoed through the streets of Baghdad as he ended the talk. Darkness had fallen. The sheik got up to show two foreign visitors from his room, warning them that no one could ensure their safety at that hour.

Four of his men were shot dead while driving through the capital the previous day, he said, and they surely would not be the last.

Women At War Are Fighting To Serve (DMN)

By Gretel C. Kovach

The Dallas Morning News, March 3, 2007

Female troops take on combat role despite doubters

Rachael Franklin was a headstrong high school student, bright and athletic, when her mother finally gave up and called the military recruiter.

Grounding her hadn't forced her daughter to follow orders. So Mom turned to the U.S. Army.

"She thought I'd be a secretary or something," Capt. Franklin recalled, amused. "She should have known better."

Military women fire off far more than typewritten memos these days. And the battlefields of Iraq and Afghanistan have been their proving ground. More women than ever are close to combat or have actual combat roles, and the government and military leaders continue to struggle with the question of where and how to set limits.

Capt. Franklin, 27, is an Apache pilot, one of three female attack helicopter pilots who deployed to Iraq this fall with the 1st Cavalry Division's 1st Battalion, 227th Aviation Regiment based at Fort Hood, Texas.

The last of the division's 19,000 troops arrived in Iraq in December, following the Air Combat Aviation Brigade overseas for a second yearlong deployment in Iraq. The troopers relieved another Fort Hood unit, the 4th Infantry Division.

Capt. Franklin spent almost a decade preparing to fly one of the most ferocious weapons in the Army arsenal.

Now, in one of the few direct combat roles open to women, her mission in the skies over Baghdad is to stalk hostile forces threatening U.S. troops – and destroy them.

During a break from grueling pre-deployment training, Capt. Franklin climbed into the cockpit of an AH-64D and explained why she chose the Apache.

Other helicopters fly faster and carry more troops. But Apache pilots can dive up close to a target and unleash the fury of Hellfire missiles, rockets and 30 mm cannons.

"If you're going to go to war, you might as well go with the biggest guns," she said.

Though women are still barred from infantry and other ground combat units, this is the first war in which female U.S. troops have been authorized to shoot back. And they have – as helicopter gunners, military police, and even truck drivers forced to defend themselves on a battlefield with no clear frontlines.

Involved in all aspects

Lt. Col. Christopher Walach, the 1-227th's commanding officer, said female soldiers and leaders are integrated into every aspect of his battalion, from maintenance and support to administration and piloting of their fleet of Longbow Apache helicopters.

The women did "an absolutely outstanding job preparing themselves, their soldiers, and their equipment for combat," said Col. Walach, 40, of Las Vegas.

"But I look at all my aviators as aviators. We all receive the same training. We all perform at the same high level. It's immaterial, male or female," he said.

Today about 15 percent of the military is female. Advocates for women in the military say their contributions are vital as the armed forces struggle to keep pace with the demands of fighting two wars.

But the frontline service of these women has reignited another conflict – the battle on the home front between those who feel women soldiers should be entitled to the same opportunities as their male counterparts and those who believe the armed forces have already pushed them too far.

Congress debated legislation last year that would have barred women from ground combat support units. A compromise amendment signed into law this year required that the military get congressional approval before it makes changes that put women in new direct combat roles.

Retired Air Force Brig. Gen. Wilma Vaught said the Iraq War has forced the military to use female troops in new ways and has disproved some of the myths about how they would perform.

"It's the nature of the conflict and the size of the force we have deployed," said Gen. Vaught, president of the Women in Military Service for America Memorial Foundation. "We have to use everybody we've got."

Thrived in the military

Capt. Franklin, a tall, self-possessed young woman with freckles and eye shadow around her blue eyes, alternates between seriousness and giggles when she reflects on her career as a female attack helicopter pilot.

Her mother cried when she headed to basic training, rethinking her earlier enthusiasm. But Capt. Franklin thrived in the military.

She was selected for West Point and flight school, where she promptly chose the Apache.

"That was the most combat role I could do as a female. The most challenging, the most interesting," she said. "That's the main purpose of the Army, to fight. And being a female, you can't go infantry or armor, so you do the best you can."

Capt. Franklin said even some of her friends in the military are opposed to allowing women in ground combat units.

"Some of [their reasons] I agree with and some of them I think are bull," she said. "If you can handle the standards, you can handle it."

After what was generally seen as a positive performance by women in the Persian Gulf War, rules excluding women from jobs that directly exposed them to hostile fire or capture were rescinded. Women cannot serve in armor, Special Forces, field artillery or combat engineer units, but they can fly attack helicopters and attack aircraft that provide close air support for them.

Capt. Franklin's choice of aircraft carried a great responsibility, not just as a woman, but as a human being, she said – the responsibility to kill.

"You've got to take it seriously," she said. "Every single person who flies or even carries a weapon has to sit down and ask himself, 'Would I be willing to pull the trigger?'

"I decided I can."

More than 70 women service members have died in Iraq since the start of the war. Women have been captured. They have dragged wounded soldiers to safety. They have shot their way out of ambushes and earned the Silver Star for exceptional valor.

A greater loss?

Although many female troops insist that their lives are worth no more than the next man in uniform, the nation has grieved more deeply for the mothers, daughters, sisters and wives who became casualties of these wars.

And some women soldiers say the deaths of their female comrades have sometimes resulted in restrictions being placed on them.

Sgt. Tawana Varice, 35, of Natchitoches, La., a soft-spoken mother of two boys, joined the 1st Cavalry Division's 2nd Battalion, 5th Cavalry Regiment after the unit returned from Iraq. She was a truck driver, but was reassigned as a clerk.

A female truck driver had been killed in combat in Iraq, and the battalion commanders weren't eager to put another woman in harm's way, she said.

Eventually, Sgt. Varice went back to driving a truck, and she is now one of several female drivers in the battalion. But it took awhile for her commanders to relent.

"They were kind of shook up," she remembered.

Effect on military moms

Also of concern is the impact of repeat deployments on families and military moms, who account for about 35 percent of the 346,000 female troops serving in the active duty and reserves.

Some say the focus on military mothers is overstated because fathers are equally concerned about long family separations.

Others say the reality is that mothers carry more responsibility for home life, which makes it harder for them to serve in the military during a time of war.

"I think we do have other things to think about," said Capt. Kennon Etheridge, 27, of Milledgeville, Ga., a 1st Cavalry Division preventive medicine officer with a young stepson. "I think guys, maybe they can leave their families easier. Girls, they have to make other arrangements."

Many female soldiers wait to marry or have children until they leave the military. Others do their best to juggle the demands of service and home.

Spc. Holly Jensen, 30, of Copperas Cove said her biggest concern before deploying with III Corps 7th Mobile Public Affairs Detachment was lining up enough home improvement projects to keep her husband too busy to miss her during the year in Iraq.

"He was in the military, so he understands," she said.

Capt. Franklin, the Apache pilot, said she was looking forward to her first tour of duty in Iraq.

She'd lost a couple of friends already in the war. A few more were injured by roadside bombs.

"Now it's my turn to go and contribute," she said, in the final days before the battalion left Texas.

And she doesn't care what anyone thinks about women going to war.

"I don't get in those battles," she said. "You know what? We're here and we're doing the job, just as well [as men] and with just as much pride. "

A Shared Stake In Iraq's Future (WP)

By Zalmay Khalilzad

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

How the Oil Agreement Points the Way Forward

Under the national hydrocarbon law approved this week by Iraq's Council of Ministers, oil will serve as a vehicle to unify Iraq and will give all Iraqis a shared stake in their country's future. This is a significant achievement for Iraqis' national reconciliation. It demonstrates that the leaders of Iraq's principal communities can pull together to peacefully resolve difficult issues of national importance.

Resolving concerns about control of oil is central to overcoming internal divisions in Iraq. The country has the third-largest oil reserves in the world, and more than 90 percent of federal income comes from oil revenue. The effective and equitable management of these resources is critical to economic growth as well as to developing a greater sense of shared purpose among Iraqi communities.

The goal of Iraq's leaders was to draft a law that ensured that all Iraqis could be confident they would receive their fair share of the benefits of developing the country's resources, that the revenue from oil and gas would enable a decentralization of power while maintaining national unity, and that Iraq would adopt the best international practices for the development and management of its mineral wealth. By these standards, the hydrocarbon law is a great success. It:

Â· Reaffirms that oil and gas resources are owned by all the people of Iraq and contains a firm commitment to revenue-sharing among regions and provinces on the basis of population.

Â· Establishes a predictable framework and processes for federal-regional cooperation that demonstrate the government's commitment to democracy and federalism.

Â· Creates a principal policymaking body for energy -- the Federal Council on Oil and Gas -- that will have representatives from all of Iraq's regions and oil-producing provinces.

Â· Ensures that all revenue from oil sales will go into a single national account and that provinces will receive direct shares of revenue, thereby significantly increasing local control of financial resources.

Â· Establishes international standards for transparency and mandates public disclosure of contracts and associated revenue and payments. This is essential to build confidence in the new political order and to counter corruption.

The law defines a role for the Oil Ministry that is primarily regulatory, which is the modern standard and which will also harness the market to achieve the optimal development of Iraq's resources. It provides the legal framework to enable international investment in Iraq's oil and gas sectors, a break from the statist and overcentralized practices of the past. It also requires best practices in environmental protection and field management and development, ensuring that the environment is not damaged and that hydrocarbon assets are not wasted by poor practices of the past.

While the draft law will need to be enacted by the Iraqi Council of Representatives when it returns from recess, the prospects for passage are excellent because all the major parliamentary blocs are represented in the cabinet. Companion legislation will be required in several areas, and Iraqi leaders hope to complete the entire package of hydrocarbon legislation by the end of May.

Arriving at this agreement was not easy. It has taken other countries years to complete such legislation. While negotiating this law presented special challenges for the federal government, the Kurdistan regional government and the leaders of key political blocs, the approval of the draft by the Council of Ministers sets a precedent for problem-solving and cooperation that is critical to the stabilization and development of Iraq.

This is the first time since 2003 that all major Iraqi communities have come together on a defining piece of legislation. A national reconciliation that stabilizes Iraq can be achieved if similar compromises are made on the future of de-Baathification and on amending the constitution. The agreement on the oil law should give us confidence that Iraqis are willing and able to take the steps needed for Iraq's success.

Arrest In Pakistan Spurs Hope Of Stronger Effort (WP)

By Griff Witte, Kamran Khan

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, March 3 -- The arrest of a senior Taliban leader in a Pakistani city long reputed to be a haven for the group kindled guarded hope among Western and Afghan security officials Friday that the government here plans to move more aggressively against insurgents taking refuge on its territory.

The arrest, confirmed by two senior Pakistani intelligence officials, marks the first time since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks that authorities here have acknowledged apprehending or killing a senior Taliban commander on Pakistani soil. It comes as Pakistan faces pressure from the Bush administration to step up its involvement in a counterinsurgency campaign that has foundered in the past year, with Taliban attacks in Afghanistan becoming more deadly and audacious.

Obaidullah Akhund, arrested hours after Vice President Cheney made a visit to Islamabad this week, is a former Taliban defense minister and is viewed in intelligence circles as one of the highest-ranking figures in the Islamic movement, which U.S.-led forces drove from power in Afghanistan in late 2001.

Col. Tom Collins, a spokesman for the international security force that patrols Afghanistan, said Friday its forces were not involved in any operation against Akhund but that his arrest by Pakistan would be "a very good development."

"He's what we would consider tier-one Taliban," Collins said.

Pakistani officials would not comment for the record Friday. While the arrest is likely to bolster Pakistan's counterterrorism bona fides, it is also potentially embarrassing: Akhund was caught in the southern Pakistani city of Quetta, where terrorism analysts believe much of the Taliban leadership resides, though Pakistan denies it.

Afghan officials have long asserted that Pakistan's government is either looking the other way as insurgents recruit and train on its soil or actively aiding the Taliban's cause. In recent months, U.S. officials have become sharply critical as well, saying Pakistan must crack down on border sanctuaries.

Cheney, traveling this week with the deputy director of the CIA, repeated that message here Monday to Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf. The next day, Cheney was in the largest U.S. air base in Afghanistan when a suicide bomber struck just outside the base's gate, killing 23 people.

A senior Pakistani intelligence official said Friday that the night Cheney left Pakistan for Afghanistan, Pakistani authorities arrested Akhund in Quetta. The arrest was reported Friday in the New York Times and in the Pakistani newspaper Dawn.

"It's pure coincidence and our good luck that we found . . . Obaidullah within 24 hours of Cheney's visit," said the official, who spoke from Quetta and on condition of anonymity. The official said the arrest begins a new thrust by Pakistani intelligence agencies to arrest about 100 prominent Taliban members.

A second senior intelligence official, in Islamabad, confirmed the initiative and said it was based on "massive intelligence-sharing that has been going on between us, Americans, NATO and Afghans."

Some analysts questioned whether Pakistan really would be more aggressive. In recent years, Pakistan has carried out raids on al-Qaeda targets to coincide with visits from Western officials. "The Pakistanis have done it again," said Marvin Weinbaum, scholar-in-residence at the Middle East Institute in Washington. "They've come up with a high-profile person at just the right time."

A senior Afghan official said: "We hope that more of these arrests are made, and not just for show when Vice President Cheney comes to town."

Khan reported from Karachi, Pakistan.

Pakistan: Roadside Blast Wounds Judge (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

A bomb rigged to a bicycle exploded near a car carrying a judge to his court in central Multan, seriously wounding him and killing his driver, a policeman and a third man. The judge, Mian Bashir Bhatti, often hears cases against suspected militants and terrorists. Two weeks ago, a suicide bomber blew himself up in a packed courtroom in southwestern Quetta, killing 15 people, including a senior judge.

NATO Short On Troops In Afghanistan (WP/AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor,

The Washington Post/AP, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Signs of a new spring offensive by Taliban insurgents in Afghanistan have begun to emerge, but NATO commanders are still short more than 1,000 combat troops, despite repeated requests to allied nations, the top commander said Friday.

U.S. Gen. John Craddock told reporters that while the allies are winning more battles with insurgents, they are losing the counter-narcotics war, and more work and greater coordination is needed in the reconstruction effort.

Craddock said there has already been a slight increase in suicide attacks and roadside bombs _ the beginnings of an expected increase in violence as the weather improves. And he said he is still short by as much as two battalions, largely combat units, despite recent commitments for about 7,000 additional troops there, including more than 3,500 from the United States. A battalion is generally about 800 soldiers.

Craddock also said that 30 percent to 40 percent of the 25 provincial reconstruction teams working to rebuild the country do not have all the people they need, particularly State Department and agricultural experts. In those cases, he said the agencies either have no presence or not enough people on the teams, which number about 100 people.

The teams are small units of troops and civilian personnel placed around the country supporting local authorities and aid groups with security and assisting in setting up essential services for the provinces.

More agricultural experts are considered critical because officials are struggling to control a drug crop that dominates the country's economy and provides key financing for the insurgency. Opium production from poppies in Afghanistan last year rose 49 percent to 6,700 tons _ or enough to make about 670 tons of heroin, more than 90 percent of the world's supply.

Lt. Gen. Douglas Lute told the Senate Armed Services Committee on Thursday that there are typically one or two State Department specialists and an Agriculture Department specialist on the teams, because the economy is so reliant on agriculture. The rest of the team is largely military, including civil affairs and psychological operations officers. The U.S. is responsible for 12 of the 25 teams, which are assigned to provinces.

Craddock also agreed that Pakistan must do more to control its border, as Taliban and other insurgents continue to flow through the region into Afghanistan.

"NATO will not be able to prevail, ... will never control the border, without greater control of the border areas by Pakistan and greater coordination and cooperation between Pakistan and Afghanistan," said Craddock.

He said both countries need to put up more checkpoints and inspection stations along the border, and there needs to be more political cooperation between the two nations.

Craddock said the countries are making progress in efforts to cooperate more, and there is some expectation there will be increased political dialogue between the two governments this spring. And overall, he said, he is encouraged by the progress he is seeing.

While saying there will still be challenges particularly this spring, he said, "between the security aspect that's presently there and what NATO is capable of ... partnered with the reconstruction, we're seeing some progress and we're seeing increased capabilities."

Currently there are about 26,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan. Roughly 15,000 of them are serving in the NATO-led force, which now totals about 35,000. The other 11,000 are special operations forces or are training Afghan troops.

The Wider War (WSJ)

By Michael A. Ledeen

The Wall Street Journal, March 3, 2007

The papers and airwaves are full of stories about an impending American assault on Iran. Some accounts claim we will target their nuclear facilities. Others speak of a far more ambitious attack designed to destroy the Islamic Republic's regime. Whatever the truth of these stories -- vigorously denied by the Bush administration -- we are clearly paying much more attention to Iran than we did in the past, and this is a good thing.

The terror war now extends to four continents -- running from Thailand and Indonesia to India and Pakistan, down the Horn of Africa to Somalia and Yemen and back up to Afghanistan, on to Iraq, Palestine/Israel, Lebanon, and thence to Europe and the United States. To restrict our national debate to Iraq and Afghanistan alone is to accept the failure of strategic vision that has plagued us from the war's earliest days.

We have decided to fight in one place at a time, secure that area, and then move on. That isn't good enough, because it gives our enemies the luxury of attacking us where, when and how they choose. Neither Iraq nor Afghanistan will ever have decent security so long as we only play defense; we have to attack our enemies when we wish, not respond to their initiatives, and their most important operational bases are outside Iraq and Afghanistan.

Our primary enemies are states, which provide the jihadis with much of the wherewithal for their operations: intelligence, weapons and other technology (including the advanced explosive devices Iran gives the terrorists in Iraq), false documents, safe havens and training facilities. (For a long time they needed money, too, but nowadays ransoms and drug profits have eased the burden on their state financiers.)

Until the fall of Saddam, there were four pre-eminent supporters of terrorist groups: Iraq, Iran, Syria and Saudi Arabia. Now there are three, and, as it has been all along, Iran is by far the most important. The Iranians created Hezbollah, probably the most lethal terrorist organization in the world, as well as Islamic Jihad. In all, they support no less than 30 terror groups, both Sunni and Shiite, including al Qaeda (several of whose leaders have been operating from Iran since the liberation of Afghanistan).

Syria works hand in mailed glove with the mullahs in Lebanon and Iraq. The Saudis provide money for terrorist groups and support a global network of radical Wahhabi mosques and schools that indoctrinate young Muslims in the ways of jihad.

Without the active support of those three countries, it would be a lot easier to defeat the terrorists on the battlefields. Without Syrian and Iranian support, Hezbollah would shrivel up and die. Ditto for Islamic Jihad, whose leader, the former Florida-based academic Ramadan Abdullah Shallah, recently met in Tehran with Iranian leaders, plus Hezbollah's operational chief, Imad Mughniyah, and Iraqi militia leader Moqtada al-Sadr.

Al Qaeda would be similarly weakened, and the many Palestinian terrorist organizations that keep their offices in Damascus would find it very difficult to relocate and maintain their effectiveness. All would be weakened by the loss of Saudi funding, and moderate Muslims everywhere, including in the U.S, would breathe a sigh of relief if the Wahhabi mosques were closed.

It doesn't require more boots on the ground or bombing raids. It requires a traditional American policy: support for democratic revolution against our tyrannical enemies.

Iran is the keystone of the terrorist edifice. Should there be free elections, no one wearing a turban would be elected to anything, and there is good reason to believe the country is ripe for a pro-Western democratic revolution.

The regime clearly has a cash-flow problem; its failure to meet scheduled payments has driven its friends, the Russians, to suspend construction of the Bushehr nuclear reactor. There are also demonstrations against it all over the country -- and no wonder, with more than 40% of the young population (two-thirds under 30 years of age) below the poverty line, widespread drug addiction, and thousands of women sold into sex slavery every year.

Nor is it surprising that some of the oppressed minorities have launched armed attacks against the Revolutionary Guards Corps and the fanatical Basij forces, the regime's prime instruments of oppression. There are open denunciations of President Ahmadinejad, of former President Rafsanjani and even of Supreme Leader Khamenei. All this is taking place against the background of the cancer-ridden Khamenei (who is expected to die in the near future), and a thinly veiled struggle for succession.

Pro-democracy organizations in Iran believe they can bring down the regime if they receive support from the U.S., of the same sort we gave to Solidarity in Poland, the Aquino forces in the Philippines, the Cedar revolutionaries in Lebanon, the Orange revolutionaries in the Ukraine, and so many others. They wish our leaders would openly endorse regime change, and they would like our radios and television to support freedom instead of apologizing for the mullahs.

We should call for Western trade unions to build a strike fund for Iranian workers, many of whom have not been paid for months, some for more than a year, and we should provide sympathetic Iranians with laptops, servers, cell and satellite phones and phone cards, so that they can communicate with one another.

Regime change in Iran does not require an invasion, or even the sort of bombing so many are now advocating in order to thwart the mullahs' program to build atomic bombs. The issue is the regime, not its instruments; thousands of Americans have already been killed and wounded by Iran's terror army. We should assault the mullahs with our most potent weapons, which are primarily political. The recent sanctions against Iran are welcome, but support for freedom is the key to regime change in Tehran.

The mullahs know their doom will come from their own people, which is why they have embarked on a new wave of mass repression, with a spate of public hangings in the Kurdish, Balouch and Ahwaz areas, a wave of arrests of pro-democracy leaders in Tehran and Isfahan (the most famous face of the Iranian resistance, Ahmad Batebi, reportedly suffered a stroke in the mullahs' torture chambers, and is now in a coma).

In Khuzestan -- the oil region in the south -- there are plans for a massive program of ethnic cleansing, moving more than a million Arabs to other regions. It brings back memories of Stalin's efforts to destroy Soviet "nationalities." All these actions bespeak a profound insecurity in Tehran, just waiting for the free world to exploit.

A free Iran would deliver a devastating global blow to the terrorists, and would no doubt change the calculus -- and perhaps the regime -- of Syria. Under those happy circumstances, we might muster the will to insist that the Saudis shut down the Wahhabi schools and mosques, which constitute an assembly line of fanatics all over the world.

It's an ambitious strategy, but we are an ambitious people. We are engaged in a global war, and while we have done well in many respects, we have thus far refused to recognize the real nature of the fight.

DOJ:

White House Backed U.S. Attorney Firings, Officials Say (WP)

By John Solomon, Dan Eggen

The White House approved the firings of seven U.S. attorneys late last year after senior Justice Department officials identified the prosecutors they believed were not doing enough to carry out President Bush's policies on immigration, firearms and other issues, White House and Justice Department officials said yesterday.

The list of prosecutors was assembled last fall, based largely on complaints from members of Congress, law enforcement officials and career Justice Department lawyers, administration officials said.

One of the complaints came from Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.), who specifically raised concerns with the Justice Department last fall about the performance of then-U.S. Attorney David C. Iglesias of New Mexico, according to administration officials and Domenici's office.

Iglesias has alleged that two unnamed New Mexico lawmakers pressured him in October to speed up the indictments of Democrats before the elections. Domenici has declined to comment on that allegation.

Since the mass firings were carried out three months ago, Justice Department officials have consistently portrayed them as personnel decisions based on the prosecutors' "performance-related" problems. But, yesterday, officials acknowledged that the ousters were based primarily on the administration's unhappiness with the prosecutors' policy decisions and revealed the White House's role in the matter.

"At the end of the day, this was a decision to pick the prosecutors we felt would most effectively carry out the department's policies and priorities in the last two years," said Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse.

Officials portrayed the firings as part of a routine process, saying the White House did not play any role in identifying which U.S. attorneys should be removed or encourage the dismissals. The administration previously said that the White House counsel recommended a GOP replacement for one U.S. attorney, in Arkansas, but did not say that the White House approved the seven other firings.

"If any agency wants to make a change regarding a presidential appointee, they run that change by the White House counsel's office," said White House spokeswoman Dana Perino. "That is standard operating procedure, and that is what happened here. The White House did not object to the Justice Department decision."

The seven prosecutors were first identified by the Justice Department's senior leadership shortly before the November elections, officials said. The final decision was supported by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and his deputy, Paul J. McNulty, and cleared with the White House counsel's office, including deputy counsel William Kelly, they said.

The firings have sparked outrage from Democrats and some Republicans in Congress as details emerge about the unusual decision to remove so many at once on Dec. 7, in the middle of the administration's term. The issue escalated this week with the allegations from Iglesias, who has said he will name the two New Mexico lawmakers who called him if he is asked under oath.

The House Judiciary Committee has issued subpoenas for Iglesias and three other fired prosecutors, who are set to testify in both the House and the Senate on Tuesday. Lawmakers plan to press for answers, including what triggered the creation of the list and who else was involved.

Most of the prosecutors have said they were given no reason for their dismissals and have responded angrily to the Justice Department's contention that they were fired because of their performance. At least five of the prosecutors, including Iglesias, were presiding over public corruption investigations when they were fired, but Justice Department officials have said that those probes played no role in the dismissals.

Domenici's office confirmed yesterday that it had raised concerns with the Justice Department about Iglesias's office, particularly on immigration.

"We had very legitimate concerns expressed to us by hundreds of New Mexicans -- in the media, in the legal communities and just regular citizens -- about the resources that were available to the U.S. attorney," said Steve Bell, Domenici's chief of staff.

Domenici and his aides have declined to comment on whether the lawmaker called Iglesias. Any communication by a senator or House member with a federal prosecutor regarding an ongoing criminal investigation is a violation of ethics rules.

The fired prosecutors in San Diego and Nevada are registered independents, while the rest are generally viewed as moderate Republicans, according to administration officials and many of the fired prosecutors.

In a recent briefing with lawmakers, McNulty said one factor in the decision to create the list of U.S. attorneys was the concern raised by various members of Congress and law enforcement officials that some U.S. attorneys were not following Bush administration policies or federal sentencing rules, administration officials said.

The Justice Department received several letters dating to 2005 and signed by more than a dozen California lawmakers, mostly Republicans, raising concerns about then-U.S. Attorney Carol S. Lam's approach to prosecuting immigration cases. Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California, a Democrat, also wrote Gonzales in June, saying that the "low prosecution rates have a demoralizing effect on the men and women patrolling our nation's borders."

On the job less than a year, McNulty consulted his predecessor as deputy attorney general, James B. Comey, about some of the prosecutors before approving the list, officials said. Comey, who did not return a telephone call seeking comment yesterday, praised Iglesias earlier this week as one of the department's best prosecutors.

The seven prosecutors outside Arkansas were informed about their ousters on Dec. 7, after the White House counsel's office signed off.

A few days before the firings, administration officials began the traditional process of calling lawmakers in the affected states to inform them about the decisions and to gather early input on possible successors, officials said.

Although the White House approved the firings, two administration officials said the counsel's office did not suggest replacements. But the officials said White House political affairs officials keep databases on potential job candidates that Justice Department officials could have accessed if they chose.

An administration official said White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten does not recall whether he was briefed about the firings before they occurred.

Privately, White House officials acknowledged that the administration mishandled the firings by not explaining more clearly to lawmakers that a large group was being terminated at once -- which is unusual -- and that the reason was the policy performance review.

Prosecutor Declined To Testify For Congress (AP)

The former U.S. attorney for Nevada said he declined an invitation to testify voluntarily before a congressional panel investigating the removal of at least eight federal prosecutors around the nation.

But Daniel Bogden, who has said he was not given a reason for his removal this week, said he would appear if compelled by subpoena to appear before the House Judiciary Committee's subcommittee on commercial and administrative law.

Bogden did not immediately respond Friday to requests for comment. The 51-year-old prosecutor is one of several federal prosecutors removed in recent weeks by the Justice Department. His last day was Wednesday. No successor has been named.

On Thursday, Bogden told reporters that he remained unsure why he was removed.

Bogden told the Las Vegas Review-Journal that Michael Battle, director of the executive office for U.S. attorneys, did not provide a reason when he asked Bogden on Dec. 7 to step down from the post he had held since 2001.

Bogden said other Justice Department officials told him that the decision was reached at the highest levels of the department.

"I was given an explanation that seemed to me to be political in nature, that had nothing to do with any issues with my performance or issues with the performance of my office," Bogden said.

He noted that Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty on Feb. 6 told the Senate Judiciary Committee and the dismissals of federal prosecutors were performance-related.

U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the president, but congressional Democrats have raised concerns that the Bush administration might be punishing prosecutors for being too effective at pursuing political corruption cases.

Democrats on a House Judiciary subcommittee voted Thursday to subpoena fired prosecutors Carol Lam of California, David Iglesias of New Mexico, H.E. "Bud" Cummins of Arkansas and John McKay of Washington.

Iglesias said this week that he believes he was dismissed because he resisted pressure by two members of Congress to rush indictments before 2006's election in an investigation of an alleged Democratic kickback scheme. He has refused to name the lawmakers who called him.

Rep. Heather Wilson Grilled By Reporters On Role In Firing (ALBTRIB)

Albuquerque Tribune, March 3, 2007

A brief news conference called today by Rep. Heather Wilson on veterans affairs devolved into a grilling over questions about former U.S. Attorney David Iglesias.

Wilson, after meeting with officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs, spoke to about four or five reporters about treatment of veterans from Iraq and Afghanistan.

After a couple of questions on that issue, the reporters turned their questioning to Iglesias - specifically, whether Wilson called him in the weeks before the Nov. 7 election to inquire about a high-profile corruption case being investigated by his office.

"I have said very little about that, and I won't make any additional comment at this time," the Albuquerque Republican told reporters gathered at the Veterans Administration Hospital.

She referred to Iglesias' ouster as she has before, as a personnel issue within the Department of Justice.

When asked how an alleged phone call to a U.S. attorney could be construed as a personnel matter, she replied that she "did not have any additional comment at this time."

Wilson offered the same response to a number of other questions on the same topic.

She would not comment on a report published Thursday identifying her and Sen. Pete Domenici as having called Iglesias in October.

Iglesias has said he felt he was being pressured inappropriately to hurry the case and unseal indictments before the election.

The Justice Department has given performance issues as the official reason for Iglesias' losing his job. He says he believes the firing was political.

Earlier, Wilson, the only female veteran serving in Congress, said she was reassured after meeting with VA officials about the quality of care for Iraq and Afghanistan veterans.

After being grilled about Iglesias, she asked if there were any additional questions about the VA. When there were none, she left.

Two news outlets - McClatchy News Service and KRQE News 13 - reported Thursday that Wilson and Domenici called Iglesias in mid-October regarding the pace of his prosecution of Democrats on corruption charges.

Iglesias has not said who called him, only that he considered it political pressure and that he will reveal the names when he testifies before two congressional committees Tuesday.

McClatchy based its report on two people who "feared possible political repercussions" if they were identified. It says Wilson called in the final weeks of her neck-and-neck campaign against Attorney General Patricia Madrid, whom Wilson had labeled as soft on corruption.

The sources said "Wilson was curt" after Iglesias didn't respond to her questions on possible indictments.

The FBI last fall confirmed it was investigating possible white-collar corruption involving the Metropolitan Court and other buildings in Albuquerque, and other sources said the investigation was focusing on former Democratic lawmakers, among others.

The U.S. Attorney's Office has refused to say anything about the investigation.

Domenici, for whom the federal courthouse Downtown is named, called Iglesias more than a week later, McClatchy reported, "and was more persistent than Wilson," its sources said. The story went on, "When Iglesias said an indictment wouldn't be handed down until at least December, the line went dead."

University of New Mexico political science professor Lonna Atkeson said Wilson or Domenici should speak up if they had inappropriate contact with Iglesias.

"If they did, they should come clean, because it's going to come out," Atkeson said.

The situation could prove more politically painful for Wilson than Domenici, she said.

"If it's true, it hurts Wilson more than Domenici because he wasn't running and it wasn't his direct political gain," she said.

Domenici "is so loved in New Mexico, it's hard to imagine this would be a major threat to his campaign two years out from an election."

Robert D. Novak: Another Hillary Defector (NOVAK)

Robert Novak, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON – Greg Craig, a Washington super-lawyer with close ties to the Clintons, is supporting Sen. Barack Obama for President.

Craig was a White House special counsel defending President Bill Clinton in the Senate impeachment trial. A partner in the Williams & Connolly law firm founded by the legendary Edward Bennett Williams, Craig served as an adviser to Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy.

In confirming to this column his Presidential preference, Craig called Obama unique and added: "I've never seen anyone who has made the impact on people and on me." He said he was impressed with Obama when he first met him at the home of investment banker Vernon Jordan, an intimate friend and supporter of the Clintons.

MCCAIN'S WHEREABOUTS

While the other Republican Presidential candidates were attending the annual Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC) in Washington beginning Thursday, Sen. John McCain was launching a nationwide fund-raising campaign.

McCain was at a Salt Lake City lunch Thursday and a Phoenix reception Friday. His money-raising schedule calls for subsequent stops in Grand Rapids, Mich., Detroit, New York City, Charlotte, N.C., Sacramento, Calif., La Jolla, Calif., Irvine, Calif., Riverside, Calif., Beverly Hills, Calif., San Francisco and Philadelphia.

A footnote: McCain's campaign staff did not mention these fund-raising commitments when it turned down CPAC's invitation. It said the senator's conservative record was known to everybody without him going to CPAC, but this decision was made only after heated debate within the McCain campaign.

PROBING GONZALES

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has indicated he is too busy to answer letters from Democratic congressional leaders about his firing seven U.S. attorneys involved in probes of public corruption, though a lower-level Justice Department official rejected their proposals.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, House Democratic Caucus chairman, had written Gonzales two letters suggesting that he name Carol Lam, fired as U.S. attorney in San Diego, as an outside counsel to continue her pursuit of the Duke Cunningham case. Asked by Melissa Charbonneau of the Christian Broadcasting Network about this column's report that Gonzales did not respond, Gonzales said: "I think that the American people lose if I spend all my time worrying about congressional requests for information, if I spend all my time responding to subpoenas."

Richard A. Hertling, the acting Justice Department lobbyist, responded Wednesday, 22 days after Emanuel's letter. He contended "the Justice Department would not ever seek the resignation of a U.S. attorney if doing so would jeopardize a public corruption case" and rejected naming Lam as a special prosecutor.

DODD'S BUCKS

The long shot Democratic Presidential campaign by Christopher J. Dodd, the new Banking Committee chairman, solicited banking industry executives and lobbyists — Democrats and Republicans alike — for a fund-raising reception Wednesday.

Melanie Wong, an experienced Democratic fund-raiser who identified herself as Dodd's "mid-Atlantic regional finance director," sent the invitations. They addressed lobbyists by their first names, even those she had never met and who had never contributed to Dodd.

The evening event was held at Washington's luxurious Madison Hotel to find individual fund-raisers. A "Team of 46" will consist of supporters who pledge to raise $46,000 for Dodd.

The non-profit Clinton Foundation denied conservative writer R. Emmett Tyrrell Jr. permission to use in his new book a photograph taken last year of the Clinton-baiting editor of the American Spectator with the former president at Clinton's 60th birthday party in Toronto.

In the prologue of "The Clinton Crackup," Tyrrell describes how he managed to get an invitation to the lavish celebration Sept. 9. According to Tyrrell, Clinton did not recognize him despite confrontation between them at the Jockey Club restaurant in Washington in 1995. The Washington Post described the President going "ballistic" against Tyrrell.

When Tyrrell asked permission to use the photograph in his new anti- Clinton book, Canadian photographer Anil Mungal responded on Feb. 2: "I regret to report that the Clinton Foundation has not granted permission to release the photo."

Strange Justice (WP)

The mass firing of U.S. attorneys has been poorly managed -- at best.

THE JUSTICE Department's firing of a group of U.S. attorneys is neither as sinister as critics suggest nor as benign as the department would have you believe, at least on the basis of the evidence revealed so far. But it is, both sides agree, highly unusual and warrants further inquiry. And it points to the need to fix a law that was changed for the worse not long ago.

U.S. attorneys head the local outposts of federal prosecutors' offices around the country. They are nominated by the president and serve at his pleasure. But it's uncommon for one to be replaced in the middle of an administration and apparently unprecedented for an entire group to be canned, as has happened with eight U.S. attorneys at last count.

The department and Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales have served themselves and the public poorly with their ham-handed, hide-the-ball handling of the dismissals. "I would never, ever make a change in a U.S. attorney position for political reasons," Mr. Gonzales assured the Senate Judiciary Committee -- only to have Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty acknowledge that the U.S. attorney in Little Rock, Bud Cummins, was ousted to make way for J. Timothy Griffin, a political ally of White House adviser Karl Rove. The revelation that all but one of the other U.S. attorneys had received positive to glowing performance reviews appeared to undercut the assertion that the prosecutors had been removed for "performance-related" reasons.

Meanwhile, the former U.S. attorney in New Mexico told McClatchy Newspapers that he believes he was sacked for failing, before the November election, to speed indictments in a probe of local Democrats; the prosecutor cited preelection phone calls from congressional Republicans as the basis for his suspicion. Justice said that had nothing to do with his dismissal, though it acknowledges that unspecified congressional concerns played a role.

Pending further investigation, the episode seems to reflect an unusual reaction to the normal tension between Justice headquarters and the would-be autonomous U.S. attorneys, in this case involving disagreements over how much to focus on immigration cases or when to seek the death penalty. Prosecutorial independence is important, but the president is entitled to have prosecutors who reflect his law-enforcement priorities and to replace those who balk at complying.

More troubling: Is the Bush administration seeking to circumvent the requirement that U.S. attorneys be confirmed by the Senate? The administration tucked into the renewal of the USA Patriot Act authority for the attorney general to name prosecutors who could serve indefinitely without confirmation. Justice viewed the previous law, under which unconfirmed replacements could serve for only 120 days, after which the district courts would name a successor, as an improper incursion of judicial authority into executive branch appointments. Yet the new arrangement presents the greater risk of the executive branch doing an end run around Senate confirmation. The best way to prevent that would be to return the law to its previous state.

No More Denials, Please (NYT)

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

It is time for the Justice Department to stop issuing rote denials that are becoming increasingly hard to believe about the suspicious firing of eight United States attorneys. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales should appoint an impartial investigator to get to the bottom of this unfolding scandal.

Just this week, David Iglesias, one of the eight fired United States attorneys, charged that he was dismissed for resisting pressure to begin a politically charged prosecution before the 2006 election. His allegation came shortly after performance evaluations came to light that throw considerable doubt on the Justice Department's claim that the United States attorneys were fired for poor performance.

United States attorneys, the highest federal prosecutors at the state level, must be insulated from politics. Their decisions about whether to indict can ruin lives, and change the outcome of elections. To ensure their independence, United States attorneys are almost never removed during the term of the president who appointed them.

The Bush administration ignored this tradition, and trampled on prosecutorial independence, by firing eight United States attorneys in rapid succession, including one, Carol Lam of San Diego, who had put a powerful Republican congressman in jail. Mr. Iglesias, who was the U.S. attorney in New Mexico, says two members of Congress called him last October and urged him to pursue corruption charges against a prominent Democrat before the November election. He did not. He was dismissed.

Most of the fired United States attorneys' performance evaluations praise them for the quality of their work, and for following the priorities set in Washington. These do not appear to be the evaluations of people who were fired for poor performance.

A House subcommittee has subpoenaed several of the fired United States attorneys to testify next week. The Senate is doing its own investigation. They should question the fired prosecutors, as well as top members of the Justice Department, to find out how these dismissals came about. They should also investigate Mr. Iglesias's allegations about the two members of Congress, who may have violated Congressional rules, and even criminal law.

Mr. Gonzales should also begin his own inquiry. Mr. Iglesias has raised a serious question about politicization of the Justice Department. That, and not public relations, should be the attorney general's primary concern.

Every Day Is 9/12 For AG (SACBEE)

By Dorothy Korber, Bee Staff Writer

The Sacramento Bee, March 3, 2007

Alberto Gonzales says his main concern is protecting the U.S. against another Sept. 11 attack; capital protesters decry policies.

For U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, every day is Sept. 12.

"My No. 1 priority is protecting our nation and our citizens from another attack," Gonzales said in a talk Friday at McGeorge School of Law in Oak Park. "That is what drives me."

While dozens of raucous protesters demonstrated outside, the nation's top cop spoke to a quieter audience of dignitaries and students who attended the invitation-only lecture at the school.

Gonzales' half-hour talk, read rapidly from notes, was a passionate defense of the Bush administration's anti-terrorism strategy on several fronts: domestic surveillance, the detention of foreign terror suspects at Guantánamo Bay, and the importance of the USA Patriot Act.

Gonzales, who was sworn in as attorney general two years ago, previously served as President Bush's White House counsel. He recalled being with the president on Sept. 11, 2001.

"I carry the memory and pain of that day -- the brutal murder of fathers and mothers, sons and daughters," he said. "Our enemies are smart. They are adaptable. And they are very, very patient. We must anticipate what our enemy is going to do next."

To that end, he said, the administration must have new tools and rethink some old rules. He quoted a British report that described parts of the Geneva Convention as out of date, and he spoke of clarifying and modernizing those international standards of wartime behavior.

"This is a new threat that requires a new way of thinking," he said.

At the end of his talk, Gonzales was asked how he thought history would judge him.

"I will let history write that story," he said. "I can't worry about my legacy. I can't spend the next two years fighting defensive battles. I have an obligation to take the majestic powers of the Department of Justice and do good for the American people."

Protesters outside the lecture hall -- primarily law students and some of their professors -- accused Gonzales of ignoring the Constitution in his pursuit of terrorism. They raised issues that have dogged Gonzales since his nomination, including his approval of an administration memo that condoned harsh treatment of suspected terrorists.

One sign read: "Protest Torture -- You May Be Next."

McGeorge professor John Sims, who teaches courses in constitutional law and international human rights, stood outside the lecture hall Friday, passing out a list of questions he thinks Gonzales should have been asked. All dealt with torture.

"I thought it would be more useful to stand out here and talk about questions he won't answer, rather than docilely listening and giving him polite applause," Sims said. "There are a lot of people in Sacramento and at McGeorge Law School who find the policies of the administration abhorrent and disgraceful. He has undermined the administration of justice in this country."

After Gonzales' talk, second-year McGeorge students Tina Poley and Matthew Christy both expressed disappointment that he spoke only of the war on terror and not about other duties of the attorney general.

"The entire thing was on the defensive about terrorism," said Poley, who had carried a protest sign before the lecture. "About treating every day like Sept. 12. Nothing at all about protecting civil rights or pursuing corruption."

Christy pointed out that Gonzales began the question/answer portion of the program by saying, "Bring it on!" -- an echo of President Bush's controversial challenge at the beginning of the Iraq war.

"You'd think he would have avoided that expression," said Christy, who wore a T-shirt proclaiming: "Give up war for Lent." Still, Christy was appreciative that Gonzales made the stop at McGeorge. "I'm glad he came here. It provides a forum for every one to discuss what's good and what's bad."

Later Friday, at the federal courthouse in downtown Sacramento, Gonzales touted the successes of Project Safe Childhood, an effort among local, state and federal authorities to aggressively investigate and prosecute cases of child exploitation.

Last year alone, the Eastern District of California had the highest number of federal indictments -- 71 -- in the country on cases ranging from Internet crimes against children, from child pornography to youth trafficking. The inland district runs from Bakersfield to the Oregon border.

Gonzales described such crimes as "horrendous" and applauded the efforts of law enforcement to take action "for the children of this community." About the writer:

Gonzalez Appearance Unwelcome By Some Law Students (CBS13)

CBS 13 Sacramento, March 3, 2007

(CBS13) Protestors made a run for it over to McGeorge School of Law today to speak their mind on the war on terror. The target of their anger-- U.S. Attorney General, Alberto Gonzales who was invited to speak at McGeorge.

With a glance and a wave, It didn't take long for the attorney general to figure out he wasn't exactly being welcomed by some in a group of McGeorge students.

These protestors --many of them law students from McGeorge cut to the chase as they told us, in dramatic fashion, why they were here

Rights being violated, this group would argue, by the U.S. Attorney General's office:

As they carried signs targeting the man who hired Gonzales-- President Bush.

Protestors ripped the administration and the Attorney General on how they handle so called enemy combatants; the guys at Guantanamo. But that was not all.

The tactics for handling the media's coverage of the attorney general's speech was a bit puzzling today. At first, CBS13 was told we'd be allowed in. Then, they shut all media out.

Despite their opposition to his policies-- The protestors we spoke with say they were glad the attorney general took the time to come to their law school.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Authorities Investigate Big Lender (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj And Julie Creswell

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

Federal prosecutors and securities regulators are investigating stock sales and accounting errors at the New Century Financial Corporation, the biggest mortgage company that specializes in lending to people with weak, or subprime, credit, the company disclosed in a corporate filing yesterday.

The company also warned that a delay in filing its financials may put vital financing into jeopardy.

The troubles at New Century are the latest sign of the deterioration in subprime lending — until recently the fastest-growing segment of the mortgage business. The market has been struggling to contain the fallout from rising default rates and weakening home prices. Late last year, some smaller lenders started going out of business and last month several bigger companies, including New Century, started reporting problems.

Another large lender, the Fremont General Corporation, said yesterday that it planned to sell its subprime mortgage business after reaching an agreement with the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to restrict its activities in that area. As part of the agreement, Fremont will be able to continue taking deposits.

The investigations into New Century, which is based in Irvine, Calif., and wrote $33.9 billion in mortgages last year, started after the company said on Feb. 7 that it would restate earnings for three quarters, which sparked a huge sell-off in its shares. Yesterday, it said its problems had prevented it from filing its annual report, which was to be released Thursday. The board is conducting an investigation of the accounting problems.

The company's shares have fallen more than 53 percent since the start of the year — before the most recent announcement, which came after the stock market closed. Its shares were down $3.73, or 25 percent, to $10.92, in after-hours trading.

On Feb. 22, the company said the regulatory arm of the New York Stock Exchange contacted it about sales in the company's securities before that announcement. On Wednesday, it received notice from the United States attorney's office in Los Angeles that it was conducting a criminal investigation. Federal prosecutors are looking into trading in New Century securities and errors in how the company accounted for home loans that it was forced to buy back from Wall Street firms that buy its loans and package them into bonds. Also, the Securities and Exchange Commission has requested a meeting with its executives.

It is unclear what stock sales investigators are looking at, but data from securities filings compiled by Thompson Financial show that two of the company's top executives sold sizable blocks of shares in the second half of last year. Robert K. Cole, a former chairman and a founder of the company, sold stock worth $6.7 million in the third and fourth quarters after not selling significant numbers of shares for the previous three quarters. And Edward F. Gotschall, another founder and vice chairman, sold shares worth $14.7 million after not selling significant numbers of shares for the previous six months.

Earlier last spring, the executives, both of whom are still on the board, said they would be moving out of their leadership positions. They later disclosed plans to sell stock.

A spokeswoman for New Century said the executives and the company would not comment beyond the company's filing. A spokesman for federal prosecutors in Los Angeles also declined to comment.

New Century, which was formed in 1995, narrowly survived a shakeout in the subprime sector in the late 1990's when concerns about faulty accounting and Russia's default scared investors away from risky bonds tied to subprime mortgages. The credit crunch caused several of its rivals to disappear, but New Century pulled through because it received a large cash infusion from U.S. Bancorp in Minneapolis at the time.

With fewer competitors, the company was well positioned to grab market share during the housing boom that began earlier this decade with the help of low interest rates. Subprime loans, which are largely given to poor and minority borrowers, had rapid growth but as more lenders jumped in lending standards were loosened and default rates for loans made in 2006 have been high.

New Century now appears to be facing a credit crunch similar to the one it encountered in the late 1990s.

The company said the delay in filing its financial reports had put its access to billions of dollars in credit lines and other financings into jeopardy. The company will have to seek a second set of waivers from banks that provide it credit lines totaling $17.4 billion if it does not file financial reports by March 15.

Also, the company will have to seek waivers from lenders that have provided it with 11 financing arrangements, because it will not have at least $1 in net income for the six months that ended in December. It has gotten six waivers so far, but they are contingent upon the company getting similar leniency from the other five.

The company's fate will probably hinge largely on the providers of its capital, which include Wall Street's biggest banks, which also own a hefty chunk of the company. Morgan Stanley, Goldman Sachs, Barclays Capital and Deutsche Bank own about 16 percent of the company, according to securities filings. Citigroup recently bought a 5.1 percent stake in the company and Greenlight Capital, a prominent hedge fund, owns 6.3 percent. Its president and co-founder, David Einhorn, sits on the board of New Century.

Ethics Case Will Limit Attorney's Enron Role (HC)

By Kristen Hays, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, March 3, 2007

A plaintiffs' lawyer has hearing over unrelated work in capital

One of the lawyers who represents Enron shareholders in a $40 billion lawsuit bound for trial next month in Houston has informed the judge he is facing an ethics complaint from the Washington, D.C., Bar Counsel.

The lawyer, G. Paul Howes, told U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon in a letter Friday that he will address the matter at a hearing before a committee of the District of Columbia Board of Professional Responsibility on April 11, the week before jury selection is scheduled to begin in the Enron case.

He also said that because of the complaint, he will have a nonspeaking role in the Enron trial and will help the lead trial lawyer, Patrick Coughlin.

The allegations include that in 1993-94, during Howes' 11 years as a federal prosecutor in Washington before he went into private practice in 1995, he made improper voucher payments to witnesses when prosecuting two murder cases.

The Justice Department investigated the allegations and did not file criminal charges against Howes. But the agency said in a 1998 report that he had improperly distributed witness vouchers. The Justice Department forwarded its findings to the D.C. Bar Counsel, which filed the complaint last month.

Howes said in the letter that he has "always accepted responsibility for my conduct and that of the police officers who worked with me" on extensive investigations that began in 1988. He declined comment beyond the letter.

Coughlin said in a statement Friday that Howes had acknow- ledged to the D.C. Bar Counsel that he acted in an "over-zealous manner in an effort to put away drug kingpins who were terrorizing entire communities in Washington." He also voiced support for Howes and his place on the plaintiffs' team.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Jury Seeks Clarity On 'Reasonable Doubt' (WP)

By Amy Goldstein, Carol D. Leonnig

DOJ_NMG_0140154

Jurors in the perjury trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby asked the presiding judge for help yesterday defining a core issue in their deliberations: how to set a standard for determining whether the vice president's former chief of staff is guilty beyond a "reasonable doubt."

At the end of its eighth day of deliberations, the foreman of the 11-member jury sent U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton a two-sentence note. "We would like clarification of the term 'reasonable doubt,' " the note said. "Specifically, is it necessary for the government to present evidence that it is not humanly possible for someone not to recall an event in order to find guilt beyond a reasonable doubt?"

The question, which Walton plans to address when jurors resume deliberating Monday, reflects the central role that human memory played in the month-long testimony in the trial. According to jury and evidence experts, the question -- which refers to what information Libby might have forgotten -- signifies that at least one juror is concerned how strictly to define reasonable doubt.

The concept of reasonable doubt is among the most controversial issues in jury deliberations, experts say, because it is a vague term that people interpret differently. Though the standard is meant to require a very high probability of guilt, research conducted with juries after trials has demonstrated those who worked together to reach a unanimous verdict nevertheless may have used different benchmarks of what constituted reasonable doubt.

Northwestern University law professor Ronald Allen, an authority on trial evidence and procedure, said the Libby jury is wise to seek clarity but added that it is unlikely that any judge can dispel the standard's ambiguity.

"Some people might say beyond reasonable doubt is 99 or 98 percent," Allen said. "Some might say any doubt at all [is unacceptable]. There is literally no test."

Libby, 56, is charged with five felony counts alleging that in 2003 he lied to FBI agents and a federal grand jury investigating a leak by the Bush administration of the identity of Valerie Plame, an undercover CIA officer. Plame is married to former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, a staunch early critic of President Bush's Iraq war policy.

Wilson was sent by the CIA to Africa in 2002 to assess reports that Iraq had been trying to buy uranium for a nuclear weapons program. Wilson concluded those reports were false. Shortly after the Iraq war began, he publicly lashed out at Bush and Vice President Cheney, accusing the administration of distorting his findings to justify the invasion.

Prosecutors allege that, in the spring and early summer of 2003, Libby aggressively sought out information about Wilson and Plame, then channeled word of her CIA job to journalists and the White House press secretary to imply that Wilson had been chosen for the mission to Niger out of nepotism.

The prosecution alleges that Libby deliberately lied to investigators to protect his job and spare the White House political embarrassment.

Defense attorneys contend their client simply misremembered his conversations about Wilson and Plame, because he was so busy with more important work. Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald sought to convince jurors that Libby could not plausibly have forgotten the conversations.

The question about reasonable doubt is the more significant of two notes the jury sent to the judge when they ended deliberations for the week at 2 p.m. yesterday. The other note concerns the count that alleges that Libby obstructed the leak probe.

Jurors asked the judge how much of Libby's grand jury testimony they should consider when deciding whether he is guilty on that count.

Libby Jury Leaves A Clue As It Heads Into Recess (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 2 — The jury deliberating the perjury and obstruction of justice case against I. Lewis Libby Jr. recessed for the weekend on Friday without reaching a verdict, but not before leaving an intriguing clue as to the state of deliberations.

DOJ_NMG_0140155

The jurors sent a note with a question to Judge Reggie B. Walton, who is expected to respond on Monday when deliberations resume. In the note, the jurors asked for further explanation of the concept of reasonable doubt, suggesting possible uncertainty or even disagreement over the core standard by which they are to measure the evidence and testimony about Mr. Libby, the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney.

"We would like clarification of the term 'reasonable doubt,' " the note said. "Specifically, is it necessary for the government to present evidence that it is not humanly possible for someone not to recall an event in order to find guilt beyond a reasonable doubt?"

The question suggested that at least some of the jurors are wrestling with the imprecise and often vexing definition of reasonable doubt, as well as how to decide whether a false statement should be attributed to faulty memory or willful deception, the issue at the center of the case.

Prosecutors have contended that Mr. Libby lied to a grand jury and F.B.I. agents who were investigating the leak of the identity of a C.I.A. operative, Valerie Wilson, in the summer of 2003. As part of their case, prosecutors have contended that they have demonstrated beyond a reasonable doubt that Mr. Libby lied when he said he did not discuss Ms. Wilson's role at the C.I.A. with two reporters. Moreover, the prosecutors have said that Mr. Libby also lied in an effort to cover up his role in the leak by testifying that he learned of Ms. Wilson's identity in a conversation with Tim Russert of NBC News on July 10 or 11.

Mr. Russert testified that in that conversation with Mr. Libby, they did not discuss Ms. Wilson.

Mr. Libby's lawyers asserted in their closing arguments that any misstatements Mr. Libby might have made were the result of a faulty memory. They also pressed the idea that memory is inherently imperfect, and that all the prosecution's witnesses demonstrated their own memory problems, which, by itself, was a demonstration of reasonable doubt.

The concept of reasonable doubt has proved troubling even for the Supreme Court, whose members have argued vigorously as to its definition and how it should be explained to a jury. There is, however, wide agreement that it is a more stringent standard than the "preponderance of the evidence," the usual standard for a finding in noncriminal lawsuits.

The Supreme Court first made explicit the requirement in 1970 that, to convict someone of a crime, the jury must find that person is guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

But justices have, over the years, continued to disagree over whether various instructions given to juries by judges are acceptable. In 1992, the justices split in a ruling that upheld convictions in which judges had told juries that reasonable doubt was akin to moral certainty.

In his instructions to the Libby jury, Judge Walton said, "A reasonable doubt, as the name implies, is a doubt based on reason."

He also said that "if after careful, honest and impartial consideration of all the evidence, you cannot say that you are firmly convinced of the defendant's guilt, then you have a reasonable doubt."

He also noted, however, that "the government is not required to prove guilt beyond all doubt or to a mathematical certainty or to a scientific certainty."

Katrina Fraud Cases Flood Courts (NOTP)

By Bruce Alpert, Washington Bureau

New Orleans Times-Picayune, March 3, 2007

Louisiana leads in number of cases

WASHINGTON -- In her application for federal emergency help, Tina Marie Gilmore told officials how she watched hopelessly as her two daughters, ages 5 and 6, were swept through the rushing floodwaters after Hurricane Katrina and was so distraught several months later that she couldn't function -- couldn't drive a car or even be in the same room with children.

But after mailing her a check for $4,358, the Federal Emergency Management Agency learned that not only did the 34-year-old woman not live in New Orleans when Hurricane Katrina devastated the city, but she also didn't have any children. Even her last name was a fake. The government said it wasn't Gilmore, but Winston.

Last month, U.S. District Judge William Stiehl sentenced the Belleville, Ill., woman to four years in jail. "She took advantage of the taxpayers of this country under very tragic circumstances," Stiehl said.

Winston is one of about 600 people in 19 states and the District of Columbia who have been indicted for making fraudulent hurricane claims. Louisiana has the most cases, 140, followed by Mississippi, with 105, and California, 71.

One of the most prevalent schemes, according to the government, involved false claims for emergency $2,000 allocations from FEMA, money intended to pay emergency living expenses after Katrina forced hundreds of thousands of people from their homes.

But some of the scams were far more audacious.

According to the Justice Department, Lawanda Williams of Jackson, Ala., filed 28 separate claims for hurricane damage, listing addresses in Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi and Florida and various Social Security numbers, addresses, phone numbers and post office box numbers. She had collected $267,377.15 before a FEMA staffer in Biloxi, Miss., noticed discrepancies in the applications and saw one common thread: All seemed connected to Williams.

On Feb. 1, Magistrate Bert Milling Jr. sentenced Williams to 75 months in prison and ordered her to reimburse FEMA for every penny she received, money the Justice Department says was used to buy a double-wide mobile home, a 50-inch television set and several used cars.

Other Katrina-related fraud charges include officials with FEMA and the Army Corps of Engineers demanding bribes for Katrina contracts or assistance; the sponsor of a Florida charity promising to fly in supplies to hurricane-devastated communities but doing no such thing; and 72 people, including 22 Red Cross employees, who the government says conspired to collect fraudulent payments through an emergency call center in Bakersfield, Calif. Most of the 72 have pleaded guilty to fraud charges.

"I'm never sure what really motivates the criminal," said Alice Fisher, head of the Justice Department's criminal division and coordinator of the Katrina Fraud Task Force that has coordinated the investigations for about 35 federal agencies. "But it's sad that in such a terrible disaster we'd have so many people steal money that is supposed to help people rebuild their homes and rebuild their lives."

'Sense of entitlement'

U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said he isn't surprised that the Eastern District of Louisiana, which covers metropolitan New Orleans, is on the low end of fraud cases given that the devastation of the storm meant most of the area's residents suffered at least some damage during Katrina.

According to the Justice Department, the Eastern District had 18 cases, although Letten believes the actual number is in the 30s. Still, that's fewer cases than reported for the Eastern District of California, the Northern District of Alabama and middle district of Louisiana, which includes Baton Rouge.

Katrina isn't the first time that people have tried to take advantage of a disaster and the programs intended to help the victims. After the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, people were prosecuted for seeking government or charitable money by falsely claiming that they lost a close family member at the World Trade Center or the Pentagon.

Jeffrey Schaler, a psychologist and professor in the Department of Justice, Law and Society at American University, said it's not just major disasters that elicit fraudulent claims. Any time there's a major bus accident, he said, people come forward to falsely claim that they were passengers and suffered debilitating injuries.

Many share a common personality trait, according to Schaler.

"They have a sense of entitlement or what would be referred to in psychiatry as narcissism," he said. "They think somehow they are owed what other people have to work for."

Tracing the claims

And a disaster as big as Katrina might have seemed the perfect opportunity to make a fraudulent claim under the theory that the government had so many legitimate applications for help that it would be impossible to separate the good from the bad. That could help explain much of the $1.4 billion in fraudulent claims estimated by the Government Accountability Office. So far, the government has collected $18 million in restitution for false claims, some from people who settled to avoid prosecution.

Fisher said investigators have accepted a large number of guilty pleas, an indication that the fraud allegations are relatively easy to prove. "We have the person cashing the (government) check, and it's not that difficult to establish that a person didn't really live where he or she said they did," Fisher said.

Sometimes, those filing false applications provide obvious clues. For example, Winston, the Illinois woman who claimed to have seen her two children drown, raised eyebrows because she listed different ages for her daughters in her written documents.

Also assisting the investigations, according to Fisher, was the willingness of federal law enforcement agencies to work together and share documents, something that didn't happen before the 2001 terrorist attacks, according to the 9/11 Commission.

In many instances, applicants used information they gleaned from watching real-life tragedies on TV in the extensive coverage that followed Hurricane Katrina's assault on the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29, 2005.

Storm schemes

Here are some of the schemes outlined by federal investigators:

-- In Florida, Gary S. Kraser set up the Web site www.AirKatrina.com, which in one day took in $40,000 in donations to pay for relief flights to hurricane-damaged communities. Kaiser said he would bring in medical supplies and airlift children and others in need of medical help, but did no such thing, according to the indictment. He was sentenced to 21 months in jail. The day after Hurricane Katrina struck, Kraser wrote on his Web site: "I am shaking as I write this as I just arrived home and just now allowed my body and mind to accept what I saw tonight. I saw people on their roofs that had used axes more than likely to cut through the roof, waving at us, as we were Air Rescue." According to the government, Kraser wasn't a pilot and didn't have an airplane.

-- In Washington, D.C., Jeffrey Alan Rothschild was sentenced to 102 months in prison after pleading guilty to collecting $100,000 from FEMA by submitting false claims on behalf of people he claimed were Katrina victims and cashing the checks himself. According to the government, Rothschild told investigators he would use New Orleans addresses on his applications that he either found on the Internet or made up. By the time the government caught up with him, he had collected 38 checks.

-- In Bakersfield, Calif., 72 people helped friends, relatives and others obtain Katrina emergency money for which they weren't entitled, according to a federal indictment. Among those indicted were Aminah Randle, Robert Johnson, Elizabeth Ray and Sheena Porter, who worked in a Red Cross call center.

-- In Missouri, Andrea Gholston admitted she had filed an application listing a fake New Orleans address and received $4,358 from FEMA, and then helped a friend fill out another fraudulent application, which netted more than $10,000.

-- In New Orleans, two FEMA employees, Andrew Rose and Loyd Holliman, both Colorado residents, solicited a bribe from a food contractor in exchange for inflating the number of people requiring meals at the Algiers base camp so the company could collect more federal fees. On Jan. 27, the two employees each took an envelope with $10,000 in cash, according to the Justice Department. They both got 21 months in prison and were fined $20,000.

-- In Mississippi, four people -- Devin Chuter, Allen Kitto, Clinton Miller and Lauren Robertson -- were accused of submitting false claims for debris-removal work.

Ex-defense Official Pleads Guilty To Theft (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 3, 2007

A former Defense Department official yesterday pleaded guilty in federal court to charges of embezzling more than $100,000 in funds destined for use by government intelligence agents, Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said.

John Taylor, who worked at the department as an intelligence contingency-funds officer, admitted in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia that he stole the money while assigned to the 500th Military Intelligence Brigade as part of the U.S. Army Intelligence and Security Command at Camp Zama, Japan.

In his Defense Department role, Mrs. Fisher said, Taylor was responsible for budgeting, disbursing and accounting for intelligence contingency funds for the official duties of government intelligence agents. She said he also was required to manage classified bank accounts and supervise agents engaged in classified intelligence-gathering activity.

As part of a plea agreement in the case, she said, Taylor admitted that from 2003 through January 2006, he used his official position to steal at least $106,000 in department funds designated for intelligence-related activities.

She said Taylor embezzled the money by withdrawing cash from a government bank account whose funds were intended for intelligence agents. To conceal his acts, she said, Taylor falsified Defense Department accounting vouchers and forms.

Theft or embezzlement from the government carries a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine. Sentencing was set for June 8.

The case was prosecuted by James A. Crowell IV and John P. Pearson of the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section and the FBI and the Criminal Investigation Division of the U.S. Army, in support of the Justice Department's National Procurement Fraud Task Force and the International Contract Corruption Initiative.

The National Procurement Fraud Initiative was announced by Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty in October and is designed to promote the early detection, identification, prevention and prosecution of procurement fraud associated with the increase in contracting activity for national security and other government programs.

As part of this initiative, Mr. McNulty has created the National Procurement Fraud Task Force, which is chaired by Mrs. Fisher.

Justice Department Takes Aim At Image-sharing Sites (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News.com, March 3, 2007

Feds try during a private meeting to convince sites that allow photos or videos to be uploaded to monitor users, News.com has learned.

The Bush administration has accelerated its Internet surveillance push by proposing that Web sites must keep records of who uploads photographs or videos in case police determine the content is illegal and choose to investigate, CNET News.com has learned.

That proposal surfaced Wednesday in a private meeting during which U.S. Department of Justice officials, including Assistant Attorney General Rachel Brand, tried to convince industry representatives such as AOL and Comcast that data retention would be valuable in investigating terrorism, child pornography and other crimes. The discussions were described to News.com by several people who attended the meeting.

High ImpactWhat's new:

Officials from the U.S. Department of Justice held a private meeting to persuade Internet industry representatives to keep records of who uploads photographs or videos.Bottom line:

The meeting accelerates the Bush administration's effort to require Web sites to keep track of customers' actions on the Internet, a practice known as data retention.

More stories on this topic

A second purpose of the meeting in Washington, D.C., according to the sources, was to ask Internet service providers how much it would cost to record details on their subscribers for two years. At the very least, the companies would be required to keep logs for police of which customer is assigned a specific Internet address.

Only universities and libraries would be excluded, one participant said. "There's a PR concern with including the libraries, so we're not going to include them," the participant quoted the Justice Department as saying. "We know we're going to get a pushback, so we're not going to do that."

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has been lobbying Congress for mandatory data retention, calling it a "national problem that requires federal legislation." Gonzales has convened earlier private meetings to pressure industry representatives. And last month, Republicans introduced a mandatory data retention bill in the U.S. House of Representatives that would let the attorney general dictate what must be stored and for how long.

Supporters of the data retention proposal say it's necessary to help track criminals if police don't immediately discover illegal activity, such as child abuse. Industry representatives respond by saying major Internet providers have a strong track record of responding to subpoenas from law enforcement.

Wednesday's meeting represents the latest effort by the Bush administration to increase the ability of law enforcement and intelligence agencies to monitor Internet users. Since 2001, the administration has repeatedly pushed for more surveillance capabilities in the form of the Patriot Act and a follow-up proposal that--if it had been enacted--would have given the FBI online eavesdropping powers without a court order for up to 48 hours.

Often invoking terrorism and child pornography as justifications, the administration has argued that Internet providers must install backdoors for surveillance and has called for routers to be redesigned for easier eavesdropping. President Bush's electronic surveillance program, which was recently modified, has drawn an avalanche of lawsuits.

The Justice Department's request for information about compliance costs echoes a decade-ago debate over wiretapping digital telephones, which led to the 1994 Communications Assistance for Law Enforcement Act. To reduce opposition by telephone companies, Congress set aside $500 million for reimbursement and the legislation easily cleared both chambers by voice votes.

Once Internet providers come up with specific figures, privacy advocates worry, Congress will offer to write a generous check to cover all compliance costs and the process will repeat itself.

The Justice Department did not respond to a request for comment on Thursday. The U.S. Internet Service Provider Association, which has been critical of data retention proposals before, declined to comment.

Because the Justice Department did not circulate a written proposal at the private meeting, it's difficult to gauge the effects on Web sites that would be forced to record information on image uploads for two years. Meeting participants said that Justice officials (including Brand, the assistant attorney general for legal policy and a former White House attorney) did not answer questions about anonymously posted content and whether text comments on a blog would qualify for retention.

In practice, some Web businesses already make it a practice to store personal information forever. Google stores search terms indefinitely, for instance, while AOL says it deletes them after 30 days.

David Weekly, a San Francisco-area entrepreneur who founded popular Wiki-creation site PBWiki.com, said the Justice Department's proposal would be routinely evaded by people who use overseas sites to upload images. (PBWiki, which recently raised $2 million from Mohr Davidow Ventures, lets people embed photographs on pages they create with a point-and-click editor.)

If the proposal were to become law, PBWiki would already be in compliance, Weekly said. "We already keep all that data pretty much indefinitely because it's invaluable for us to mine and figure out how people use services," he said. "How do they use services now versus a year ago? Was February a bad month for traffic?...We already have the data there. It's already searchable. It's already indexed."

Getting Tough On Child Porn (MINNST)

By Dan Browning, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 3, 2007

Prosecuting child porn cases is a top priority for Minnesota's new U.S. attorney, who helped draft a no-holds-barred U.S. Department of Justice enforcement initiative a year ago. Child pornography isn't just dirty pictures, she says.

Bruce Betcher says he began searching the Web for sexually explicit photos of children in 2003, a predilection that led him to photograph two relatives -- both under 12 -- and three of their best friends in lascivious poses.

When he appears in federal court in Minneapolis on Tuesday, Betcher, a 53-year-old Burnsville property appraiser, could be sentenced to up to life in prison -- a longer term than if he had been convicted of first- or second-degree murder.

Extraordinary prison sentences for first-time offenders and a willingness of prosecutors to throw the book at them are evidence of an expanding crackdown by the federal government on anyone caught producing, possessing or distributing child pornography. Mandatory minimum sentences have been lengthened twice in the past three years, and a year ago the Department of Justice launched Project Safe Childhood, a no-holds-barred enforcement initiative that has made prosecution of child porn a top priority.

Rachel Paulose, the new U.S. attorney for Minnesota, helped draft that initiative and promised vigorous enforcement of existing laws.

A review of Minnesota cases brought by the government in the past year shows that it isn't prosecuting people who accidentally tripped across a photo or two. The cases thus far range from an international Internet consultant snared at the airport with child sex photos on his laptop to the father of three young girls who recorded himself raping and sodomizing them.

One man prosecuted in Minneapolis recently had more than 350,000 images of pornography, some of which included sexual penetration of toddlers. In another case, a Richfield man who worked as a pharmacy assistant sent child porn to an undercover agent and said he could drug young girls so they wouldn't remember being assaulted and photographed.

Though many of the cases were already underway when Paulose took office in February 2006, she's promising to bring more. Several recent search warrants indicate that she means it.

"You will, over time, see an increase," Paulose said.

Betcher's lawyer, Thomas Shiah, and other defense attorneys worry the federal sentencing guidelines are too harsh, particularly for first-time offenders like Betcher.

"You can do much more heinous crimes and do less time," Shiah said.

But in Betcher's case, Assistant U.S. Attorney Erica MacDonald urged the judge to follow the sentencing recommendation of life in prison. "The lives of five little girls and their families were irreparably damaged by this man and his deviant behavior," she said in a memo filed Friday.

Paulose, too, is unsympathetic to any pleas for mercy.

"To be blunt, no sentence would ever be long enough for a person who takes the innocence of a child," she said.

"Righteous sentences"

The government has been tightening the noose on child porn for years. Congress enacted the first law dealing specifically with child pornography in 1978. Ten years later, it made it illegal to use a computer to create or promote it.

The PROTECT Act, passed in 2003, set stiff mandatory minimum sentences. The Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act, enacted last summer, stiffened sentences even more and, among other things, established the Dru Sjodin National Sex Offender public website.

Inexpensive digital cameras and the Internet have made it easier than ever for people to create, distribute and acquire child pornography, but they have also made it easier for investigators to track their footprints.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation says it has more agents working on child porn than any other program in its Cyber Division. Since 1996, the Innocent Images National Initiative to target child porn on the Internet has resulted in 5,752 criminal cases.

The Department of Justice began funding regional Internet Crimes Against Children (ICAC) task forces in 1998 to help state and local law enforcement agencies investigate online child exploitation. In January 2006, the Justice Department awarded $14 million to the 46 task forces. A month later, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales decreed child-porn prosecutions a top priority, and he said federal law enforcement agencies would help state investigators and nongovernmental agencies to attack the problem.

Until recently, Minnesota's ICAC task force had just one full-time investigator. But last year the Minnesota Legislature voted to kick in $1 million a year, and the task force is moving from the St. Paul Police Department into the Bureau of Criminal Apprehension (BCA), which is assigning four agents, two forensic analysts, an information technology expert and a trainer to the task force, according to BCA Superintendent Tim O'Malley.

Federal prison sentences for child porn producers more than doubled between 1994 and 2005, and defense attorneys expect them to get even longer as a result of recent congressional action.

Federal prosecutors in Minnesota are pushing for and getting maximum sentences.

"In the last six months we have obtained three sentences of terms that are 30 years, 30 years and 10 years, respectively," Paulose said. "We think those are righteous sentences."

Tougher laws and more resources will undoubtedly result in more criminals being brought to justice, said David Finkelhor, director of the Crimes Against Children Research Center at the University of New Hampshire. But he cautioned that no one really knows whether the Internet has spawned an actual increase in child pornography production in recent years or merely helped law enforcement agents uncover it.

St. Paul police Sgt. Bill Haider, the lone investigator on the Minnesota ICAC task force, said he hasn't noticed an increase recently in child porn cases in Minnesota. But the Internet has allowed people who have sexual interests in children to find others like themselves. "And for them, it leads them to believe that it's more normal," he said.

The FBI, U.S. Postal Inspection Service, Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Internal Revenue Service, Secret Service, and state and local police all play a role in finding child porn online. Investigators work undercover in chat rooms, trace suspects through Internet service providers (ISPs) and credit card companies, track down peer-to-peer file sharing networks and follow tips.

ISPs such as Yahoo and Comcast, though not required to look for child porn, are now legally required to report evidence of it on their networks.

Haider said that most of the cases he gets are referrals from the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, a private nonprofit agency mandated by Congress to help law enforcement. It operates an online reporting service at www.cybertipline.com.

In 2004, the national center referred 492 reports in Minnesota, said Michelle Collins, director of the exploited-child unit. The total declined to 275 reports in 2005, but rose again last year to 353.

The center also works with U.S. law enforcement and Interpol to identify victims of child abuse, whose photos persist online for years. As of last week, the center had identified 992 children in these photos, up from 886 at the beginning of the year.

The increase is a direct result of law enforcement agencies working together, Collins said. And that's just what led to Betcher's arrest.

A Brownie uniform

In August 2005, federal agents in Atlanta seized a computer with more than 2,000 images of child pornography from a Georgia police sergeant. Alert investigators noticed the partial insignia of a Minnesota Brownie uniform, and that eventually led them to identify a girl in the photo as a relative of Betcher's. He was charged and convicted of 24 counts of producing child pornography, one count of distributing it and one count of possessing it.

The sentencing guidelines suggest piling on extra prison time because of the repeat nature of his offenses, and the fact that he was in a position of authority over the children he photographed.

A similar thing happened to Steven Koenen, 45, of Robbinsdale. He was snared by undercover FBI agents after he posted more than 30 child porn photos to an Internet news group in 2005. Investigators recovered more than 7,000 illicit images when they seized his computer equipment, and Koenen admitted to sexually assaulting three relatives, ages 3, 7 and 9.

Koenen is appealing a 30-year sentence meted out in July.

Paulose singled out his case as an example of why she's pursuing such cases so aggressively. Child pornography isn't just dirty pictures, she said.

"It's a visual depiction of a crime scene, and we need to take that seriously. I don't think a society can have any greater responsibility than protecting its children."

Stolen Painting Found In Spielberg's Collection (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian And Ashraf Khalil, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

The director, a major collector of works by Rockwell, contacts the FBI. An agent calls the movie mogul an 'unknowing victim.'

A Norman Rockwell painting stolen from a Missouri gallery 34 years ago was recovered and authenticated Friday in the collection of movie mogul Steven Spielberg.

Spielberg's spokesman, Marvin Levy, said the director's staff contacted the FBI several weeks ago after seeing a bulletin from the agency's Art Crime Team seeking clues about the theft of the "Russian Schoolroom" oil painting.

"The second anybody said, 'I think we have that painting,' [our] office got a hold of the FBI," Levy said.

Special Agent Chris Calarco of the FBI's Art Crime Team and Jessica Todd Smith, curator of American art for the Huntington Library, inspected the painting Friday afternoon at Spielberg's offices on the Universal Studios lot. The filmmaker was not present.

"He's an absolutely unknowing victim in this," Calarco said of Spielberg.

Calarco declined to speculate on the painting's value, but two sources close to the investigation said it is worth between $700,000 and $1 million.

The painting, depicting schoolchildren in a classroom looking at a bust of Soviet leader Vladimir Lenin, was stolen during an exhibit at a small art gallery in Clayton, Mo., in June 1973.

According to the FBI, its whereabouts were unknown until 1988, when it was sold at an auction in New Orleans for about $70,000.

Spielberg bought the painting from an art dealer in 1989 for an undisclosed sum, Calarco said.

The director is a high-profile Rockwell collector who helped found the Norman Rockwell Museum in Stockbridge, Mass.

As of last fall, he was listed as the museum's third vice president and a member of its board of trustees.

"He's certainly one of the collectors of Rockwell," said Levy, who wasn't sure how many Rockwell paintings Spielberg owns or where he kept "Russian Schoolroom." "We have a few in our office on the Universal lot."

The probe into the original theft lay dormant until 2004, when art crime investigators determined that the painting had been advertised for sale at a Norman Rockwell exhibit in New York in 1989.

Agents in the New York and Los Angeles field offices began putting out bulletins in art circles and tracking down known Rockwell collectors.

"We were basically just about to figure it out when the Spielberg people made the connection," Calarco said.

Linda Pero, curator of the Norman Rockwell Museum in Stockbridge, Mass., said: "I think it's really wonderful."

The FBI made the Spielberg link public late Friday, after an earlier notice — published in today's Calendar section — that the painting may have been found.

For now, the painting will remain in Spielberg's possession.

"I just advised them to hold on to it. It's safe there," Calarco said.

Governor Weighs Compromise Plan On Death Penalty (WP)

By John Wagner

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

Short of Repeal, O'Malley Seeks Limits

Gov. Martin O'Malley, who testified last month in favor of repealing Maryland's death penalty, has started exploring a compromise with lawmakers that would limit the possibility of execution to just a few types of offenders, such as inmates who kill prison guards.

Aides to O'Malley (D) say that such a deal might be the best hope for passing legislation that would tighten the scope of the state's death penalty. But that could put the governor at odds with advocates of a repeal, who say that the strategy could backfire and result in a bill that differs little from current law.

A debate that has focused on the death penalty's value as a deterrent along with problems with lethal injection, advocates say, could degenerate into a fight over which categories of killers -- including those who kidnap, rape and abuse children -- should be eligible for execution.

In an interview yesterday, O'Malley said he thinks most lawmakers are firm in their views on the death penalty, which could make it difficult to persuade enough of them to support a full repeal.

"I don't see that changing a lot in the four years ahead," O'Malley said. "I try to make progress wherever we can make progress, trusting future leaders and generations to reach perfection."

O'Malley met this week with Sen. Alex X. Mooney (R-Frederick), who is widely considered to hold the swing vote on the Senate committee considering the repeal, about whether he could support a bill narrowing eligibility for the death penalty.

Mooney, who has also talked with an O'Malley legislative aide, said he is trying to keep an open mind. Among those he said he would like to see remain eligible for the death penalty are people who kill police officers and prison guards.

"I've never been for a full repeal of the death penalty, but I've left the door open a crack that maybe I could vote for an amended bill," said Mooney, a conservative Republican and practicing Catholic.

Del. Samuel I. Rosenberg (D-Baltimore), lead sponsor of the repeal effort in the House, is among several death penalty opponents who have said that nothing short of a full repeal is acceptable.

"We want a repeal of the death penalty," Rosenberg said. "It's a system that's broken. We can't tinker with it. We can't fix it. We can't just limit it to a certain number of crimes."

During testimony before legislative panels last month, O'Malley said that the death penalty is "inherently unjust" because wrongly convicted people could be put to death.

He also said that there is no evidence that executions are an effective deterrent to murder and that money spent prosecuting death penalty cases could be better spent fighting violent crime.

Five people have been put to death in Maryland since executions resumed in 1978, and one person has been released from death row after being exonerated. There are six people on death row.

Under current law, those guilty of first-degree murder are eligible for the death penalty if prosecutors can prove at least one of 10 aggravating factors, including killing a law enforcement officer and committing murder while in prison. Other categories include contract killings and killings of kidnap victims.

Debate over a bill that includes any of those categories inevitably will open the door to efforts to add others, lawmakers on both sides of the issue say.

"Once you say you're going to use the death penalty, it's difficult to draw lines and say who's worse than other guys on the list," said Sen. Brian E. Frosh (D-Montgomery), a death penalty opponent and chairman of the Judicial Proceedings Committee.

Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. (D-Calvert), a death penalty supporter, said he cannot see his chamber limiting executions to just a few categories of killers.

Some death penalty opponents say they probably have the votes to pass a full repeal in the House this session. Even if they are short in the Senate, some say, it would be a mistake to compromise.

A court ruling in December halted executions until the state issues new regulations on lethal injection. Jane Henderson, executive director of Maryland Citizens Against State Executions, said she thinks it is unlikely that executions will resume before next year's legislative session, when odds of a repeal would be no worse.

"I think a year from now, we'll still have an effective moratorium," Henderson said. She also said that it makes no sense to reserve the death penalty for narrow classes of offenders. "My view is, this is about whether we should have the death penalty or not."

Richard J. Dowling, executive director of the Maryland Catholic Conference, said that a bill that stops short of a full repeal could be expanded. "A door that is ajar only slightly can be pushed wide open," he said.

Dangerous Pursuits (LAT)

The Supreme Court considers limits on high-speed chases, but police departments should be the ones changing policy.

IF YOU WORRY — as you should — about the dangers of high-speed police chases, don't expect the U.S. Supreme Court to impose new limits on the practice. This week, several justices reacted skeptically to the claim of a Georgia man that he should be allowed to sue a deputy sheriff because he was paralyzed after a police car rammed his vehicle.

Fortunately, in Los Angeles and elsewhere, police forces are acting on their own to limit the dangers such chases pose to police, suspects and the public. Sensible regulations are a better safeguard against out-of-control chases than a Supreme Court ruling making it easier for suspects injured in such cases to sue police officers.

A good thing too, because the case argued Monday was a poor candidate for a sweeping decision against police. A lawyer for Victor Harris, who is now a quadriplegic, asked the court to extend to car chases its 1985 ruling that police pursuing someone on foot may not use deadly force unless the suspect poses "a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others."

Unluckily for Harris, the justices were able to view a videotape of the nine-mile chase that began when police tried to stop Harris for speeding. Justice Antonin Scalia called it "the scariest chase I ever saw since 'The French Connection.' "

A majority of the court seems likely to embrace the position of the Bush administration. Deputy U.S. Solicitor General Gregory Garre told the court that when a suspect "demonstrates a disregard for his own life and the lives of others in his path, the police may use force, including deadly force, to bring the suspect's vehicle flight to a halt and protect the public safety."

The problem is that police chases are often prolonged not because the officers fear that a driver will injure others but because they don't want to lose their man — even if the only crime he has committed is speeding, and even when pursuing him poses a danger to bystanders.

The best way to rein in overzealous officers is to do what the Los Angeles Police Department has done: establish a pursuit policy that places the safety of the public above the goal of apprehending a motorist who hasn't committed a serious crime or who can be arrested later. The policy says that ramming a fleeing car is a "last resort" to be used only when necessary to save lives.

Technology also may help. The LAPD has experimented with an air-propelled miniature dart equipped with a global positioning device. Fired from a patrol car, it sticks to a fleeing vehicle and allows police to track it.

However the Supreme Court rules in the Georgia case, responsible police departments will continue to tell officers to take it slow — for their own and the public's protection.

Justice Department Drops Inquiry Into Cowboy Church's Worship Rights (ROT)

By Ana Ribeiro

Roanoke Times, March 3, 2007

Bedford County could review the ordinance the church was deemed to have violated.

The Justice Department has dropped an inquiry into whether Bedford County violated a church's rights by limiting their ability to worship in a Moneta barn.

The Rev. Ray Bell of the Cowboy Church of Virginia made the announcement at a news conference Thursday. In a phone interview, he said he's "puzzled, but not upset" about the agency's decision.

Controversy surrounded the Cowboy Church for months. Services temporarily ceased at the Moneta barn last spring when Bedford County cited violations to a zoning and safety ordinance.

Services resumed last summer after advocates flooded county officials with phone calls. The Constitution guarantees people the right to worship and assemble, supporters have argued -- and that includes followers of the cowboy culture who hold their weekday services on a farm.

A Feb. 16 letter to Bell from the Justice Department states: "We carefully reviewed the information that you have provided and determined that no further action by the Department is warranted."

Bell had provided information on the issue to the Justice Department, but only after the agency asked for it, he said. He did not personally request an investigation, Bell said.

Bell said he prayed for Bedford County not to have to pay fines as a result of a possible Justice Department decision against the county's ordinance, and had his prayers answered.

Now, it's likely that the county will talk about reviewing the ordinance, Bell said.

"The end product is we wanted the ordinance changed or modified," he said. "We're delighted that Bedford County didn't undergo any financial duress due to this."

U.S. Won't Corral 'cowboy' Church (RTD)

By Justin Faulconer, MEDIA GENERAL NEWS SERVICE

Richmond Times-Dispatch, March 3, 2007

Justice Department decides not to get involved in zoning dispute in Bedford County

LYNCHBURG -- The U.S. Department of Justice has decided to step out of a zoning dispute between a "cowboy" church and Bedford County officials.

In letters last month to the Rev. Raymond Bell of the Cowboy Church of Virginia and George Nester, Bedford's community development director, the federal department concluded no further action is warranted in deciding if Bedford zoning laws infringe upon a federal act that protects religious land use.

The church holds services in a large barn off Horseshoe Bend Road in Moneta.

Six months ago, the department began investigating whether the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act was violated. Bell has opposed the county's requirement that a special-use permit be obtained to hold religious services, claiming it violates the separation of church and state.

Nester said it's standard procedure that churches obtain a special-use permit to hold religious services in newly constructed buildings or new additions to existing buildings.

A spokesperson for the Department of Justice declined to comment about the matter. Bell also declined to comment but said he would have more to say later this week.

The Cowboy Church started meeting about a year ago in the Moneta barn, on a farm owned by Garland Simmons. Since then, it has been involved in zoning red tape with the county.

The county originally said using the barn as a church violated building codes and was unsafe for large gatherings. That matter has since been resolved because it was determined the structure is not predominantly used as a church, Nester said.

The church is still holding services under the Cowboy Church name because of its part-time utilization of the barn, Nester said.

"We have no problem with it operating as it is," he said.

County officials are reviewing and amending the Comprehensive Plan. The next step would be to review the zoning ordinance. Nester said the county should take a closer look at the language regarding religious land use to ensure there are no infringements on the federal act.

Defense Argues Conflict Of Interest In Seale Case (JCL)

By Jerry Mitchell

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, March 3, 2007

Lawyer says judge, magistrate have ties to U.S. attorney's office

U.S. District Judge Henry Wingate and U.S. Magistrate Judge Linda Anderson should step down from the case involving the 1964 slayings of two black teenagers, the attorney for reputed Klansman James Seale said Friday.

Wingate and Anderson happen to be the only African-American judges in the Southern District of Mississippi, but Federal Public Defender Dennis Joiner made no mention of that fact. Instead, he argued the judges have a prior association with the U.S. attorney's office and the case had been assigned to another judge and magistrate judge initially.

In January, Seale pleaded innocent to the federal kidnapping and conspiracy charges in connection with the May 2, 1964, abduction of Henry Hezekiah Dee and Charles Eddie Moore, reportedly by Klansmen. The teenagers were hitchhiking in Meadville when they were grabbed and beaten before being drowned in the Mississippi River, according to FBI reports.

Seale, now 71, faces an April 2 trial. If convicted, he could receive life in prison.

Joiner accused U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton of manipulating the system to have these judges hear the case.

"The U.S. Attorney has had the sole ability to select which specific district court judge he wants to sit on any criminal case in the Jackson Division," Joiner wrote. "He does this by asking the grand jury to return an indictment during a month assigned to a particular judge."

Joiner pointed out Wingate and Anderson both have served at the U.S. attorney's office - Anderson during the time the case was reinvestigated. Wingate was appointed to the bench in 1985.

It will be up to Wingate to rule on the matter.

In his motion filed Friday with the U.S. District Court in Jackson, Joiner produced a July 25 document that showed the case then as being in the Western Division. By rule, all Western Division cases are assigned to U.S. District Judge David Bramlette, Joiner said.

Documents also show the case was originally assigned to U.S. Magistrate Judge James Sumner, Joiner said. "There has been no order entered in the record transferring the case from Judge Wingate to another district court judge, nor has there been any order transferring the case from James C. Sumner to another magistrate judge."

Lampton responded Friday that he doesn't know why the case was moved from Sumner to Anderson and that he had nothing to do with that switch.

He said there's nothing improper with the way his office has handled the case.

Documents filed Friday also make clear Charles Marcus Edwards will be a likely witness against Seale. Last year, federal authorities gave Edwards immunity in exchange for him testifying before the federal grand jury investigating the killings.

Both Seale and Edwards were arrested Nov. 6, 1964, in connection with the slayings. At the time, Edwards confessed his involvement in the beatings. Authorities confronted Seale about his alleged involvement, according to FBI records. "We know you did it. You know you did. The Lord above knows you did it."

"Yes," Seale was quoted as replying. "But I'm not going to admit it. You are going to have to prove it."

Local authorities never pursued the case, and it languished like many others from the civil rights era.

Justice Department officials announced this week they're reexamining about a dozen cases from that era in hopes they can be pursued.

The newly introduced Emmett Till Unsolved Crime Act would give the Justice Department additional resources to pursue these cases, said Alvin Sykes of Kansas City, who conceived the bill.

"We want anybody involved in killing, lynching or kidnapping investigated or prosecuted - or we want them to die in fear of being arrested," he said. "We want to find as much truth as possible so we can secure as much justice as possible."

Savannah Morning News, March 3, 2007

ATLANTA - A civil rights group that has pushed for years to reopen state and federal investigations into the decades-old lynching at Moore's Ford Bridge near Monroe said Friday they are pleased that the U.S. Department of Justice has decided to take another look at the case.

"You just feel like the rule of law is going to prevail," said state Rep. Tyrone Brooks, D-Atlanta, who is president of the Georgia Association of Black Elected Officials.

The group has pushed since at least 1998 for new investigations into killings of two black couples - Mae and George Dorsey along with Dorothy and Roger Malcom - in the summer of 1946.

Brooks said his group has been aware for more than a year that the FBI was probing the Moore's Ford case again but kept the information quiet to avoid interfering with the probe.

But during a press conference Tuesday, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller announced that the Justice Department was reopening the investigations of some Civil Rights Era killings, including the Moore's Ford case. The Georgia Bureau of Investigation reopened its investigation several years ago on the orders of then-Gov. Roy Barnes.

Brooks said local activists have kept up with at least five living suspects who were identified in the original FBI report following the 1946 killings. Brooks' group and local organizations also have been talking to witnesses.

"We're going to be making an appeal to the suspects to turn themselves in and avoid a long ordeal," Brooks said.

Brooks also said the group is working to boost its reward fund - from $27,000 to $100,000 - for information leading to the arrest and conviction of those guilty of the murders.

GABEO also announced its annual April 4 commemoration of the lynchings to coincide with the anniversary of the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and its July 25 re-enactment of the killings.

Brooks said one of the living suspects usually makes it a point to drive his pickup across the bridge during the re-enactments.

"He drives across real slow, and he'll look at us, and we'll look back," Brooks said.

This year, however, both sides will know that the investigation of what happened in that same place 61 years ago is not over.

"I think suspects should be getting a little nervous right now," Brooks said.

In Victory For Hispanics, Judge Halts Port Chester Elections (NYT)

By Barbara Whitaker

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

WHITE PLAINS, March 2 — A federal judge on Friday stopped March elections for two seats on the Port Chester Board of Trustees, finding there was sufficient evidence to make the case that the village's at-large system for voting discriminates against Hispanic residents.

In a 32-page ruling read from the bench, Judge Stephen C. Robinson of Federal District Court found merit in virtually every argument made by Justice Department lawyers seeking an injunction to stop the March 20 elections. The village, however, may still hold a mayoral election scheduled for the same day, the judge ruled.

"I think what we heard in court says everything," said Cesar Ruiz, a Hispanic man who filed a complaint with the Justice Department after an unsuccessful bid for village trustee in 2001. "I'm very pleased."

The village trustees scheduled an executive session for Saturday morning to discuss the case and decide whether to continue its fight against breaking the village into six voting districts, one of which would be predominantly Hispanic, to replace its at-large system.

Anthony G. Piscionere, who is representing the village in the case, said he believed that the village still had a chance of winning, particularly if the case went to appeal. A trial date has been set for April 16 through April 20.

"The question is whether the board wants to continue or not," he said.

Dan Brakewood, a trustee, said he thought it was time to bring an end to the case, which he estimated had cost the village $500,000.

"We have looked at whether we are in violation or not for 11 months," Mr. Brakewood said. "Now we have the facts and information we need to move on. We need to settle this. It's in the best interest of the community."

Mayor Gerald L. Logan defended the current system, saying that officials had reached out to Hispanics in an attempt to include them in the system. He noted that 10 percent of the Police Department is Hispanic and that Hispanics held positions on some village boards.

The lawsuit, filed by the Justice Department in December, charges that the at-large system — meaning that all residents of the village vote for all candidates on the ballot — is unfairly weighted against Hispanic residents, a violation of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. According to the lawsuit, the system allows for white bloc voting, which inhibits Hispanic voters' ability to elect their preferred candidate.

To support their case, the government presented statistics noting that more than 46 percent of the village's population and 21.9 percent of its voting age citizens are Hispanic, yet no Hispanic person has ever been elected to public office in the village. In arguments on whether the March elections should be held, David Kennedy, an assistant United States attorney, said going forward with the elections would perpetuate the discriminatory system.

Village lawyers argued that Hispanics have been invited to participate in the election process, but have often declined. They suggested that the problem is one of voter apathy and said steps are being taken to increase voter participation, particularly that of Hispanics, in the community. To divide the small village of 28,000, about 30 miles from New York City, into voting districts would ultimately segregate the village, lawyers argued.

In order to make a case for stopping the elections, the government had to prove several points, including that the minority group was geographically compact and sufficiently large enough to constitute a majority in a district; that the minority group was politically cohesive; and that the majority voted as a bloc to enable it to usually defeat the minority's preferred candidate. In addition, the government had to prove that there were other circumstances that impaired the ability of the minority.

Among the other points examined was whether there had been a history of discrimination that affected the rights of minorities to participate in the democratic process, whether elections were racially polarized, whether candidates had been denied access to the process to get on the ballot and the extent to which members of the minority group have been elected to public office in the jurisdiction.

The judge called the last stipulation one of the most important, noting that no one disputed that no member of the Hispanic community in Port Chester had ever been elected to public office.

"Indeed, in all the trustee elections studied by both sides in this case through 2006, only two Hispanics have ever been on the ballot in a Port Chester trustee election — Jose Santos in 1992 and Cesar Ruiz in 2001 — and both finished last in their respective fields," Judge Robinson said.

Federal Judge Halts Port Chester Election (NYJN)

By Liz Sadler, THE JOURNAL NEWS

New York Journal News, March 3, 2007

A federal judge yesterday halted Port Chester's March 20 election for two seats on the Board of Trustees, saying the village election system discriminates against Hispanic voters.

In an oral decision, U.S. District Judge Stephen Robinson cited evidence of racial polarization in Port Chester's at-large election system. He said that if the case goes to trial, the U. S. Justice Department was likely to succeed in its claim that the current election system dilutes the Hispanic vote in violation of the federal Voting Rights Act.

"It is clear to this court that Hispanic voters in Port Chester prefer different candidates, and that non-Hispanic voters generally vote as a bloc to defeat the Hispanic-preferred candidate," Robinson said, capping a two-week hearing on whether the current election system discriminates against Hispanics. It is the first time a judge has stopped an election in Westchester County.

Village officials expressed disappointment, but most declined to comment on whether they wanted to continue to fight the lawsuit. The board will meet with its lawyers today to discuss the next steps. It may choose to settle with the Justice Department and adopt voting districts or go to trial. The village also can appeal the injunction to the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

It has already spent some $472,000 on lawyer fees and other legal expenses, draining what was a $2.5 million fund balance and raising some questions about whether to proceed.

"It is in the best interest of our village to reach a resolution with the Department of Justice," Democratic Trustee Daniel Brakewood said after the decision. "We cannot afford to spend more taxpayer dollars trying to maintain a flawed and outdated election system. This fight has also divided our community, and continued litigation will only make a bad situation worse."

Anthony Piscionere, a lawyer for the village, expressed doubts about whether he could win a trial before Robinson, but was already predicting the outcome of an appeal.

"I think this case is very winnable in the 2nd Circuit, from what we've seen so far," Piscionere said. "That's a decision the board is going to have to make."

U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said in a statement: "In bringing this suit, the Justice Department sought to vindicate the voting rights of minority citizens in the village of Port Chester. I am pleased that Judge Robinson ... found that the United States is likely to succeed on the merits of its claim that the village of Port Chester's system for electing its Board of Trustees violates Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act."

Robinson's decision does not affect the March mayoral election, and retiring Mayor Gerald Logan, a Republican, said he saw no reason to postpone the race. As village officials huddled with their attorneys, Hispanic advocates basked in victory outside the courthouse.

"I feel very, very happy right now," said Cesar Ruiz, an unsuccessful trustee candidate whose complaint to the Justice Department triggered the federal investigation into Hispanic voter disenfranchisement in the village. He filed papers yesterday seeking to join the suit as a plaintiff.

"What I like about this is it just doesn't open up the doors for myself," Ruiz said. "It opens it up for a lot of people in Port Chester that have been frustrated with the way this system is."

The Justice Department sued the village in December, challenging the method it uses to elect its six trustees. It wants the village to replace its voting system - in which trustees are elected in a villagewide vote - with one in which they are elected from different districts.

Robinson said his decision was based largely on the village trustee and mayoral elections from 2001 to 2006, when the candidates preferred by Hispanics lost 12 of 15 races. Robinson said he did not believe whites voted differently from Hispanics because of racial bias, but the results prove that "polarization is present in Port Chester."

The judge said he was also "struck" by a suggestion by Aldo Vitagliano, a lawyer from Port Chester, at an October public hearing on voting districts. Vitagliano asked Congress to introduce an amendment exempting Port Chester from the Voting Rights Act, then was appointed special counsel to a commission formed to examine how to best implement voting districts.

"That a lawyer would make such a suggestion is unusual enough, but the fact that the village subsequently named this individual as counsel to the newly formed Voting Rights Commission in the village was, to say the least, surprising," Robinson said. Vitagliano also served as associate counsel to Piscionere during the hearing.

In his decision, Robinson said the village had met the three preconditions established in a 1986 voting rights case, Thornburg vs. Gingles, to determine a violation of Section 2 - the minority is sufficiently large and geographically compact, the minority is politically cohesive and the white majority votes in a bloc that usually defeats the minority's preferred candidate.

"I think the judge's ruling today gives a strong sense of the likelihood of our success in court," said Democratic Trustee Dennis Pilla, who is running for mayor.

In Florida, Osceola County spent nearly 18 months and about $2 million fighting a similar federal voting rights suit, according to The Orlando Sentinel. In December, after losing at trial, county commissioners decided to abide by a federal judge's order to implement single-member voting.

Jon Greenbaum, a former Justice Department lawyer who now works for the Washington-based Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, a nonprofit legal organization, said the chances of Port Chester wining at trial are "very slight."

"You would think they would look to settle the case now," he said. "The advantage, if they settle the case, is they have some control of what the plan's going to look like. If they go to trial, they will get the first option in terms of proposing a remedy, but if they can't agree on a plan, the court could end up going with the plan the DOJ proposed."

Robinson has set aside trial dates of April 16-20.

Black Lawyer's Suit Accuses Cochran Law Firm Of Racial Bias (LAT)

By Jessica Garrison, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

For decades, the law firm founded by the late Johnnie L. Cochran Jr. has been renowned as a black-run institution fighting for civil rights and against police abuse — not to mention getting O.J. Simpson acquitted of murder charges.

But now, in a development that has dismayed some in Los Angeles' African American community, attorney Shawn Chapman Holley has sued the firm, claiming, among other things, that its leaders discriminated against her because she is black.

Holley said that after Cochran's death in 2005, leadership of the firm was turned over to white men who began to discriminate against black lawyers and black clients.

Neither she nor her attorneys would comment on the suit, although she released a statement through her lawyer:

"In deference to the memory of Johnnie Cochran and in deference to his family, I do not intend to engage in a public airing of our disagreements. The lawsuit speaks for itself, and this matter will be litigated in the courts."

Randy H. McMurray, a partner in the firm, denied Holley's charges.

"We probably have the most diverse law firm in California. I don't know what race we would be discriminating against," he said, noting that he and another partner in the L.A. office, Brian Dunn, are black.

News of the suit raised eyebrows among some members of the city's black establishment.

"Racial discrimination at the Cochran firm?" asked public affairs consultant Kerman Maddox. "When you think Johnnie Cochran, you think best and brightest in the black community.

"I'm shocked. If true, that would be a devastating blow to the legacy of Johnnie Cochran."

Cochran, the great-grandson of slaves, founded his firm in 1965. He was best known nationally for his successful defense of Simpson against charges that he murdered his ex-wife, Nicole Brown Simpson, and her friend Ronald Lyle Goldman.

But for decades before those 1994 killings, Cochran was well-known in Los Angeles for a string of cases in which he won historic financial settlements and helped bring about lasting changes in police procedure.

By the time of his death two years ago from an inoperable brain tumor, his firm had gone national, with offices in 20 U.S. cities.

Other changes brought controversy, including a merger with a national criminal defense firm, headquartered in Santa Monica, and the departure of Holley and another black partner, Eric Ferrer, who also had worked extensively with Cochran.

Holley, who worked with Cochran for 17 years, was appointed two years ago to be a liaison between the civil and criminal sides of the firm, according to her suit.

She claims that she became concerned about the quality of criminal representation being offered to clients. But when she raised her concerns with the partners at the Cochran firm, they ignored her, then demoted her, she says.

According to the suit, the demotion was approved by five managers of the firm, four of whom "are Caucasian males."

Then, in January 2006, according to her suit, she was fired.

McMurray, the Cochran firm partner, denied terminating Holley.

"She was not fired," he said. "Our perceptions of her leaving the firm are different."

ANTITRUST:

TXU Trading Ahead Of Deal Is Scrutinized (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, March 3, 2007

On Feb. 23, rumors began circulating in Washington that Texas utility giant TXU Corp. was close to striking an agreement with environmentalists opposing the company's plans to build new power plants. The company's shares surged 4% that day, as did trading in its options.

There was a deal, in fact. It was to sell the entire company. And, according to a Securities and Exchange Commission complaint filed late Friday, someone apparently already had begun trading illegally on the information.

The SEC issued a temporary restraining order on certain unknown accounts Friday, for trading in call options that first began on Feb. 21, two days before word leaked that the utility was to be sold to private-equity firms. These unknown traders -- the SEC plans to identify them in further litigation -- scored $5.4 million in profits, the agency alleges.

REACTION FROM THE DEAL JOURNAL

• Dana Cimilluca: Christopher Cox is Listening1

Such activity has been at the center of suspicious market moves around a number of recent mergers and acquisitions. The total dollar value of these moves, however, far exceeds the figures involved in this case, which was brought in a U.S. District Court for Northern Illinois.

In the days leading up to the deal, TXU's buyers were in discussions with a number of outside parties. Their hope was to convince both environmental groups and Texas lawmakers about the merits of its offer.

Such discussions are usually governed by strict confidentiality agreements, which is supposed to guarantee negotiations go on in secret. These agreements are supposed to protect sellers from leaks that might affect its stock price.

Buyers are always free to get waivers for these sorts of things. But that didn't happen in this case, people familiar with the matter said.

TXU spokesman Brian Tulloh said that "We don't have any objections to the contacts that they made with environmental groups or policy makers."

Jeffer Eller, a spokesman for the buyers, said: "We believe that we complied with the confidentiality agreement."

Watchdog Freezes Assets From TXU Trades (FT)

By Jeremy Grant And Stephanie Kirchgaessner In Washington

Financial Times, March 3, 2007

US federal regulators on Friday secured a court order freezing more than $5m in assets belonging to unknown traders who bought TXU call options a few days before the $45bn sale of the US utility to private equity groups.

The Securities and Exchange Commission said the buyers of the options "engaged in illegal insider trading". The SEC said the "highly profitable and suspicious purchases" were made through overseas accounts late last month ahead of the deal announced on February 26.

In a sign of the global scope of the case, the SEC was helped by the UK's Financial Services Authority and Swiss counterparts. It comes in the same week that current and former employees of three top Wall Street banks were charged by federal prosecutors with insider trading.

Regulators uncovered the use of overseas accounts to trade options at the Chicago Board Options Exchange in advance of the announcement of TXU's purchase by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, Texas Pacific Group and Goldman Sachs.

The SEC said unknown traders made purchases of call-option contracts three times last week through accounts at Credit Suisse in Zurich, broker Fimat in Frankfurt and UBS in London.

The price of TXU shares jumped by 13 per cent after the deal was announced, netting the traders more than $5.3m.

The SEC has contacted the firms that handled the trades to try to identify the traders, but lawyers said they had enough evidence of insider trading without knowing who the perpetrators were.

Kevin Edmundson, trial counsel in the SEC's Fort Worth office, said: "The presumption is based on the timing and the sizes of the trades, particularly on February 23, which strongly suggests that a person or entity was acting on confidential information."

The TXU deal stands apart from traditional mergers and acquisitions because the companies involved engaged in a fairly widespread lobbying campaign to line up support for the transaction before it was announced.

A few days before the deal was first leaked on the CNBC television channel on Friday after the close of the market, representatives for the buy-out groups involved pitched the takeover to the Environmental Defense Fund, Public Citizen, and the Natural Resources Defense Council.

Then, on Thursday – a day before it was first reported – the buy-out groups reached out to legislators and the governor of Texas. It is far from clear whether the lobbying campaign is connected to the insider trading allegations.

U.S. Is Investigating Trades Made Just Before TXU Deal (NYT)

By Eric Dash

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

Federal regulators froze more than $5.3 million that they suspect may be profits from insider trading of TXU stock options that occurred just days before a $45 billion buyout of the Texas energy company.

The Securities and Exchange Commission is trying to identify who made at least three large and unusually well-timed bets that TXU's stock would rise.

The trading occurred from Feb. 21 to Feb. 23; two private equity firms, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company and the Texas Pacific Group, announced the deal on Feb. 26.

Federal investigators hope to track down the traders by untangling a web of transactions that passed through offshore accounts of several large banks and brokerage firms.

In papers filed yesterday in Federal District Court in Chicago, the S.E.C. froze more than $5.3 million that may be held in the domestic accounts of UBS Securities, Credit Suisse and Fimat Banque Frankfurt. It hopes to recover any gains linked to insider trading. Without the identities of any suspects, the commission said that it would need help from its counterparts overseas.

Yesterday's action comes as securities regulators have been signaling their intent to crack down on insider trading. On Thursday, the S.E.C. and the Justice Department accused more than a dozen people and hedge funds of making more than $15 million from an insider trading ring.

It is unclear whether the Justice Department is pursuing its own insider trading case related to TXU. A spokeswoman for the United States attorney's office in Dallas, Kathy Colvin, declined to comment about whether it is investigating.

But federal securities regulators said they were trying to track down the traders who placed big bets before reports of the TXU deal. Activity in the options market surrounding the stock was unusually high days before the takeover; TXU's shares jumped more than 13 percent the day the deal was announced.

In particular, according to court filings, investigators are zeroing-in on a transaction on Feb. 23, when a trader made about $4.7 million in profit. The unidentified trader bought 6,700 TXU call-option contracts that expired in March 2007, essentially betting that shares of the energy company would go up.

Unwinding the web of transactions could prove difficult. The trade was traced to an omnibus account at UBS Securities, an American broker-dealer. That account, in turn, was linked to an account of its British affiliate in London, which possibly contained the transactions of dozens of account holders, according to court filings.

According to the filings, a UBS compliance officer said that UBS London was acting on behalf of its affiliate in Zurich. And furthermore, the filings said, the S.E.C. learned that data suggested that the UBS Securities trade was on behalf of Julius Baer, a Swiss broker and bank.

Smaller trades passed through Credit Suisse and Fimat Banque in Germany, according to the S.E.C. complaint. On Feb. 21, unknown traders made about $457,300 from call options bought through Credit Suisse in Zurich; those trades were cleared through its Swiss American Securities subsidiary. On Feb. 21 and Feb. 22, traders made about $150,000 from call options bought through Fimat Banque.

Federal regulators said that they had been in contact with all the parties involved in the TXU takeover deal, whom they called helpful and cooperative. Officials at the banks and broker-dealers were not reached for comment.

FINE PRINT Environmentalist Groups Feud Over Terms Of The TXU Buyout (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith And Jim Carlton

The Wall Street Journal, March 3, 2007

Just days after two of the nation's leading environmental groups blessed an investor plan to buy TXU Corp. and take the controversial Texas utility in a new and "greener" direction, a battle has broken out in the environmental community over the terms of the deal.

The Natural Resources Defense Council and Environmental Defense claimed victory Monday when a holding company formed by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co., Texas Pacific Group and other investors announced the biggest buyout in history, a plan to take over TXU for $32 billion plus the assumption of around $12 billion in debt. The environmental groups, two of the most powerful and best-funded in the U.S., said they had extracted a pledge from the investors to cancel a slew of coal-fired power plants, cut emissions and back federal global-warming legislation.

DEAL JOURNAL

1 • Read the Journal's new daily take2 on the high-stakes world of deal making, and see more in our new Deals & Deal Makers page3.

But now, opponents of the deal, in a blizzard of emails and Internet posts, have put the two organizations on the defensive by accusing them of settling for too little. The critics, who encompass a broad range of smaller environmental groups and individuals, say TXU should have been forced to give up all, not just some, of its future plans involving coal-fired power plants. The plants release substantial amounts of carbon dioxide, a heat-trapping gas blamed in part for climate change.

Even worse, some believe that the environmental interests were snookered. Since the buyout was announced, it has become apparent that some of the concessions involve projects that TXU was already planning to shelve for a variety of reasons. And TXU has fueled the skepticism further in recent days by outlining new loopholes in the pledge.

NRDC and Environmental Defense "should be hung for what they've done," fumed Tim Hermach, executive director of the Native Forest Council, a group in Eugene, Ore., whose main mission is protecting public forests from commercial logging and other industrial practices.

The infighting shows that tremendous disagreements remain over how tough green activists should be in their dealings with business. The TXU deal comes at a time when more businesses are choosing to work with environmentalists to avoid costly and embarrassing public fights on issues ranging from global warming to rampant logging. The Rainforest Action Network, for example, in recent years has forged deals with companies such as Home Depot Inc. to quit using wood products from endangered forests in exchange for public endorsements. Some timber companies in the Northwest have also gotten larger environmental groups to agree to forest-protection plans that allow for some degree of logging, despite continuing opposition from other grass-roots activists.

But it can be difficult to determine who is empowered to speak for the environmental movement. As is the case with TXU, these dealings often lead to charges from other environmentalists that their peers have been co-opted by big business in exchange for a seat at the table. "It can be flattering to be invited into this crowd," says Alan Muller, executive director of a group called Green Delaware, who is also among those criticizing the NRDC and Environmental Defense.

The environmentalists involved in the TXU negotiations scoff at that assertion. "We've been around long enough that we don't flatter very easily," said David Hawkins, director of the NRDC's climate center, who helped represent the 37-year-old organization in the deal.

Environmental Defense and the NRDC -- both based in New York -- are among the best-funded groups in the green world, with annual budgets totaling about $120 million combined. Both have policies against accepting most corporate contributions. The NRDC has a somewhat higher profile, with actors Robert Redford and Leonardo DiCaprio on its board of trustees.

TXU's would-be buyers also defend the deal. "I think it's inevitable there are critics to any change," said William K. Reilly, an administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency under former Presidents Bush and Clinton who now works as a senior advisor to Texas Pacific and led its group's talks with the environmentalists. "It's important to recognize that two of the most authoritative and experienced environmental organizations think this is a good deal."

New details of the agreement suggest it has big built-in loopholes that seem tailor-made for conflict. Under the agreement, the buyers said they'd suspend development efforts on eight of 11 planned coal-burning power plants.

But already, TXU Chief Executive C. John Wilder, who is expected to remain at the utility, is talking about the conditions that would allow TXU to "apply or reapply" for permits to build coal-fired plants in Texas. According to a transcript of a call with investors this week, Mr. Wilder said TXU wouldn't build plants burning pulverized coal "unless our customers face reliability issues, shortages leading to higher prices, or our competitors propose plants that are expected to have a meaningful impact on market dynamics."

Those circumstances appear likely to be met, perhaps as early as 2009, meaning TXU could revive construction efforts without breaking the deal if there's a scarcity of power caused by a dearth of new plants, or if plants come along that challenge TXU's strong position in the state's deregulated electricity market. Critics say these and other exceptions make it appear unlikely that TXU's agreement to move away from coal is as solid as it initially appeared. The state's grid operator said it fears reserves could slip into a danger zone as early as 2009, given a spurt in demand growth this year.

The environmental concessions were part of a package engineered by the private-equity buyers as a way of clearing political opposition to the TXU deal, which was bound to be controversial under any circumstances. Under Mr. Wilder's leadership, TXU has become greatly profitable, but also has drawn the ire of consumer and environmental groups for its rate increases and plans to build new coal-fired plants in Texas. Lately, TXU had been talking about building other such plants in other parts of the country.

The concessions announced by the environmental groups and the prospective buyers were worked out in secretive sessions last week, before the proposed deal became public. The agreement involves not just cutting back on coal plants in Texas, but also a pledge to back away from such projects in other regions. The buyers agreed to a general cutback in carbon-dioxide emissions. And the buyers agreed to a rate cut for some TXU customers in Texas.

The environmentalists involved in the deals say these were hard-won victories. For example, Jim Marston, an Environmental Defense attorney in Austin who led negotiations for the group, said that, through tough bargaining, he got commitments from the buyers that TXU wouldn't build coal plants in Pennsylvania, Virginia and "elsewhere." TXU's would-be buyers say the utility also was considering building a coal plant in Maryland, while Mr. Marston says Georgia was another potential site.

But some environmental interests in Texas were immediately bitter that the deal allowed three coal plants in Texas to proceed. Robert and Josephine Cervenka, farmers near Waco, already live within a mile or two of existing TXU plants and within about five miles of six proposed plants, including two by TXU. They formed an organization to fight construction of more plants in an area Mr. Cervenka calls "the ring of fire."

Initially overjoyed when they heard about the environmental deal with TXU, they quickly soured after learning that the proposed plants nearest them were going forward. Now, with the well-heeled national environmental groups out of the picture, they wonder how long they'll be able to carry on the fight. "We need money bad," said Ms. Cervenka.

Negotiators for both Environmental Defense and the NRDC say they wanted the other plants tabled, too, but were told TXU had spent too much on the projects to suspend development efforts. Besides, Mr. Reilly, the former EPA administrator, said Texas would have difficulty meeting rising demand without the plants. "You can accomplish a fair amount by improving energy efficiency in the state, but to say you can do so without adding plants at all isn't really feasible," Mr. Reilly said.

What the environmentalists didn't learn until later was that TXU's board already was considering killing some of the projects to quiet public outcry and to respond to changing political winds in Washington. In his investor call, Mr. Wilder said the management team and board already were "reshaping our development program to focus on a smaller number of plants" when they were approached by the buyout team.

Mr. Hawkins of the NRDC's climate center said his group was unaware of that -- but he added such a move wasn't surprising, given all the criticism TXU has faced.

A big point of contention is the givebacks involving plants TXU was targeting for other states. In fact, TXU hasn't filed for air or water permits in any of these states, nor has it purchased or obtained options on any parcels of land. And, given the fire storm it ignited in Texas with its $10 billion construction program, many observers said they doubted TXU really intended to wade deeper into controversy anytime soon.

Sierra Club officials in Texas said they still will oppose TXU's remaining three new coal plants and eight more proposed by others, working with consumer and property-rights groups. Sierra Club officials added they have empathy for the bind the NRDC and Environmental Defense were in. "I've been there before where...we've had to compromise," said Ken Kramer, the Sierra Club's Texas director, in Austin.

EMI's Board Rejects Warner's $4.1 Billion Bid As Inadequate (NYT)

By Jeff Leeds

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

The EMI Group of Britain, which releases music by the Beatles and Bob Seger, rejected a $4.1 billion takeover proposal yesterday from the Warner Music Group, signaling the latest turn in a long merger dance.

EMI said its board decided against Warner Music's cash offer, which was subject to "numerous assumptions and conditions," because it was not in the best interests of shareholders and placed too low a value on the company.

EMI, which has issued two profit warnings this year and is undertaking a broad restructuring, also said the offer carried regulatory uncertainty and "unacceptable operational risk at a critical time" for the company, which has been grappling with weak CD sales and sluggish industrywide sales of digital music.

EMI also said the bid of 260 pence a share, or $5.07, represented an "inadequate" offer considering the risks and the potential cost savings of a merger. The offer reflects a 17 percent premium over EMI's share price at the time it last announced it had been approached by Warner Music.

Wall Street analysts have considered a merger of EMI and Warner Music as inevitable, though many say the risk of antitrust regulators scotching the deal remains high and the companies' fortunes are uncertain. One analyst, Richard Greenfield of Pali Research, wrote two weeks ago that Warner Music's stock could be overvalued even if it purchased EMI at 250 pence a share.

Warner Music declined to comment.

Any deal would reshape the architecture of the music business, which is dominated by two giant conglomerates, the Universal Music Group and Sony BMG Music Entertainment, each about twice the size of EMI or Warner Music.

But recent talks between the companies have stalled on various issues, among them the question of who should bear the risk that regulators would block the transaction, according to executives briefed on the discussions. The two companies recently began new merger conversations after breaking off a round of talks last summer. At the time, Warner had offered 320 pence a share.

Those talks stalled when a European court overturned a regulatory decision that cleared the 2004 merger of the music divisions of Sony and Bertelsmann. Antitrust regulators said this week that they would reconsider the deal for the next four months while they gather pricing data and other information.

Warner Music officials thought they had raised the odds for an approval by striking an accord securing support from Impala, a European organization representing independent record labels, which had objected to previous tie-ups. But, in a protest gesture, one of the largest independent labels, Ministry of Sound, resigned from another British trade group that backed the deal.

EMI Dismisses 'non-binding' Warner Offer (FT)

By Emiko Terazono In London And Aline Van Duyn In New York

Financial Times, March 3, 2007

EMI, the UK music group behind Norah Jones and The Beatles, on Friday said it had dismissed a "non-binding proposal" from Warner Music at 260p a share.

The latest twist in the protracted merger talks comes as the European Commission this week launched an in-depth investigation into the merger of Sony and Bertelsmann's recorded music businesses.

Warner submitted its proposals on Thursday evening. EMI's board met on Friday and quickly moved to reject the offer. It said Warner's proposals – which would depend on regulatory clearance – were "subject to numerous assumptions and conditions", adding that 260p a share was inadequate.

EMI and Warner have been trying to create a combined group since 2000. After several failed attempts, talks revived last year, but were in effect put on ice when a European court ruled that the European Commission had made "manifest errors" in approving the Sony-BMG deal in 2004, and ordered a new probe on competition grounds. A final decision is expected by July 2.

Warner declined to comment on the move, but people familiar with its plans said the US music group believed that if it has a merger agreement with EMI in place, it would be in a better position to influence the commission's deliberations.

"The Commission is looking at Sony and BMG. It is a good chance to throw EMI and Warner in there so they can look at the music market as a whole," said one person close to Warner.

However, one big EMI shareholder said the proposal was too conditional and vague for the board to accept. "They did the right thing. There is nothing concrete on the table," he said.

Some shareholders are hoping that private equity investors will make a bid, not least because that would avoid regulatory obstacles.

The main opposition over consolidation of large music groups has come from independent record labels, which have been concerned that the combined groups would crowd out smaller music groups.

However, last month Warner struck a truce with Impala, which represents independent record labels, clearing the way for the US-listed group to make a bid for EMI.

EMI Rejects 2.1 Billion-Pound Proposal From Warner (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Zimri Smith And Don Jeffrey

Bloomberg, March 3, 2007

March 2 (Bloomberg) -- EMI Group Plc, the world's third- largest music company, rejected a 2.1 billion-pound ($4.1 billion) takeover bid from Warner Music Group Corp. as too low.

Warner offered 260 pence a share, London-based EMI said in a statement today. The bid was 17 percent higher than EMI's closing price Feb. 19, the day before it said it received an approach from New York-based Warner Music. EMI today called the proposal ``inadequate."

The rejection extends the maneuvering between two companies struggling with declining music sales and piracy. EMI and Warner abandoned $4.6 billion offers for each other in July on concern a combination would be blocked by European Union regulators.

``EMI's holding out for a better premium," said Bishop Cheen, a bond analyst with Wachovia Securities in Charlotte, North Carolina. ``These two companies, because of their size, do belong together. But it's going to take a long time."

Shares of EMI gained 10.5 pence, or 4.5 percent, to 246.25 pence in London. They have fallen 7.1 percent this year. Warner shares fell 55 cents, or 2.8 percent, to $19.03 at 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading and have lost 17 percent.

Warner offered 320 pence a share for EMI last June.

The combined company would have a quarter of the global market, moving ahead of Sony BMG Music Entertainment to rank second worldwide behind Vivendi SA's Universal Music Group.

European Regulators

EMI's rejection follows yesterday's decision by European Union regulators to begin a new investigation of the merger that created Sony BMG Music. A European court's rejection of that combination led EMI and Warner to abandon their bids last year.

``I had thought Warner would wait for a definitive ruling from Europe," Hal Vogel, an independent analyst based in New York, said in an interview. ``Maybe they felt they should rush this now and take advantage of the management turmoil at EMI.''

EMI, which released albums by Robbie Williams and Norah Jones in the second half of its fiscal year, said Feb. 14 it was experiencing an ``unprecedented level of market decline" and ``an exceptionally high level of product returns."

The company ousted its top two music executives, Alain Levy and David Munns, on Jan. 12 after disappointing holiday sales. Eric Nicoli, then chairman, was named chief executive officer. In December, EMI ended talks to be acquired by buyout firm Permira Advisers LLP, after failing to agree on a price.

Shrinking Sales

The North American market for compact discs has contracted 19 percent this year through Feb. 18 from a year ago, according to Nielsen SoundScan, which tracks music sales.

Warner, under Chief Executive Officer Edgar Bronfman Jr., said Feb. 8 that sales of recorded music slid 13 percent in the quarter ended Dec. 31. Demand for new releases fell from a year earlier, when the company had new albums from Madonna, James Blunt and Enya.

The two companies backed away from attempts to combine last year, after a July 13 ruling by the European Court of First Instance in Luxembourg cast doubt on whether a merger would win approval. The court said the European Commission, the EU's Brussels-based antitrust regulator, had only carried out ``an extremely cursory examination" of the Sony BMG merger. The court ordered a new review and the commission said yesterday it would rule by July 2.

Independent Labels

EMI said today the proposal from Warner ``would entail prolonged regulatory uncertainty and unacceptable operational risk at a critical time for the company."

Some analysts said the renewed bid by Bronfman, 51, would have a better chance this time because Warner has the support of the Independent Music Publishers and Labels Association or Impala, a trade group whose opposition to Sony BMG led the court to order the review of that deal.

``Getting this pledge from Impala increases the chances the deal will be approved," Tuna Amobi, an equity analyst with Standard & Poor's, said on Feb. 20 when Warner disclosed its renewed interest in EMI.

Warner Music said then there was ``a compelling logic in the combination of the two companies." Spokesman Will Tanous declined to comment today on the latest bid.

EMI's Nicoli, 56, has tried since 2000 to buy Warner, the world's fourth-largest music company, as a way to reduce costs.

Warner and EMI dropped efforts to merge in 2000 after regulators opposed the plan. EMI's attempt to buy Bertelsmann AG's BMG unit in 2001 was also stymied by regulators. EMI again failed to combine with Warner in 2003, when a group led by Bronfman won the bidding for Time Warner Inc.'s music unit.

EMI has two divisions: EMI Music, the recorded music unit, and EMI Music Publishing, which manages song copyrights. EMI said last month that the publishing unit ``continues to perform in line with expectations."

The U.K. company reported a first-half loss of 30.6 million pounds in November, saying sales fell 6.1 percent because this year's release schedule is weighted to the second half more than usual. EMI's fiscal year ends March 31.

Ashcroft Criticizes Sirius/XM Merger In Letter To DOJ (MRKTWTCH)

By Corey Boles

Market Watch, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- Former Attorney General John Ashcroft, hired by opponents of the deal, has blasted the proposed merger of Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. , saying their merger would leave only one provider in the market.

Ashcroft, who served as head of the Justice Department for four years until January 2005, was hired by the National Association of Broadcasters to examine the merger scenario.

The NAB, which represents traditional radio broadcasters, has been a fierce critic of the $13 billion merger since it was announced last week.

In a letter sent on February 27 to his replacement as attorney general, Alberto Gonzales, Ashcroft concludes "...the proposed Sirius/XM merger, which reduces the number of competitors from two to one, raises most serious competition concerns."

Ashcroft compared the current merger to the attempted takeover by satellite provider Echostar Communications Corp. of Hughes Electronic Corp. In that instance, he said, a merger would have reduced the competitors in the satellite television market in many areas from three to two.

"The Department recognized that reducing competition from three to two was anticompetitive and opposed the transaction, which was eventually abandoned," he said.

He also draws comparisons with the attempted tie-up between Echostar and DirectTV Group Inc. , in which the FCC reaffirmed its rule of not granting a single commercial license for satellite TV. That deal also wasn't allowed.

"I would submit that a thorough study of consumer demands and preferences would show that terrestrial radio stations should not be considered part of the satellite radio market for the purposes of the review of the current merger...," said the letter.

The companies' main argument for the deal being approved is that, while they are the only two satellite radio companies, they are in fact competing against the range of audio media including traditional radio, HD radio, Internet-based radio and applications like Apple Inc.'s (AAPL) iPod.

The letter was forwarded by the NAB to lawmakers on the House and Senate Judiciary Committees.

While neither panel has authority to block the deal, the House Judiciary Committee's newly formed Antitrust Task Force has already held a hearing into the matter.

Next week it is the turn of the House Commerce Committee's telecommunications subcommittee, headed by Massachusetts Democratic Rep. Edward Markey.

The merger must receive approval of both the Department of Justice's antitrust unit and the Federal Communications Commission. The latter would have to change its rules to allow one company to hold the only satellite radio license.

No one from either Sirius or XM was immediately available to comment for this report.

Dow Jones Newswire, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- Former Attorney General John Ashcroft, who sent a letter this week to his successor Alberto Gonzales blasting the proposed merger of Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. (SIRI) and XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. (XMSR), approached XM in the days after the merger was announced offering the firm's consulting services, a spokesman for XM said Saturday.

The spokesman said XM declined Ashcroft's offer to work as a lobbyist for the company.

Ashcroft was subsequently hired by the National Association of Broadcasters, which is fiercely opposed to the merger. On its behalf he conducted a review of the effects on competition if the two satellite radio companies were allowed to merge.

In a letter sent to Gonzales Feb. 27, Ashcroft concluded the merger would have a significant negative impact on competition in the market and urged the current Attorney General to withhold approval for the merger.

"After the merger was announced, Mr. Ashcroft's firm contacted us about hiring him to assist us," said

Nathaniel Brown, a spokesman for XM. "We declined. Apparently the National Association of Broadcasters opted to pay him to parrot their views."

Dennis Wharton, the NAB's executive director, said Saturday, "NAB approached former Attorney General Ashcroft to review the proposed XM-Sirius merger and offer his honest opinion as an antitrust expert. We are not aware of any alleged previous discussions between Mr. Ashcroft and officials at either satellite radio company."

A revelation that Ashcroft was shopping his services to both sides of the debate over the merger may raise doubts in the eyes of some as to the rigor of his review conducted on behalf of the NAB.

The letter was forwarded by the NAB to lawmakers on the House and Senate Judiciary Committees.

In the letter, Ashcroft concludes "...the proposed Sirius/XM merger, which reduces the number of competitors from two to one, raises most serious competition concerns."

He compares the current merger to the attempted takeover by satellite provider Echostar Communications Corp. (DISH) of Hughes Electronic Corp. In that instance, he said, a merger would have reduced the competitors in the satellite television market in many areas from three to two.

"The Department recognized that reducing competition from three to two was anticompetitive and opposed the transaction, which was eventually abandoned," he said.

He also draws comparisons with the attempted tie-up between Echostar and DirectTV Group Inc. (DTV), in which the FCC reaffirmed its rule of not granting a single commercial license for satellite TV. That deal also wasn't allowed.

"I would submit that a thorough study of consumer demands and preferences would show that terrestrial radio stations should not be considered part of the satellite radio market for the purposes of the review of the current merger...," said the letter.

The companies' main argument for the deal being approved is that, while they are the only two satellite radio companies, they are in fact competing against the range of audio media including traditional radio, HD radio, Internet-based radio and applications like Apple Inc.'s (AAPL) iPod.

While neither panel has authority to block the deal, the House Judiciary Committee's newly formed Antitrust Task Force has already held a hearing into the matter.

Next week it is the turn of the House Commerce Committee's telecommunications subcommittee, headed by Massachusetts Democratic Rep.

Edward Markey.

The merger must receive approval of both the Department of Justice's antitrust unit and the Federal Communications Commission. The latter would have to change its rules to allow one company to hold the only satellite radio license.

As Attorney General, Gonzales has ultimate responsibility for the Department of Justice, although Assistant Attorney General

Thomas O. Barnett is in charge of the department's antitrust unit.

Ashcroft served as head of the Justice Department for four years until January 2005. He then set up lobby firm The Ashcroft Group LLC.

According to the Web site opensecrets.com, the firm had revenue of $2.34 million in 2006. The NAB isn't listed as a client of the firm last year.

Clients of the firm included Ebay Inc. (EBAY), which paid $60,000 and Oracle Corp. (ORCL), which paid $480,000 to the firm for its services.

The NAB, which represents traditional radio broadcasters, has been a virulent critic of the $13 billion merger since it was announced last week.

No one from the Ashcroft Group was immediately available to comment for this article.

U.S. And E.U. Near Air Travel Pact (AP)

By Aoife White, Ap Business Writer

AP, March 3, 2007

EU and U.S. negotiators made "decisive progress" in talks to lift restrictions on what trans-Atlantic routes airlines can offer, the European Union said Friday, a move that could mean lower prices for air travelers.

The pact will allow European airlines to fly from anywhere in the EU to any point in the U.S. without strict rules that dictate ticket prices.

The EU said this would bring economic benefits of up to euro12 billion (US$15.8 billion) in five years and create as many as 80,000 jobs in Europe and the United States.

Air travel in Europe and the United States accounts for 60 percent of global air traffic, and an ambitious EU-U.S. open skies deal could allow more airlines to fly the lucrative trans-Atlantic routes, possibly offering cheaper tickets.

Within five years, the deal could put an extra 26 million people on trans-Atlantic flights, the EU said. Just under 50 million travelers now make that trip every year.

But the deal may also mean the EU would be allowed to restrict U.S. investments in European airlines — a tit-for-tat move that follows the U.S. administration's failure to lift a 25-percent ceiling on foreign ownership of U.S. carriers. Dropping the restriction has been among the EU's key demands.

The EU's executive arm said EU investors' rights to own stakes in U.S. airlines were negotiated — but did not give details.

EU airlines would have some access rights to the "Fly America" program that requires U.S. government agencies use American airlines to fly passengers or freight, according to the EU.

The pact also would create antitrust immunity to help airlines develop alliances.

American and European negotiators as part of the pact would work together on climate change rules, the European Commission said, though no details were released. U.S. officials have threatened to sue the EU over rules that apply to all airlines — including non-EU carriers — to trade carbon emissions permits in an effort to cut greenhouse gas releases.

EU Transport Commissioner Jacques Barrot said he would ask EU nations to back the deal when EU transport ministers meet March 22.

The U.S. Congress must also support it before the new rules would kick in beginning Oct. 28.

"We have an opportunity to unlock major benefits on both sides of the Atlantic," Barrot said in a statement.

The pact picks up on a stalled agreement that will allow European airlines to fly from anywhere in the EU to any point in the U.S.

Right now, for example, a French airline can only fly to the U.S. from a French airport.

EU airlines will also be able to operate all-cargo flights starting outside the EU, stopping in the U.S. and going on to another country. At the moment any cargo flights making a U.S. stop must start their trip in Europe. The EU said this was "highly significant" because both regions account for 70 percent of the global fleet.

This was negotiated in November 2005 but a deal fell apart as the EU demanded the U.S. drop protectionist laws that restrict foreign ownership or control of U.S. airlines — requirements that go back to security concerns allowing a government to requisition aircraft in wartime.

U.S. Transportation Secretary Mary E. Peters said in December that her department bowed to job and security fears when it withdrew a proposal to lift the 25 percent limit on foreign ownership of U.S. carriers.

U.S. officials said they were willing to seek a less ambitious deal and would try to find other ways to open the U.S. aviation sector to foreigners.

The Association of European Airlines welcomed the deal but said it needed to read the small print.

"Some fairly fundamental issues needed to be resolved," said AEA Secretary General Ulrich Schulte-Strathaus, citing the "inequality of opportunities" for European airlines to invest in U.S. airlines.

"If the benefits can be confirmed ... today's agreement will be seen as a historic step in redefining international relations in air transport," Schulte-Strathaus said.

Scepticism Greets Draft Open Skies Agreement (FT)

By Andrew Bounds In Brussels

Financial Times, March 3, 2007

US and European Union negotiators concluded a fresh draft deal to deregulate the transatlantic airline market yesterday, amid scepticism over whether it would be approved.

The European Commission said it would submit the agreement to EU governments this month after "a breakthrough" in meetings in Brussels. However, there is expected to be fierce debate when transport ministers meet on March 22, as the US has given little ground on loosening restrictions on foreign ownership of its airlines.

The quest for an "open skies" agreement has eluded the two sides since talks were launched four years ago. A 2005 deal foundered in December because of congressional opposition to easing the regulations limiting foreign investment in US airlines, which the EU made a condition of the deal. Foreign companies and individuals can own only 25 per cent of voting stock and a further 24.9 per cent of non-voting equity.

The draft agreement merely sets out in writing existing US policy, critics say. In 2004 the Commission sent a similar deal for EU approval, only to see resistance from the UK and Germany sink it.

The UK has in the past been determined to resist the loosening of restrictions on the lucrative market between London's Heathrow airport and the US, without reciprocal US concessions. Only British Airways, Virgin Atlantic, United Airlines and American Airlines have the right to direct fights on these routes.

The UK has 40 per cent of the transatlantic market. Its transport department refused to comment yesterday.

Jacques Barrot, EU transport commissioner, said the deal was worth it. "In economic terms, this unprecedented agreement would represent a step change - it could be worth up to €12bn in economic benefits and up to 80,000 new jobs [and] . . . could be a centrepiece for a reinvigorated transatlantic relationship."

The US has offered EUairlines the ability to fly between the US and non-EU European countries, such as Norway, which have an open skies agreement with it. They could also operate cargo flights between the US and third countries, if these countries allowed it.

The EU has also won the right to restrict US investment in its airlines, and to carry passengers financed by the federal government under the "Fly America" programme, although not on routes between big cities.

The Association of European Airlines, which represents scheduled carriers, gave cautious backing to the deal. "Our initial reaction is that there seems to be a substantially improved balance in the wording of the agreement," said Ulrich Schulte-Strathaus, secretary-general.

The need for an agreement is pressing, since the European Court of Justice has ruled that the network of bilateral deals is illegal. If the talks failed, airline alliances would lose their protection under antitrust law.

New Emissions Curbs For Diesel Trains, Ships (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

DOJ_NMG_0140181

The Environmental Protection Agency issued stringent new rules yesterday curbing harmful emissions from diesel locomotive and marine engines.

Over the next quarter-century the regulations -- which cover 40,000 marine vessels and nearly 21,000 diesel locomotives -- will cut these engines' annual emissions of nitrogen oxide, a key ingredient in smog, by 80 percent and fine particulate matter, or soot, by 90 percent.

EPA officials estimated that by 2030 the health benefits associated with the new standards will outweigh the costs by 20 to 1, preventing 1,500 premature deaths and 1,100 hospitalizations a year.

"By tackling the greatest remaining source of diesel emissions, we're keeping our nation's clean-air progress moving full steam ahead," EPA Administrator Stephen L. Johnson told reporters in a telephone news conference yesterday. "Over the last century, diesels have been America's economic workhorse, and through this rule, an economic workhorse is also becoming an environmental workhorse."

The federal government has already tightened diesel emissions from cars, sport-utility vehicles, trucks and non-road vehicles, prompting Johnson to call yesterday's rule "the last piece of this clean-diesel puzzle." Last year, the EPA revised its estimates for diesel train emissions and concluded that, without further action, these locomotives would generate nearly twice as much pollution in 2030 as administration officials previously projected.

Environmentalists praised the administration's decision. William Becker, executive director of the National Association of Clean Air Agencies, said diesel locomotive emissions rank as the largest remaining uncontrolled source of pollution in the Washington area.

"Every major metropolitan area in the country will benefit from the huge emissions reductions expected from this long-awaited rule. We estimate the emissions benefits will be equivalent to taking three-quarters of a million diesel trucks off the road each year," Becker said. "EPA deserves a 'thumbs-up' for this proposal."

Richard Kassel, a senior attorney who works on fuel and vehicle issues for the Natural Resources Defense Council, an advocacy group, said the engines covered by the regulations emit pollution equivalent to 150 coal-fired power plants. The new rules will cover all diesel trains in the United States, as well as ferries, tugboats and yachts, but not the foreign ships that make up the majority of ships in U.S. ports.

"Living near a rail yard or port is like living near the dirtiest of coal-fired power plants," Kassel said.

Initially, the regulations call for manufacturers to meet stricter standards on existing engines when overhauling them. By 2009 they must modify newly built diesel train and ship engine and combustion systems. By 2014 marine engine manufacturers must treat their exhaust through technological improvements, and a year later makers of locomotive engines must do the same.

General Electric, the country's largest locomotive engine manufacturer, had opposed the new rules on the grounds that they were not technically feasible. A GE spokesman did not return calls seeking comment.

Johnson said, however, that he was confident the nation's train and ship manufacturers could meet the stricter standards over time. "Through the ingenuity of the domestic manufacturers, we believe they can achieve these aggressive but practical standards," he said.

Environmental Agency Proposes Strict Standard For Some Diesel Engines (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 2 — The Environmental Protection Agency, which for a decade has been ratcheting up its controls on off-road diesel equipment, diesel trucks and diesel fuel, proposed stringent new pollution standards Friday on diesel locomotives and marine vessels operating in the United States.

The new controls would gradually cut engine emissions of two air pollutants, with the cuts accelerating sharply by 2030. By then, the agency estimates, most existing engines would have been retooled or replaced.

An engine's emissions of nitrogen oxides, which are a precursor to things like acid rain and ozone, would be reduced by 80 percent; the direct emission of lethal fine soot would be reduced by 90 percent in 2030, after the new controls were phased in, the agency said.

But because of the longevity of older, dirtier engines, and the expected growth of the fleet, the overall reduction in marine and railroad emissions of both pollutants would really be closer to 45 percent by 2030, according to the agency's supporting documents.

The proposal was announced by Bush administration officials at the Port of Elizabeth in New Jersey, against a backdrop of ships and trains. The E.P.A. administrator, Stephen L. Johnson, called it "the last piece of the clean diesel puzzle," following earlier curbs.

The agency's analysis said that by 2030, if the rule was made final in its present form, it would cost the marine and railroad industries $600 million, prevent 1,500 premature deaths and achieve overall health benefits worth $12 billion annually.

While other sources are responsible for more fine soot, the most lethal air pollutant regulated by the agency, few do as much as locomotives to deposit the pollutant into the air and lungs of the people who ride trains or live or work near rail lines.

In a conference call after the announcement, Mr. Johnson said environmentalists, engine manufacturers like General Electric and railroads like CSX had widely differing opinions about the standard.

"Some were concerned about technology not being available in the time frames we were talking about," Mr. Johnson said. "Others believed it would be."

The new standards are designed to force the development of new control technologies. A decision on the new rules is expected by year's end.

Environmental groups were enthusiastic about the new proposals; railroad industry officials were more subdued, indicating more lobbying would come from both sides.

Frank O'Donnell, president of Clean Air Watch, said the proposed rules were "the final frontier when it comes to the really big sources of pollution." In a later e-mail message, he said that without the rules, "diesel trains collectively will emit almost double the pollution by 2030 than all the trucks on the road combined."

Tom White, of the Association of American Railroads, said in an interview, "We're very supportive of improving efficiency and reducing the pollution from our locomotives." But, Mr. White said, "your biggest concerns always are that you have a timetable that you can meet and also that what is put out there is something doable; the technology to do this still does not exist."

Patrick Jarvis, a spokesman for the transportation division at General Electric, echoed some of Mr. White's concerns, adding, "We want to make sure the technology we bring to market is reliable and can sustain itself for the useful life of the locomotive."

The controls on marine vessels, many of which use a heavy, pollution-rich oil that packs the most power per pound, address vessels like Great Lakes freighters, ferries, fishing boats and tugboats, as well as smaller recreational boat engines.

As with locomotives, the proposed rules would take effect in stages. The first phase would affect the smallest marine diesel engines beginning in 2009; most other engines would come under the new mandate in 2012. The proposal sets long-term standards for new large marine diesel engines beginning in 2014.

The E.P.A. does not have direct authority to regulate the oceangoing vessels that burn the dirtiest fuel.

U.S. Predicting Steady Increase For Emissions (NYT)

By Andrew C. Revkin

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

The Bush administration estimates that emissions by the United States of gases that contribute to global warming will grow nearly as fast through the next decade as they did the previous decade, according to a long-delayed report being completed for the United Nations.

The document, the United States Climate Action Report, emphasizes that the projections show progress toward a goal Mr. Bush laid out in a 2002 speech: that emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases grow at a slower rate than the economy. Since that speech, he has repeated his commitment to lessening "greenhouse gas intensity" without imposing formal limits on the gases.

Kristen A. Hellmer, a spokeswoman for the White House on environmental matters, said on Friday, "The Climate Action Report will show that the president's portfolio of actions addressing climate change and his unparalleled financial commitments are working."

But when shown the report, an assortment of experts on climate trends and policy described the projected emissions as unacceptable given the rising evidence of risks from unabated global warming.

"As governor of Texas and as a candidate, the president supported mandatory limits on carbon dioxide emissions," said David W. Conover, who directed the administration's Climate Change Technology Program until February 2006 and is now counsel to the National Commission on Energy Policy, a nonpartisan research group that supports limits on gases. "When he announced his voluntary greenhouse-gas intensity reduction goal in 2002, he said it would be re-evaluated in light of scientific developments. The science now clearly calls for a mandatory program that establishes a price for greenhouse-gas emissions."

According to the new report, the administration's climate policy will result in emissions growing 11 percent in 2012 from 2002. In the previous decade, emissions grew at a rate of 11.6 percent, according to the Environmental Protection Agency.

The report also contains sections describing growing risks to water supplies, coasts and ecosystems around the United States from the anticipated temperature and precipitation changes driven by the atmospheric buildup of carbon dioxide and other heat-trapping greenhouse gases.

Drafts of the report were provided to The New York Times by a government employee at the request of a reporter. The employee did not say why this was done, but other officials involved with producing it said they have been frustrated with the slow pace of its preparation. It was due more than one year ago.

The report arrives at a moment when advocates of controls are winning new support in statehouses and Congress, not to mention Hollywood, where former Vice President Al Gore's cautionary documentary on the subject, "An Inconvenient Truth," just won an Academy Award. Five western governors have just announced plans to create a program to cap and then trade carbon-dioxide emissions. And on Capitol Hill, half a dozen bills have been introduced to curb emissions, with more expected.

Ms. Hellmer defended Mr. Bush's climate policy, saying the president was committed to actions, like moderating gasoline use and researching alternative energy, that limited climate risks while also increasing the country's energy and national security. She said Mr. Bush remained satisfied with voluntary measures to slow emissions.

Myron Ebell, who directs climate and energy policy for the Competitive Enterprise Institute, a group aligned with industries fighting curbs on greenhouse gases, said Mr. Bush was right to acknowledge the inevitability of growing emissions in a country with a growing population and economy. Mr. Ebell added that the United States was doing better at slowing emissions than many countries that had joined the Kyoto Protocol, the first binding international treaty limiting such gases.

"Since 1990, for every 1 percent increase in emissions the economy has grown about 3 percent," Mr. Ebell said. "That's good, and it's better than the European Union's performance."

Several environmental campaigners said there was no real distinction between Mr. Bush's target and "business as usual," adding that such mild steps were unacceptable given recent findings by the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change and other research groups tying recent warming more firmly than ever to smokestack and tailpipe gases.

"If you set the hurdle one inch above the ground you can't fail to clear it," said David D. Doniger, the director of climate policy for the Natural Resources Defense Council, which has long criticized the administration and sought binding cuts in greenhouse gases.

The report is the fourth in a series produced periodically by countries that are parties to the 1992 Framework Convention on Climate Change, a treaty signed by the first President Bush. It is a self-generated summary of climate-related trends and actions, including inventories of emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases, research on impacts of climate change, and policies to limit climate risks and emissions.

The last such report, completed in 2002, put the administration in something of a bind because it listed many harmful or costly projected impacts from human-caused warming. Environmental groups used those findings to press President Bush to seek mandatory caps on greenhouse gases, while foes of such restrictions criticized the findings and criticized the administration for letting them stay in the document.

While that report was approved by senior White House and State Department officials, Mr. Bush quickly distanced himself from it, saying it was "put out by the bureaucracy."

The new report has been bogged down for nearly two years. In April 2005, the State Department published a notice in the Federal Register saying it would be released for public comment that summer.

Several government officials and scientists involved with preparing or reviewing parts of the report said that the recent departures of several senior staff members running the administration's climate research program delayed its completion and no replacements have been named. The delays in finishing the report come even as Mr. Bush has elevated global warming higher on his list of concerns. This year, for the first time since he took office in 2001, he touched on "global climate change" in the State of the Union Message, calling it a "serious challenge."

The draft report contains fresh projections of significant effects of human-caused warming on the environment and resources of the United States and emphasized the need to increase the country's capacity to adapt to impending changes.

Drought, particularly, will become a persistent threat, it said: "Warmer temperatures expected with increasing concentrations of greenhouse gases are expected to exacerbate present drought risks in the United States by increasing the rate of evaporation."

Water supplies in the Northwest and Southwest are also at risk. "Much of the water used by people in the western United States comes from snow melt," the report said. "And a large fraction of the traditionally snow-covered areas of this region has experienced a decline in spring snow pack, especially since mid-century, despite increases in winter precipitation in many places." Animal and plant species face risks as climate zones shift but urbanized regions prevent ecosystems from shifting as well, according to the draft report.

"Because changes in the climate system are likely to persist into the future regardless of emissions mitigation, adaptation is an essential response for future protection of climate-sensitive ecosystems," it said.

Democrats Want Capitol Hill As A 'Green' Beacon For Planet (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, March 3, 2007

Democratic leaders yesterday called for the "greening" of buildings on Capitol Hill, saying politicians have the responsibility to preserve the planet.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi, who has led a charge to fight global warming, and other top Democrats wrote a letter to the chief administrative officer of the House asking him to embark on a "Green the Capitol" initiative.

"The Capitol complex should lead the nation in preserving our planet for future generations," the Democrats wrote to Daniel P. Beard yesterday.

The letter was signed by Mrs. Pelosi, Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland and Juanita Millender-McDonald of California, the chairman of the House Administration Committee.

The Democrats asked Mr. Beard to provide them with a preliminary report by April 30 and a final report by June 30 on ways to conserve energy inside the Capitol and its adjoining congressional offices.

"We are writing to direct you to undertake a critical initiative to address energy conservation, efficiency and cost savings," they wrote. "The House of Representatives should provide leadership to the nation in providing an environmentally responsible and healthy working environment for our employees."

They suggested Mr. Beard coordinate with his Senate counterparts, the Capitol Police and the Architect of the Capitol Office. Among their requests was to ensure the House has the most up-to-date standards for green building efforts.

It is the latest move highlighting Democrats' plans to take action on climate change. Mrs. Pelosi has created a special panel to study global warming and took the rare step of testifying before the Science and Technology Committee on the topic last month.

On the Senate side, there is bipartisan consensus that legislation is necessary to curb carbon emissions, though a method for achieving drastic reduction is far from agreed upon.

Former Vice President Al Gore, whose film on global warming, "An Inconvenient Truth," won an Oscar, plans to testify on Capitol Hill this month and deliver hundreds of thousands of postcards he has collected from citizens demanding a climate-change bill.

Businesses Rethink Carbon Curbs (WSJ)

By Nick Timiraos

The Wall Street Journal, March 3, 2007

A growing number of businesses are calling for federal caps on greenhouse-gases, which could spur Congress to action.

For years, most of the business community has strongly opposed controls on carbon dioxide emissions, which contribute to global warming. Reducing emissions would inevitably place new costs on businesses, particularly utilities.

But in the past few weeks, three industry trade groups that have long fought such regulation, the Edison Electric Institute, the American Gas Association and the Electric Power Supply Association, dropped their opposition to a cap. That coincided with calls for an emissions cap by the two private-equity firms bidding for Texas utility TXU Corp. Earlier this year, 10 corporations, including Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and General Electric Co., announced their support for mandatory curbs on greenhouse gases.

The shift underscores a growing belief that Congress eventually will pass mandatory emissions caps. Many business leaders have concluded it would be better for it to happen now rather than later, eliminating the current uncertainty. Moreover, they fear absent federal government action they'll be left to deal with a patchwork of state regulations. And they believe that by endorsing emissions caps, they'll be given a seat at the table in the negotiations over how such a cap would work.

Here's a closer look at what a national emissions "cap-and-trade" system would look like:

How would a carbon "cap-and-trade" system work? Companies would be required to have a permit for each ton of carbon that they produce. The government would limit the amount of greenhouse-gas emissions that companies could produce and create a market for companies to buy and sell permits to produce emissions beyond their caps. Firms that went beyond the mandated limit would have to reduce their emissions or buy permits from companies that had gone under their limits. The aim is to create a marketplace that would provide incentives for companies to invest in new, environmentally friendly technologies.

The 1990 Clean Air Act established a similar cap-and-trade system to combat acid rain, and it has been widely viewed as a success.

What types of proposals will Congress consider? At least five bills propose tackling global warming with some type of cap-and-trade market. The most ambitious bill would reduce emissions to 80% below their 1990 levels by 2050. Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.) and Sen. Joseph Lieberman (I., Conn.) have proposed a target of 60% below those levels by 2050. The bill has been voted down twice before.

Sen. Jeff Bingaman (D., N.M.) offers a more modest approach, stabilizing emissions at their 2013 level by 2020 and including a "safety valve" that would force the government to issue more permits if the price of those permits rose too sharply.

Who wins and loses in a carbon market? Since the devil is in the details, it's still unclear who will pay how much. Pollution permits could be sold in an auction market or given away to companies. Utilities in the Southeast and Midwest that rely on coal-fired power plants are lobbying for a higher cap or more permits to offset what would otherwise create steep price increases because coal releases more carbon emissions than any other fuel. Conversely, West Coast and Northeast states that rely on cleaner fuels could be more insulated from higher energy costs.

Either way, consumers can expect higher energy prices because most emissions caps target electricity producers, who will pass those costs on to customers. A study by the U.S. Energy Information Administration estimates that under the Bingaman bill, electricity prices could rise 3.5% by 2020. Resources for the Future, an environmental group, predicts that under the McCain measure electricity prices could rise as much as 35% by 2025.

Companies that produce low-carbon fuels or energy-efficiency products could benefit from a carbon cap. But the steel industry, which produces large amounts of carbon dioxide, warns that a cap would raise costs and hurt their ability to compete with overseas rivals that aren't subject to pollution penalties.

Cap And Charade (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0140186

But this is not, as Lenin once said, a case of capitalists selling the rope to hang themselves with. In most cases, it is good old-fashioned rent-seeking with a climate-change patina.

Start with the name. Most of those pushing this idea want you to think about it as cap-and-trade, with emphasis on the trading part. Senator Barbara Boxer touts all the jobs that would be created for people trying to game the system -- er, save the planet. And her colleague Jeff Bingaman calls cap-and-trade "market based," because, you know, people would trade stuff.

But for that to happen, the government would first have to put a cap on CO2 emissions, either for certain industries or even the economy as a whole. At the same time, it would allocate quotas for CO2 emissions, either based on current emissions, or on energy output, or some other standard. If a company then "over-complied," which means it produced less carbon dioxide than it was allowed to under the rules, it could sell the excess allowance to someone else. That someone else would buy the right to produce CO2 if doing so cost less than actually reducing emissions.

In this way, emissions would be reduced in an relatively efficient way: Those for whom reductions were cheap or easy would reduce, and if they reduced enough, they could sell their excess allowance to someone for whom the reductions were harder or more expensive. This kind of trading works, and we've argued in these columns that cap-and-trade beats the pants off just plain capping by lowering the overall economic burden of a cap.

The difficulties don't lie with the trading, but with the cap, which is where the companies lobbying for restrictions come in. James Rogers, CEO of Duke Energy, put it plainly earlier this year: "If you're not at the table when these negotiations are going on, you're going to be on the menu." Translation: If a cap is coming, better to design it in a way that you profit from it, instead of being killed by it.

Which is why the emphasis really should be cap-and-trade. It's all about the cap, because without it there's no trading. We don't buy our daily ration of oxygen because it's in abundant supply. Same with carbon dioxide -- there's no constraint on your ability to produce CO2 until the government creates one. When it does, it creates an artificial scarcity. What Duke, Entergy, TXU, BP, Dupont and all the rest want is to make sure that when the right to produce CO2 becomes limited, they're the ones that end up owning the allowances. Because that would mean they could sell them, and make money off something that previously wasn't worth a dime.

Thus, Entergy, a utility that relies heavily on natural gas and nuclear power and thus produces relatively less CO2, would love a cap that distributes the allowances based on how much electricity you churn out, rather than on how much CO2 you produce. Entergy's "carbon footprint" is small compared to some other utilities, so an electrical-output-based cap would be windfall city. Dupont, meanwhile, wants credit for reductions already made because it sees instant profit in costs already paid. It also wants a cap to cover as many industries as possible so it can make money selling emissions-reduction products.

We don't begrudge anyone the opportunity to make a buck. But there's a difference between making money by producing things people want and making money by gaming the regulatory process. There's no market here unless the government creates one, and who has the profit opportunity depends entirely on who the government picks as the winners and the losers in designing this market in the first place. So it's no wonder that almost any business that has ever put an ounce of CO2 into the atmosphere is rushing to show its cap-and-trade bona fides. * * *

By far the biggest question, however, is where the cap is set. The trading of emissions credits does nothing to lower the quantity of emissions -- it merely shifts around the right to emit. It's the cap that sets the amount of CO2 put into the air. And as Europe has learned, that figure is a political football unto itself. When the EU started emissions trading in 2005, the price of a ton of CO2 quickly tripled before cratering when participants realized that the cap hadn't been set low enough to create a genuine shortage.

The European Commission is now in the process of reviewing each country's plans for allocating emissions allowances for 2008, but in the first round it found that all but one national plan had set the cap too high to comply with Kyoto's 2008-2012 limits. Of course, even a stringent cap means nothing if countries don't comply, and so far Europe's commitment to Kyoto has been more hot air than action.

The reason is hardly a secret, though you rarely see climate-change activists admitting it. Despite all the talk of "alternative" fuels, some 80% of the energy that the world produces today comes from carbon-based fuels. Barring cold fusion or some other miracle technology, that ratio won't change much for decades to come. That means, in turn, that any stringent CO2 cap would inevitably have serious economic costs. We doubt voters will elect politicians who tell them the cost of reducing their "carbon footprint" is more blackouts or a lower standard of living. And in any case China is putting up a new coal-fired plant every week, raising emissions that will overwhelm whatever reductions cap-and-trade would yield in the U.S.

The emerging alliance of business and environmental special interests may well prove powerful enough to give us cap-and-trade in CO2. It would make Hollywood elites feel virtuous, and it would make money for some very large corporations. But don't believe for a minute that this charade would do much about global warming.

A Pattern Of Normal Drought (NYT)

It has taken humans awhile to realize that our idea of normal changes as our understanding of history deepens. Climate is a case in point. Over the past couple of decades, climatology has become a deeply historical science. In the American Southwest, climatologists have found a surprisingly detailed record of weather patterns — especially patterns of moisture — in tree rings that show that prolonged periods of drought there are normal.

Those findings immediately raise questions about how water is being used in the Southwest, and particularly about the Colorado River Compact, the 1922 legal agreement that governs water distribution in the vast Colorado River basin. The agreement was based on at most two decades of measuring river flows. But the testimony of tree rings shows that those years were much wetter than the long-term historical average.

This evidence — and its implications — have been gathered in a report released last month by a committee of the National Research Council. Its conclusions are stark. The Colorado River basin itself — some 240,000 square miles across the West and Southwest — has experienced staggering population growth. Precipitation patterns are changing, in part because of global warming, and the spring runoff from snowpack in the mountains takes place earlier than it used to, which means that less water is stored for later in the season. Nearly every drop of water that flows downstream is already allocated, which means that the only new water source for residential and commercial growth is water that has been allocated to agriculture.

So what is normal? Vast quantities of water devoted to subsidized agriculture? Vast quantities of water devoted to the growth of cities and suburbs that are, in the long historical view, unsustainable?

The immediate question this report raises is whether the forces that shape development from Wyoming to California will allow themselves to be guided by the scientific evidence and a starkly different vision than the one that was visible in 1922. Science is capable of changing its mind as the evidence it discovers becomes more precise and more conclusive. The fundamental challenge for us all is to change the way we live as well.

Divine Strake's Legal Issues Keep Controversy Alive (LVRJ)

By Keith Rogers, REVIEW-JOURNAL

Las Vegas Review-Journal, March 3, 2007

U.S. judge schedules status report

Plans for the massive non-nuclear Divine Strake blast at the Nevada Test Site are dead but legal issues surrounding the controversial bunker-buster experiment were resurrected Friday.

Eight days after a Pentagon agency canceled its plans for the Divine Strake detonation, Senior U.S. District Judge Lloyd George scheduled a status report for April 30.

George anticipates that motions will be filed by U.S. attorneys who want to dismiss a case by downwinders and some members of the Winnemucca Indian Colony challenging the test.

Opponents fear that the government will conduct smaller blasts that, while not as large as Divine Strake, could still stir up potentially deadly radioactive dust that lies on the ground of the test site and could be blown to their homes.

The opponents' lawyer, Robert Hager, of Reno, wants to keep the case alive by forcing the government to formally define the smaller scale "confirmatory" experiments that a Pentagon agency has said it intends to conduct in lieu of Divine Strake's cancellation.

In his words, George decided to "keep it on the calendar so we can finally conclude this matter with satisfaction to everyone."

"You file whatever motions you choose to file," he told Hager and Justice Department attorney Caroline Blanco, who presented their respective positions in a conference call at the Lloyd George U.S. Courthouse, named after the judge.

Referring to a Feb. 22 press release from the Defense Threat Reduction Agency canceling the test amid widespread opposition from downwinders and some politicians in Nevada, Utah and Idaho, Hager said he doesn't understand what agency director James Tegnelia meant by "confirmatory experiments at a much smaller scale" will instead be conducted.

"I don't know what that means. ... To what extent smaller?" Hager asked during the conference call.

Tegnelia apologized last year for saying the blast from Divine Strake's 700-ton slurry of ammonium nitrate and fuel oil would send a "mushroom cloud over Las Vegas."

Hager and his clients and thousands who commented on the agency's plans fear that radioactive remnants from historic nuclear weapons tests at the test site would be lofted into the atmosphere and carried off the site with fine dust particles from the above-ground explosion.

Oil Company Revives Suit On Avoidance Of Royalties (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 2 — One of the nation's biggest oil producers in the Gulf of Mexico is pressing ahead with a lawsuit that could, if successful, allow energy companies to avoid as much as $60 billion in royalties to the government over the next two decades.

Anadarko Petroleum, based in Houston, is suing the Interior Department to overturn regulations that force companies that drill in publicly owned waters to pay full royalties on oil and gas they produce during times of high energy prices.

Anadarko, which earned $4.8 billion in profit last year on sales of $10.2 billion, is arguing that Congress guaranteed oil companies a special incentive for drilling in deep water under which the companies could avoid paying the standard royalty on much of what they produced in the Gulf of Mexico. The Interior Department has adamantly argued that the incentives were never supposed to apply when oil prices climbed above about $34 a barrel.

The suit itself was filed a year ago by the Kerr-McGee Oil and Gas Corporation, which Anadarko acquired last year for $21 billion. But Anadarko put the suit on hold last year and began court-supervised mediation talks with the Interior Department.

On Thursday, a federal judge in Louisiana, Patricia Minaldi, declared that the mediation talks had failed and ordered both sides to start filing arguments in late May. The failure of the mediation poses a major problem for the Bush administration, which is already trying to prevent the loss of $10 billion in royalties as a result of a huge leasing error made during the Clinton administration.

If Anadarko is successful, the government would lose many more times that. The Government Accountability Office, the Congressional watchdog agency, estimated in January that the government would lose about $60 billion over 25 years.

The federal government leases millions of acres in the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas producers. Companies are required to pay a royalty of 12 to 16 percent of their sales from the leases, but the government also offers royalty holidays as an incentive for deepwater drilling.

The Interior Department contends that companies are not entitled to such royalty relief if oil prices climb above about $34 a barrel, as they have for the last three years.

But Anadarko, in its lawsuit, argued that Congress never authorized that kind of restriction and had "guaranteed" the incentives for any leases signed from 1996 through 2000.

"Like other companies, Kerr-McGee responded and undertook significant risks and costs associated with deepwater exploration," the company said in its lawsuit, adding that it had invested $3.5 billion to acquire, explore and develop leases in the gulf.

The revival of the lawsuit could cause political problems for the oil industry, increasing hostility among Democratic leaders already angry about high energy prices and record industry profits.

In January, House Democrats overwhelmingly passed a bill that would revoke $7.6 billion in tax breaks for oil companies and would impose a stiff additional fee on all companies that refused to renegotiate the flawed leases signed during the Clinton years.

Representative Edward J. Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts, who has criticized the Interior Department for being lax toward oil companies, accused Anadarko on Friday of intransigence and attempting a "colossal rip-off."

"This lawsuit is nothing more than a brazen attempt to fleece the American people out of billions of dollars," Mr. Markey said in a statement. "The Justice Department must put the full weight of its resources behind vigorously defending the American taxpayers."

Indeed, industry executives say that major oil companies are politically divided about the legal gauntlet thrown down by Kerr-McGee and Anadarko Petroleum.

"I think there are a lot of folks in the industry, particularly those involved in advocating the original legislation, that absolutely don't agree with Kerr-McGee," said John Northington, an industry lobbyist who worked in the Energy Department under President Clinton.

The Bush administration has repeatedly argued that Anadarko's case has no merit, but Interior officials have tried at least twice to settle the dispute without going to trial.

The most recent effort was led by C. Stephen Allred, assistant secretary for land and minerals management.

In December, the two sides hired Benjamin A. Civiletti, a lawyer and onetime Watergate prosecutor, to mediate talks about a possible compromise.

Evangelical Angers Peers With Call For Action On Global Warming (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

Focus on the Family founder James C. Dobson and other conservative Christian leaders are calling for the National Association of Evangelicals to silence or fire an official who has urged evangelicals to take global warming seriously.

In a letter this week to the board of the NAE, which claims 30 million members, Dobson and his two dozen co-signers said the Rev. Richard Cizik, the NAE's vice president for government relations, has waged a "relentless campaign" that is "dividing and demoralizing" evangelicals.

Cizik has been a leader in efforts to broaden evangelicals' political agenda beyond abortion and same-sex marriage. He says Christians have a biblical imperative to protect the environment, which he calls "creation care."

"I speak with a voice that is authentically evangelical on all the issues, from religious freedom around the world, to compassion for the poor, ending oppression in Darfur -- and yes, creation care is one of those issues," Cizik said yesterday.

The NAE's board is scheduled to meet next week in Minnesota. Its former president, the Rev. Ted Haggard, resigned in November after a scandal involving sex and drugs.

His successor, the Rev. Leith Anderson, defended Cizik as "a great asset." He also said that the Dobson letter was released to the news media before it was received by the board. "I guess that says it all," he said.

Evangelical's Focus On Climate Draws Fire Of Christian Right (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

Leaders of several conservative Christian groups have sent a letter urging the National Association of Evangelicals to force its policy director in Washington to stop speaking out on global warming.

The conservative leaders say they are not convinced that global warming is human-induced or that human intervention can prevent it. And they accuse the director, the Rev. Richard Cizik, the association's vice president for government affairs, of diverting the evangelical movement from what they deem more important issues, like abortion and homosexuality.

The letter underlines a struggle between established conservative Christian leaders, whose priority has long been sexual morality, and challengers who are pushing to expand the evangelical movement's agenda to include issues like climate change and human rights.

"We have observed," the letter says, "that Cizik and others are using the global warming controversy to shift the emphasis away from the great moral issues of our time."

Those issues, the signers say, are a need to campaign against abortion and same-sex marriage and to promote "the teaching of sexual abstinence and morality to our children."

The letter, dated Thursday, is signed by leaders like James C. Dobson, chairman of Focus on the Family; Gary L. Bauer, once a Republican presidential candidate and now president of Coalitions for America; Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council; and Paul Weyrich, a longtime political strategist who is chairman of American Values.

They acknowledge in the letter that none of their groups belong to the National Association of Evangelicals, a broad coalition that represents 30 million Christians in hundreds of denominations, organizations and academic institutions. But, they say, if Mr. Cizik "cannot be trusted to articulate the views of American evangelicals," then he should be encouraged to resign.

Mr. Cizik (pronounced SIZE-ik) did not respond to requests for an interview yesterday, and the association's chairman, L. Roy Taylor, was unavailable. But the Rev. Leith Anderson, president of the association, said, "We're talking about somebody here who's been in Washington for 25 years, has an amazing track record and is highly respected."

"I'm behind him," said Mr. Anderson, who was named president in November after the sudden resignation of the Rev. Ted Haggard, the Colorado pastor caught up in a scandal involving a gay prostitute.

Mr. Cizik, who is well known on Capitol Hill, has long served as one of the evangelical movement's agenda-setters. He helped put foreign policy on the evangelical agenda in the late 1990s, focusing on the persecution of Christians in other countries.

He said in an interview last year that he experienced a profound "conversion" on the global warming issue in 2002 after listening to scientists at a retreat. Now an emblem for a new breed of evangelical environmentalists, he has been written about in Vanity Fair and Newsweek and has appeared in "The Great Warming," a documentary on climate change.

Evangelicals have recently become a significant voice in the chorus on global warming. Last year more than 100 prominent pastors, theologians and college presidents signed an "Evangelical Climate Initiative" calling for action on the issue. Among the signers were several board members of the National Association of Evangelicals; Mr. Anderson, who has since been named its president; and W. Todd Bassett, who was then national commander of the Salvation Army and was appointed executive director of the association in January.

Mr. Haggard, then the president, and Mr. Cizik did not sign, after criticism from some of the same leaders who have now sent the letter about Mr. Cizik.

In interviews, some signers of this latest letter said they were wary of the global warming issue because they associated it with leftists, limits on free enterprise and population control, which they oppose.

"We're saying what is being done here," Mr. Perkins said, "is a concerted effort to shift the focus of evangelical Christians to these issues that draw warm and fuzzies from liberal crusaders."

Energy Dept.'s Missed Deadlines On Appliance Efficiency Cost Billions, Report Says (LAT)

By Robert Lee Hotz

The Energy Dept. was to tighten rules on appliance efficiency.

Over the last three decades, the federal government has missed legal deadlines for setting stricter efficiency standards for common appliances, resulting in billions of dollars in higher utility bills and millions more tons of the greenhouse gases that fuel global warming, congressional investigators reported.

All told, the Department of Energy has missed every one of 34 mandatory rule-making deadlines for setting minimum energy efficiency standards involving 20 products including refrigerators, dishwashers, freezers, pool heaters, furnaces and central air conditioners, analysts at the Government Accountability Office reported.

The delays ranged from a few months to 15 years, according to the GAO report made public this week. Of the 34 energy efficiency standards, 24 have yet to be set, involving 17 household and industrial product categories.

"I have never seen anything like this," said GAO analyst Karla Springer, who led the group that prepared the report. "It is nearly 30 years of not meeting a deadline. It is kind of frightening."

Congress is about to consider new measures to control the emission of heat-trapping greenhouses gases, including stricter energy efficiency standards to reduce use of carbon-rich oil, coal and natural gas.

Analysts at the Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory calculated that the missed deadlines for just four of the more popular appliances would ultimately cost consumers at least $28 billion in forgone energy savings — equivalent to the annual primary energy consumption of about 20 million households.

The delays will also result in 53 million tons of carbon dioxide emissions, about the same as 1% of total U.S. carbon dioxide emissions in 2004, the analysts reported.

"These missed deadlines have cost our nation more than we can afford," said Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee, which commissioned the audit.

Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.) called the missed deadlines the product of "a culture of incompetence and delay."

Since 1975, the Energy Department has been required to set minimum energy efficiency standards for many consumer products. The standards that have been set so far will save enough energy to operate all U.S. homes for more than two years, Energy Department officials said.

Department officials vowed this week to eliminate their backlog by 2011, though such an effort would require six times as much work with little or no increase in staff.

The GAO analysts were skeptical. The Energy Department, they said, has no way to ensure that anyone is held accountable for deadlines.

"They say they are going to do it," Springer said. "They said they were going to do it before."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

L.A. To Boost Jobs For Young People As Part Of Anti-gang Effort, Mayor Says (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy, Times Staff Writer

His proposal would increase employment to 10,000 -- four times the number two years ago.

After huddling with visiting U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales on efforts to keep kids out of gangs, Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa said Friday that the city would increase dramatically the number of jobs offered to young people this year, to 10,000 — four times the number provided two years ago.

The mayor announced the increase after he and Gonzales toured a silk-screening plant run by Homeboy Industries in South Los Angeles.

The nonprofit group, which received a $650,000 federal grant, hires former gang members who are trying to lead law-abiding lives.

"Young people, when they feel there are no options, when there are no job opportunities, when they don't have the skills to make it, they lose hope," Villaraigosa said. "We are both committed to the idea that in a great and beautiful country like America we can invest in young people, that we have to address the issues of prevention and intervention."

However, Gonzales' agency faced criticism from one city official Friday for delays in delivering on past promises.

The attorney general had been in Los Angeles nearly a year ago to announce a separate $2.5-million federal grant for gang intervention, suppression and prevention programs in South Los Angeles, but officials conceded recently that the money has not yet gone out to local programs.

"We have waited too long for federal dollars that were promised almost a year ago," said Councilwoman Janice Hahn, who represents the area.

"We know that money is voted for, appropriated and spent much quicker on the war on Iraq. This war on gangs is no less urgent," she said.

George Cardona of the U.S. attorney's office said federal officials had been meeting with community leaders to discuss the best way to spend the money. He added that the first installment of the funds probably will arrive before May.

Gonzales had been in Los Angeles last March to announce that the city was one of six awarded Justice Department grants, each consisting of $1 million earmarked for gang prevention, $1 million devoted to law enforcement and $500,000 to provide transitional housing and job placement help for released convicts.

Gonzales had said at the time that the money would be focused on a section of South Los Angeles that includes the Imperial Courts, Nickerson Gardens and Jordan Downs housing projects.

"I don't know the specifics," Gonzales said Friday when asked about the money. "The way these things work is that we expect the state and local communities to develop a plan, hopefully an innovative plan that is focused on the needs of the community."

The jobs discussed Friday by Villaraigosa generally are available to young people age 14 to 24, and most of them are provided during the summer, when many students are out of school, said Robert Sainz, an assistant general manager of the city Community Development Department.

Jobs are paid for with funds from the city, county and federal government, Sainz said, adding that the Los Angeles Area Chamber of Commerce has members who also provide some jobs.

The city provided 2,500 jobs to young people in fiscal 2005-06. After Villaraigosa took office in the summer of 2005, he won council approval to increase the number to 7,500 for the current fiscal year, which ends June 30. The budget he will propose next month for the coming fiscal year will call for 10,000 such jobs.

Better opportunity for jobs is a key component of Villaraigosa's campaign to reduce gang violence in the city, which increased 15.7% last year.

Gonzales said he was impressed by the work of the nonprofit Homeboy Industries, which has worked with former members of 600 gangs in Los Angeles County, providing help in removing tattoos, counseling and offering jobs in the five businesses it operates.

The attorney general said part of his job is to prosecute criminals, "but I'm equally concerned with making sure we are taking steps as the government … to provide educational campaigns, to provide job opportunities, to prevent these kids from joining gangs in the first place."

The mayor said he was working on a strategy for expanding gang prevention and intervention programs, adding that he discussed the need for more federal assistance with Gonzales.

"We did have a specific conversation about funding, a continued partnership with the federal government," Villaraigosa said, declining to reveal details of his request. "Let me just say I'm walking away with a good feeling about continuing that relationship."

Reminded by the mayor that the city is the "epicenter" for gang activity in the nation, Gonzales said he could not commit to any specific increase in federal funding.

"Los Angeles is in a unique situation, and we are going to look very, very hard at what additional resources we can make available," Gonzales said.

Nobles And Knaves (WT)

Noble: The Drug Enforcement Agency, for busting a major Mexican drug-trafficking ring.

DEA agents arrested 66 persons on Wednesday, bringing the total number for their 20-month investigation of the Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum (also known as Victor Emilio Cazares-Salazar) drug-trafficking empire to 400. Agents seized more than 18 tons of marijuana, cocaine, methamphetamine and heroin, along with $45.2 million and various weapons and vehicles, according to the DEA Web site.

The Mexico-based group would smuggle the narcotics from Colombia and Venezuela through Mexico, then into the United States via points along the Southwest border. They even "built a bridge made of sandbags across the Colorado river near Yuma, Az., which allowed them to simply drive across the waterway," ABC News reported. Once in the United States, the drugs would be distributed to U.S. cells scattered across the country.

The investigation, known as "Operation Imperial Emperor," was led by the DEA but included the FBI, ICE and the IRS, among others. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has praised the officers and agents for working together "against a common foe." DEA Administrator Karen P. Tandy said Wednesday that "we ripped out this empire's U.S. infrastructure from its commanders and transportation coordinators to its local distribution cells across the country ... and tossed it in the dustbin of history."

For keeping 18 tons of illegal drugs out of the United States, the DEA is the Noble of the week.

Knave: D.C hospitals, for forgetting about the remains of infants.

This heartbreaking story exposes the Washington Hospital Center, Howard University Hospital and several others for keeping the remains of more than 100 stillborn babies and fetuses long past the city-mandated 30-day limit.

The issue surfaced when hospital workers at WHC found the remains of 95 infants in a box in the morgue refrigerator. Health officials were notified, which led to an investigation of other city hospitals. A letter obtained by The Washington Post and written by Janis M. Orlowski, the senior vice president and chief medical officer of WHC, to D.C. Health Director Gregg Pane, said that the hospital had implemented a new policy that allowed parents additional time to make decisions about the remains of the deceased. If bodies go unclaimed or the parents request it, the hospital is responsible for arrangements. But "[b]ecause of the retirement of one key employee and the death of another, the remains were not disposed of, even as the 30-day deadline passed, the letter said." Presumably, the other hospitals' mistake was due to similar administrative incompetency.

Besides being operationally stupid, this event has undoubtedly affected many D.C. families forced to rehash a miscarriage or the birth of a stillborn baby and then to wonder if he or she was left in a morgue refrigerator for upwards of five years. This story can only be described as horrific.

For their insensitivity and massive oversight, D.C. hospitals are the Knave of the week.

Exploding Ammunition Cache Greets Firefighters Arriving At Blaze In Norco (LAT)

By Jonathan Abrams, Times Staff Writer

Firefighters responding to a house fire in a Norco neighborhood were greeted with a dangerous surprise: gunfire. Lots of it.

Authorities on Thursday found a cache containing more than 1 million rounds of ammunition and 75 firearms, ranging from small handguns to assault rifles, throughout the burning home and in a shaft and tunnel under the garage.

The firefighters realized the stockpile was inside when rounds started going off. No injuries were reported.

"The Fire Department knew exactly what was going on when they heard the sounds," said Riverside County Sheriff's Sgt. Dennis Gutierrez.

"They knew it wasn't wood crackling over the fire."

The stockpile of ammunition is probably the largest ever confiscated in Riverside County, said Gutierrez.

A neighbor reported the fire Thursday afternoon and had dragged the homeowner, whom deputies did not identify, from the house, Gutierrez said.

The man later attempted to make his way back into the home.

Property records list the homeowner as Thomas McKiernan. Neighbors said McKiernan was a quiet man who had recently separated from his wife.

"We had to hold him down until the police got here and took him into custody," said Norco Fire Battalion Chief Ron Knueven. "He was swinging wildly and throwing some kicks."

Fire officials from Norco and Corona, agents from the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, and Riverside County sheriff's deputies continued to inspect the house Friday. Much of the roof collapsed under the fire.

Authorities are not sure how the blaze started.

Authorities described the homeowner as a survivalist. He was taken for 72-hour psychiatric evaluation, and officials will then decide whether to press charges, Gutierrez said.

DOJ_NMG_0140194

The 4-by-8-foot shaft, at least 10 feet deep, extended through the garage foundation, and a tunnel of unknown size ran east toward the house, Gutierrez said. The ammunition was stored in cardboard boxes, wooden crates, plastic bins and large cooking pots.

Gutierrez said 75 pounds of black gunpowder and two semiautomatic assault rifles were also confiscated.

Gutierrez said it was legal to own up to 1 pound of the gunpowder, but illegal to possess the assault rifles.

Authorities are checking the serial numbers of the remaining firearms.

"He could have gotten them from anywhere — a reputable gun store or a shooting range, but who knows?" said Susan Raichel, spokeswoman for the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

"This isn't a hobby he just picked up last year. He has definitely been doing whatever it is he does for a very long time."

Residents in the quiet neighborhood expressed shock at the findings. Many gathered to view the ammunition accumulated on the homeowner's driveway.

Last April, authorities seized more than 900 guns in the nearby San Bernardino County city of Upland from a man who said he was planning to overthrow Cuban President Fidel Castro.

"That was the closest we've ever seen to something like this," Gutierrez said.

"But we've never seen this much ammunition."

Burning Home Yields Weapons Cache (CCT)

By Gillian Flaccus

The Contra Costa Times, March 3, 2007

NORCO - More than a million rounds of ammunition, numerous weapons and a tunnel were found in a man's home after a fire exploded bullets and forced a neighborhood evacuation, authorities said Friday.

The homeowner was hospitalized for a 72-hour psychological evaluation after being rescued from the house by a neighbor and then struggling with authorities who prevented him from re-entering, but he was not arrested.

Gary Eppler, who lives across the street, identified the man as Thomas McKiernan, a retired machinist in his 60s who recently separated from his wife, has grown children and didn't seem unusual in the nine years he has known him.

Eppler said McKiernan had an interest in guns and has a son who is an Army sniper who went to Iraq last year and returned safely.

"I knew that he target-practiced and we'd talk about that. He'd go to a rifle range so I knew he had some ammunition," Eppler said.

McKiernan talked about reloading shell casings but said he hadn't done it in some time, Eppler said.

"I've been a psych nurse for 30 years and I didn't notice anything unusual," the neighbor said.

The day after the fire, an incongruous scene played out in the windy hilltop neighborhood of older middle-class tract homes set against a backdrop of the snow-capped San Bernardino Mountains -- part of a quiet semirural community that bills itself as "Horsetown USA."

Riverside County sheriff's deputies and federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives agents carried charred boxes and pieces of furniture out of the house, stacked numerous boxes of ammunition in the driveway and examined seized rifles.

Two weapons were assault rifles that were illegal, and the man had no permit for 75 pounds of black gunpowder that was found, said sheriff's deputy Juan Zamora.

The tunnel, stretching from an entry in the garage 8 to 10 feet into the backyard, yielded three 25-gallon containers of fluid that was being analyzed by hazardous material experts, said Norco fire Battalion Chief Ron Knueven.

The tunnel was 5 feet wide and tall enough to allow someone to walk upright with room to spare, Zamora said.

Eppler said he was about to go on a bicycle ride Thursday afternoon when he noticed smoke coming from McKiernan's house. He said he alerted his wife, Linda, to call 911 and raced to his neighbor's home.

Inside, Eppler said, he found McKiernan on a couch.

"I looked and saw he was passed out on the couch and I woke him up and I had to help him up because he was staggering a little," Eppler said.

Eppler said it was smoky in the house but he didn't know whether McKiernan had been affected by it.

McKiernan then ran to the back of the house, grabbed a hose and tried to pour water on his roof, Eppler said.

Eppler said that when firefighters arrived, he persuaded McKiernan to come to the front of the house, but the man didn't think they were doing a good enough job because they weren't hosing down the roof, and he tried to re-enter the home. After McKiernan was restrained and put in a police car, ammunition began exploding, Eppler said.

The explosions forced evacuation of the area and kept firefighters at a distance. The blaze caused the roof to collapse before the fire was contained.

"It sounded like firecrackers, they were going off quite a bit," said neighbor Frank Jackson, who rushed home when he heard about the fire.

When he got there, he said firefighters were swarming over the burning house but the explosions were so intense that firefighters on the roof had to abandon it.

"The shells were going off and you had to back off," he said.

Authorities found a machine in the garage that was used to load the gunpowder into empty casings. The practice known as "reloading" is common and not illegal, ATF spokeswoman Susan Raichel said.

In 2003, McKiernan was quoted in a Riverside newspaper story about a fundraiser to build a military memorial in the city of Corona. McKiernan spoke to the Press-Enterprise about his brother Tim's 1968 death in the crash of a helicopter he was piloting in Vietnam, describing a heroic effort to avoid a school.

In 2002, he was in a newspaper photograph showing him hosing down his roof as a brush fire burned in the nearby Santa Ana River bottom.

AP, March 3, 2007

NORCO, Calif. — More than 1 million rounds of ammunition, a cache of weapons and a tunnel were found at a man's home after an explosive fire that forced a neighborhood evacuation, authorities said Friday.

Crews worked to fortify the tunnel, which measured 5 feet wide by 8 feet long, to ensure it was safe. It appeared to be at least 10 feet deep and led into a back yard, authorities said.

The fire Thursday afternoon at the home in Norco, about 45 miles east of Los Angeles, caused some of the ammunition to explode.

The man tried to run back into the house after firefighters arrived and had to be restrained by sheriff's deputies, Riverside County sheriff's Deputy Juan Zamora said.

After the blaze was extinguished, crews discovered metal and wooden boxes of ammunition for shotguns, small handguns and assault rifles.

On Friday, sheriff's deputies and agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives combed the house for evidence.

Dozens of metal and cardboard boxes filled with ammunition for shotguns, small handguns and assault rifles sat in a driveway. Two of the assault rifles were illegal, Zamora said.

The man had no permit for 75 pounds of black gunpowder that was also recovered, Zamora said.

No arrests had been made. The man, whose identity was not released, was taken to a hospital where he will receive a psychological evaluation, Zamora said.

Last April, authorities said they found more than 1,300 weapons and 89,000 rounds of ammunition in the San Bernardino County home of a man who claimed to belong to a militant group with aims to overthrow Cuban dictator Fidel Castro. Robert Ferro of Upland faces counts of unlawfully owning and failing to register guns.

500 Guns Tied To Columbus Cop (AP)

By Sharon Cohen, AP NATIONAL WRITER

AP, March 3, 2007

COLUMBUS There were 501 guns in all, the government says - revolvers and pistols, Glocks and Rugers, a few rifles, too, a giant cache of firearms suitable for sport or self-protection.

Or felonies.

Or terrorism.

Five hundred one guns, tied to one man - 35-year-old Mark Nelson, a former Columbus cop who masterminded a conspiracy that flooded the streets with weapons.

Nelson insists he didn't knowingly do anything wrong. But prosecutors say he enlisted his family and others (including a drug dealer) to illegally acquire 501 guns, then directly - or indirectly - sold many of them.

And soon after - within days, in a few cases - some of these guns began turning up in the wrong hands and the wrong places:

A Raven Arms .25-caliber pistol used in a Brooklyn, N.Y., shooting. A Ruger 9 mm handgun found on a man charged with crack possession in Washington, D.C. A Smith & Wesson .40-caliber pistol recovered in Youngstown, Ohio, in a car driven by a man inexplicably wearing a bulletproof vest and carrying a winter face mask - in May.

It's all part of the shadowy world of gun trafficking, where lies, stealth and cold cash make it alarmingly easy for deadly weapons to be bought and sold - and surface days, months, even years later in crimes.

This is the story of how one trafficking case unfolded and how a handful of people, bogus paperwork, the lure of a profit and the constant demand for weapons combined for a black-market scheme that could haunt investigators for decades. More than 300 guns remain missing.

"They're lost in the system," says federal prosecutor Doug Squires. "The point is we don't know where they are - and that's the real danger."

GUNS FOR TERROR?

At 5:59 a.m. on Aug. 13, 2005, a young Somali man, Mohammed Dirie, was stopped as he crossed the Peace Bridge from Buffalo, N.Y., to Fort Erie, Ontario.

Duct-taped to his thigh: a 9 mm pistol.

Agents also found a second gun on his thigh and an ammunition clip and bullets in his socks. His companion had a gun tucked in his waistband.

The two were imprisoned for illegal gun possession, but that wasn't the end of it; last summer, they were among 18 people charged in an alleged terrorist bombing plot in Canada. The two were also accused of importing weapons and ammunition.

The Taurus PT-111 pistol, authorities say, was traced back to Nelson's group.

How Dirie bought the gun is a mystery.

But one fact is not: It was purchased within five days of his arrest at the border.

HOT SELLER

When a federal judge recently sentenced Nelson to the maximum 10 years in prison, he called the former officer's behavior "a great risk to the public."

In a voice choking with emotion, Nelson, told the judge he had "high respect for the law." He portrayed himself as a man misunderstood and wronged.

Nelson claimed he was trying to sell guns as a business to supplement his police disability - he wasn't working because of back problems sustained on the job. He said he was misled by a firearms dealer who continued to sell him weapons even though the man knew it was illegal.

Nelson also said the dealer - who also pleaded guilty - told him to have others sign the legal paperwork for guns that would go to him. That's known as a "straw purchase," where an intermediary poses as the buyer for someone who can't pass the background check.

Nelson, a police officer for almost eight years, couldn't buy a gun himself because he was facing a charge in a road rage incident. So he enlisted others to claim they were the purchasers.

His wife, Phaedra, for instance, said she had bought 168 guns, his brother, Ricky, 83, according to the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. His father-in-law and two other men bought the others. All seven have pleaded guilty.

As proof he didn't hide his business, Nelson noted he bought and sold weapons to Columbus police officers, and when a customer traded in a gun and wouldn't remove the bullets, he took it to detectives for a fingerprint check. Nelson made those comments in a letter to the judge days before sentencing - written, he said, against his lawyer's advice.

But federal agents paint a far more sinister picture.

They say Nelson traveled to Minnesota and Washington, D.C., to make deals and sold guns from his car trunk, hotel rooms and gun shows, where an undercover ATF informant bought 26 weapons - even though the informant told him he had a "lot of felonies" and planned to resell them to drug dealers.

"He had no regard for who the guns were going to," says Wayne Dixie, the Columbus ATF chief. "He didn't care because it was a moneymaking scheme. Maybe there was some prestige, too. He's known as the guy to go to for guns. ... 'You need a quick firearm, you can come to me. I'm your man.'"

Agents also point out that when Nelson was arrested last summer, he seemed braced for trouble: He was wearing a bulletproof vest.

TRACKING GUNS

So far, law enforcement has traced 51 guns.

In Silver Spring, Md., a .25-caliber pistol turned up outside a high school. Witnesses said one student pointed the gun at another student's head; the incident was believed connected to the Bloods street gang.

In Minneapolis, a 9 mm pistol was discovered under a trash can by police responding to a report that some young men were pointing guns at people.

In Columbus, a 9 mm pistol was involved in the death of a man in a domestic dispute.

In Newark, N.J., a .22-caliber Derringer ended up in a very strange spot: The Essex County jail property room. A ballistics test was negative. Inmates and staff were interviewed. Cameras were checked. Nothing.

FLUID TRAFFICKING

Nelson's weapons have surfaced in six states - New York, Minnesota, North Carolina, New Jersey, Maryland and Ohio - as well as Washington, D.C., and the Canadian border.

Ohio has been known to funnel illegal guns to the East Coast, partly because of its proximity to big cities such as New York and Washington, where it's difficult to buy weapons.

But gun trafficking knows no geographic boundaries, says John Firman, director of research for the International Association of Chiefs of Police. "It's rampant. It's a national problem ... and very often it goes unrecognized," he says.

"It's also a moveable feast. Gun traffickers aren't stupid, they move on," Firman adds. "The corridors of transportation in this country are wide open. Nobody stops me at the border of Kansas and says, 'Let me look in your trunk.'"

Many Southern states - where gun laws tend to be less stringent - also have long been regarded as part of an "iron pipeline" feeding weapons to gangs and other criminals in big cities in the North.

In Alabama last year, 11 people were arrested - many in their 60s and 70s - and more than 700 guns were seized or purchased in undercover operations in flea markets and a gun show. Two others were later charged. Investigators linked hundreds of guns they previously sold to crimes, including a murder-for-hire scheme in New York and the attempted murder of a Chicago police officer.

A relatively small number of people can cause enormous damage. About 1 percent of licensed dealers account for nearly 60 percent of all crime guns sold in this country, says Joe Vince, a former ATF agent who now runs a consulting firm.

Like so many businesses, trafficking is fueled by supply and demand: The more desperate the buyer, the higher the price. A drug dealer, gang member or another criminal in a city where gun laws are strict will fork over three, four, even five times the store price for an unused weapon.

"When they get a new gun from a box, they know it hasn't been used in a crime so there's no investigative trail that can trip them up," says Patrick Berarducci, a 30-year ATF veteran who recently retired to become police chief in Boardman, Ohio. "What they're buying is not the gun. What they're buying is the anonymity that goes with it."

GUNS TIED TO CRIMES

In Newark, N.J., a 9 mm pistol was found in a car along with a dead man and about four kilos of cocaine; another was found on two teens suspected in a cocaine-related robbery.

In Brooklyn, N.Y, a 7.62 mm rifle was recovered on a man carrying 75 grams of marijuana. He was identified as a member of the Bloods street gang.

In New York City, a .38-caliber revolver turned up with cocaine, marijuana and fake IDs after police stopped a car and two men tried to flee.

In Columbus, a 9 mm pistol was found along with suspected marijuana, crack, cocaine and drug paraphernalia after police approached a car that had been reported stolen and used Mace to subdue one man who tried to run away.

GUNS ON ORDER

Nelson pleaded guilty to a single charge of falsifying paperwork, which states he had acquired more than 300 guns illegally. (Federal officials put the total count at 501; Nelson's lawyer claims they overcounted.)

The ATF has recovered more than 100 guns, mostly from his home or the undercover ATF informant, along with the 51 others found on the streets.

Nelson met with federal agents several times to track the missing guns, but it did no good, says Squires, the prosecutor.

"He kept things from us," he says. "He minimized and evaded. He didn't know his customers. He didn't know their true identities."

For example, Squires says, Nelson didn't tell them he was robbed of his guns when he met with some prospective buyers in a hotel room outside Washington, D.C.

Nelson ordered guns from Illinois, Missouri, Indiana, and Florida - sometimes on the Internet - and had them shipped to a licensed firearms dealer in Ohio, Robert Cook, who was in on the deal, making $10 for each gun, according to the ATF.

Nelson wasn't trying to get rich, says Mark Collins, his lawyer.

"He was not trafficking drugs making $2 or $3 million," he says. He estimates Nelson probably made less than $40,000.

Squires, the prosecutor, says that while two men who were part of the scheme did receive some guns - he doesn't know how many - Nelson's family did not.

"They knew what they were doing was wrong," he says.

"But they were shocked by who the end users were and that they were the portals of crime."

Local ATF Center Brings The Gun Tracking Home (SEAPI)

By Scott Gutierrez, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, March 3, 2007

New program may help curb rising crime

When a corroded 9 mm handgun surfaced last year in a brushy West Seattle yard, police suspected it had been used nearby to kill a 14-year-old boy three years earlier.

But they needed proof.

Using the gun's serial number, they traced it through the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives to a man who had bought it from a licensed gun dealer. That man turned out to be related to Demeko B. Holland, who police already considered a main suspect.

Information from the gun trace, which helped lead to a first-degree murder charge against Holland, is collected in the ATF's database. That database, with its lists of crime guns, suspects and firearms dealers, is central to the ATF's Regional Crime Gun Center, which opened last August in Seattle.

The center is a clearinghouse for weapons that city and state police recover at crime scenes, or simply find in the streets. Its main purpose is to identify trafficking, and to determine how suspected criminals, especially felons such as Holland, get their weapons.

It's also helped identify some key trends in Washington.

One of those is that the state has become a leading source for guns being used in crimes in Western Canada, which has far more restrictive gun laws than the U.S.

"If you purchase a gun here in Washington for $100, you could sell that for $300 in Canada -- that's U.S. not Canadian (dollars)," said supervisory special ATF agent Doug Krough.

Local police hope the center also will help curb a recent rise in gun violence in the Seattle metro area.

Agents first try to trace every weapon to its manufacturer, which points them to the licensed dealer where it was sold, and the customer who bought it. Agents analyze the database for patterns, or whether one suspect, one buyer, gun dealer or geographical area is linked to a high number of crime guns, which could point them to a supply source for criminals. Leads are investigated or kicked back out to police departments.

"It sounds basic, but it's not. One gun can take us across borders, across state lines, in and out of the country. One gun from these traces could expand the globe," said Special Agent Clarence Lawrence, head of ATF's Violent Gang Task Force.

Chief Gil Kerlikowske said his department, which has an analyst to work with the center, has tracked every crime gun for the past five years. About 950 guns were confiscated by Seattle police last year, according to police records. Kerlikowske would like to see more police departments trace every gun they recover.

"Whether they're found under a bush, taken off a suspect, etc., we want to know where they're coming from, and if any dealers are supplying more guns used in crimes than others," Kerlikowske said.

Trace information can return in less than 24 hours on homicides and serious crimes, such as with the handguns used in the Jewish Federation shootings last summer.

Before regional centers became operational in Seattle and other areas, much of the analysis was done at the ATF's National Tracing Center in West Virginia, said Special Agent-in-Charge Kelvin Crenshaw, who heads the ATF Seattle division.

"Before, we had to do it from a national standpoint. But with this, the Regional Crime Gun center, we're going to be able to pick up on those trends quickly and address the problems more effectively," he said.

Recent changes in federal law, pushed by gun-rights advocates, prevent the ATF from publicly sharing specific data about crime guns used, where they were bought, or in what geographical areas.

"The problem is that the tracing center can't tell the people who live in those communities about the crime guns it's tracing," said Dennis Henigan, legal director for the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence. "It can't tell them how fast they're moving into the illegal market and ... what kind of guns are being traced. That's all information that the ATF used to disclose to the public," through annual reports.

The law also restricts the agency from sharing its data with police outside of specific investigations, which some law enforcement sources and gun-control advocates say hinders its effectiveness. If Seattle police traced a crime gun to a person or dealer in Kent, only Seattle police would be entitled to the information. The ATF couldn't inform Kent police, Kerlikowske said.

Henigan points to a Brady Center analysis of ATF reports in 2000 that showed most crime guns were sold by a small portion of licensed firearms dealers, which he says indicates a few unscrupulous dealers are feeding the black market. That same report showed 44 percent of Seattle crime guns came from six dealers, according to the report.

But groups such as the National Rifle Association argue that allowing citizens or interest groups access to the data could jeopardize investigations and infringe on the privacy rights of law-abiding gun owners.

And since not all trace guns actually were used in crimes -- such as a rifle that someone lost while hunting -- the data can be misconstrued to paint law-abiding gun retailers as disreputable, said Andrew Arulanandam, an NRA spokesman.

"Our position has always been that trace information ought to be made available for law enforcement and for prosecuting entities. There's no conceivable reason for civilians, politicians or interest groups to have access to that data," he said.

Tracking crime guns beyond the first purchaser is difficult, given about 90 percent of firearms change hands at least once before they're involved in a crime. Police and federal agents will take the case as far as possible, especially if it's involved in a violent crime.

Most were not stolen. Many criminals get their guns through "straw purchases," a term referring to the illegal practice of buying firearms on behalf of another whose criminal background would flunk the federally mandated background check, Crenshaw said.

"Once (the investigation) gets beyond the first person at the gun store, then it becomes labor intensive," Crenshaw said. "Now I'm asking an agent to say, 'OK, this is the guy who purchased the gun from the gun store, go see him and see what he did with it.' From that point we really need to be aggressive and find out what happened."

When one person's name pops up in connection to several crime guns, that could be a hint, he said.

Linking guns to other crimes also is done through an ATF nationwide database of spent casings collected from crime scenes. Forensic firearms experts such as Rick Wyant at the State Patrol Crime Lab in South Seattle use the database while testing guns under investigation by police.

Wyant shoots crime guns and compares the markings gouged into the casings or bullets with those on casings or rounds found at the scene. Every weapon has a unique signature, which under a microscope enables him to say whether a casing came from a certain gun, he said.

He enters images of each casing into the Integrated Ballistics Information System, a nationwide database maintained by ATF.

Every few months, he and his partner take boxes of miscellaneous guns recovered by Seattle police and shoot them so the casings can be entered into the national database, possibly linking them to gun crimes. Wyant also restores serial numbers criminals have filed off weapons to impede tracing efforts.

Wyant, like Kerlikowske, said he encourages law enforcement agencies to submit every gun for forensic testing, even if it was involved in a "victimless crime" or found discarded in the street.

"We tell all agencies that nobody throws away a perfectly good gun for no reason," he said.

IMMIGRATION:

For The Sake Of Peaches, Pass Immigration Reform (LAT)

By David Mas Masumoto, David Mas Masumoto, An Organic Farmer And Author In Fresno, Is A Fellow At The Kellogg Foundation.

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

Want tasty fruit? Then find a way to ensure a steady workforce.

I HAVE A CHOICE of growing one of two types of peaches, but which one will be decided by Congress and President Bush. Without immigration reform, the better peach will be lost.

One peach is complex; the other is simple. One involves many hands; the other would be the product of technology that controls the process as much as possible.

One peach can have an unbelievable taste if I get it right as I work with the intricacies of nature; the other would be bred for consistency and a "good enough" standard, a uniform product designed for efficiency and longer shelf life.

One fruit requires manual labor — an intensive operation of workers constantly in my fields; the other calls for reducing the need for labor, substituting mechanization whenever possible and creating a system that is not at the mercy of worker shortages.

But whether I can grow a better peach depends on whether I have enough field workers, and that's where immigration reform comes in. In recent years, farm labor has been tight, with some workers lost to construction jobs and others because of increased border security. Some farmers have responded by increasing wages, yet there were still not enough people willing to work the harvests. Last year, pears in California rotted on trees; two years ago, my raisin harvest was endangered, and for the last three years, I've struggled with peach harvests, terrified that just as the fruit was at the peak of perfection, I wouldn't have enough workers. Some of my best fruit has fallen from my trees.

The agricultural industry supports federal legislation for a guest-worker program that would bring in temporary farm laborers when shortages arise. This remedy would fix short-term problems. However, a long-term solution lies in immigration reform that could change the nature of farming, especially when it comes to specialty crops and small-scale operations like mine.

Without sufficient labor, organic and sustainable agricultural methods are jeopardized. The choice to work with nature as opposed to controlling it demands constant monitoring of the fruit and adapting and responding to the rhythms of the seasons. These systems require many hands. I want the human character to be part of my fields and my produce.

With more hands on my farm, I can grow delicate heirloom varieties, pick riper fruit and work with "just in time" management strategies. Dismiss and devalue these hands and the final outcome changes. A peach may look the same on the outside, but the process used to create it will result in a very different end product. Imagine the taste of a sauce made with minimal human touch, substituting prepackaged ingredients in order to reduce the labor needed.

Agriculture makes a mistake, though, if our sole goal in immigration reform is to seek an abundant supply of cheap labor. Farmers must acknowledge the human capital in our fields. Investments in workers, such as training, can benefit all parties. Skilled positions can then be created for a more willing and able labor pool. With the right kind of reform, workers' worth would be redefined; they would no longer be invisible.

As undocumented workers emerge from the shadows, new tensions will be created. Communities will change. The social contract in a region — the relationships that connect and bind us — will be tested.

New social justice issues will challenge employers. Workers with faces can't be as easily dismissed; their calls for better wages, health benefits and working conditions will no longer be whispers. We in the agricultural community have signaled an openness to reform and acknowledged the need for labor to fill "jobs that no one else wants." We also need to accept the responsibility for that labor.

In the future, could providing better farmworker benefits help define a region and industry? Could we create an appellation based on social justice and market a valued-added product, similar to "fair trade" coffee, which guarantees growers a designated price and decent working conditions? Could I then grow peaches with a conscience? Consumers have been willing to pay more when they understand the story behind their foods, be it organic or in support of living wages.

A grape or peach can acquire a distinctive flavor from terroir — the taste of region. Surely the way that individuals, rural communities and industries include "new Americans" in agricultural systems also will alter the delicate nuances of taste. After all, the true character of a pristine fruit is a result of multiple inputs: weather, soil and water as well as management and labor relations.

As we once again debate immigration reform, agriculture has an opportunity to educate the public about the role farmers and workers have in growing food, in satisfying our hunger. We're all part of a food system at the dinner table, and the policy we create will affect the nature of each bite.

IRS Audits Marriott Over ESOP-Related Deductions (WP)

From News Services And Staff Reports

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

The Internal Revenue Service is auditing Marriott International's federal tax returns for fiscal 2000 through 2002 over $1 billion in deductions the hotel chain took related to its employee stock-ownership plan.

Bethesda-based Marriott said it received "notices of proposed adjustment" from the IRS on Thursday that challenged most of the federal income tax deductions related to the plan, and the government agency proposed "substantial excise taxes and penalties."

"We believe the IRS' proposed adjustments are incorrect, intend to vigorously defend our positions and are examining various procedural alternatives for resolution of this matter," Marriott said in a filing yesterday with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Thomas Marder, a spokesman for the company, said he couldn't provide guidance on the size of the proposed adjustment. When asked if the situation could significantly affect Marriott's bottom line, he referred to a regulatory filing from late last month, which came before the company received the proposed adjustment notice and said no material impact was expected.

He also said companies have used this type of tax transaction for more than 30 years.

The IRS is reviewing the ESOP feature of the company's "Employees' Profit Sharing, Retirement and Savings Plan and Trust" implemented on June 13, 2000.

"Principal and interest on the debt related to the transaction was forgiven over a 26-month period as a mechanism for funding company contributions of elective deferrals and matching contributions to the plan," according to the filing. Marriott claimed $1 billion in federal income tax deductions for the forgiven principal and interest on the debt over that period.

"The benefit related to the tax deductions was reflected in equity and did not flow through the provision for income taxes," the filing said.

Local Man Arrested In Tax-evasion Scam (BATCE)

Battle Creek Enquirer, March 3, 2007

U.S. Marshals on Thursday arrested Charles Conces of Battle Creek, the Justice Department announced.

The arrest resulted from a federal judge's Feb. 23 order finding Conces in civil contempt of court for failing to obey a court order entered on Feb. 8.

Conces, who lives in Pennfield Township, has run for Michigan attorney general and secretary of state as a member of the U.S. Taxpayers Party and has staged public protests against county judges outside the Calhoun County courthouse in Battle Creek.

The Feb. 8 order compelled Conces to disclose to the government the identities of certain persons for whom he drafted or provided advice regarding federal income taxes, the identities of the persons who are responsible for his Web site, and all documents that he drafted or assisted in drafting for these persons no later than Feb. 16.

Conces refused to disclose the identities and documents as ordered by the court.

On Feb. 23, the court held Conces in civil contempt and ordered him to report to the U.S. Marshal no later than noon on March 1, 2007. Conces reported to the U.S. Marshals and was taken into custody. According to the court's Feb. 23 order, Conces will remain in the custody of the U.S. Marshals until he complies with the order to disclose these identities and documents.

In April 2006, the court permanently enjoined Conces and his organization, the National Lawman Committee for the Public Interest, from preparing tax returns for others and promoting several tax fraud schemes. The court had concluded that Conces promoted "tax evasion by creating and selling materials designed to obstruct the administration of the income tax laws."

"The Justice Department is not only committed to shutting down the tax scams that cheat the federal treasury and the taxpayers who pay into it, but also ensuring that such tax scams do not resurface later," said Eileen J. O'Connor, assistant attorney general for the federal Justice Department's Tax Division, in a press release.

"Tax scam promoters who disobey court orders and refuse to comply with established court procedures risk severe consequences."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Army Secretary Ousted (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Steve Vogel

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

Second Firing Follows Walter Reed Revelations; Bush Vows a Probe

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates fired the secretary of the Army yesterday and President Bush vowed to investigate allegations of substandard treatment of wounded soldiers as the administration scrambled to contain fallout from the scandal over squalid housing and bureaucratic delays in outpatient care at Walter Reed Army Medical Center.

The Army named Maj. Gen. Eric B. Schoomaker as the new commander of Walter Reed only a day after picking Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, who had previously commanded the medical center, as the temporary chief. Kiley's selection had angered soldiers and family groups -- and, more important, Gates -- because of their belief that he had been aware of problems at the hospital and done little to address them. Kiley is the current Army surgeon general.

Gates made little secret of his dismay when he appeared before reporters yesterday to announce the resignation of Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey. Pentagon officials indicated that Harvey was forced to resign because Gates was angry with how the Army handled allegations of poor care detailed in a series of Washington Post reports. The facility's commander, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, was dismissed this week, and a captain and several lower-level soldiers were reassigned.

"I am disappointed that some in the Army have not adequately appreciated the seriousness of the situation pertaining to outpatient care at Walter Reed," Gates said. "Some have shown too much defensiveness and have not shown enough focus on digging into and addressing the problems."

Later, in an interview, an emotional Harvey appeared both apologetic and defensive. "It's unexcusable to have soldiers in that type of building," he said, explaining why he resigned.

But he also said that the Post stories lacked balance. "Where's the other side of the story?" he asked, his voice rising. "Two articles in your paper have ruined the career of General Weightman, who is a very decent man, and then a captain . . . and the secretary of the Army. If that satisfies the populace, maybe this will stop further dismissals."

In a sign of the seriousness with which Bush takes the situation, the White House announced that he will soon name a commission to look into whether there are similar problems at other military and veterans hospitals. Administration officials took the unusual step of releasing early the text of Bush's regular Saturday radio address, in which the president will vow to ensure that the government meets the physical and mental health needs of soldiers returning from Iraq and Afghanistan.

"Most of the people working at Walter Reed are dedicated professionals," Bush will say, according to the text. "Yet some of our troops at Walter Reed have experienced bureaucratic delays and living conditions that are less than they deserve. This is unacceptable to me, it is unacceptable to our country, and it's not going to continue."

Taken together, the developments yesterday highlighted the anger at the highest levels of the administration over the problems at Walter Reed, as well as the political danger for the White House. Veterans groups remain among the few strong supporters of the war and have been an important part of the president's political base, yet they -- along with military families -- have been outraged since the problems first became public two weeks ago.

Joe Davis, a spokesman for the Veterans of Foreign Wars, said that the reports have angered members across the country and that the group hopes Vice President Cheney will address the issue when he speaks to its legislative conference on Monday. "Nobody would believe the military would do this to their wounded," Davis said. "We want accountability."

Democrats in Congress, meanwhile, have strongly denounced the administration for what they call insufficient attention to the needs of returning soldiers. At least two committees are mobilizing to investigate the Walter Reed situation. The House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform issued a subpoena yesterday to compel Weightman to testify at a congressional hearing Monday.

The committee also released an internal Army memorandum reportedly written in September in which the Walter Reed garrison commander, Col. Peter Garibaldi, warned Weightman that "patient care services are at risk of mission failure" because of staff shortages brought on by the privatization of the hospital's support workforce.

Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.), a member of the House Appropriations subcommittee on defense and a close ally of a leading war critic, Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), said Bush's new commission is too little too late. "He's the executive," Moran said. "This has been six years, and now six years later, after an awful lot of neglect, he's going to get around to putting a commission together, a study to tell him what to do. . . . I think he's feeling politically desperate."

White House officials said politics played no role in their decision to form the commission, saying that Bush is genuinely outraged by the conditions at Walter Reed and that he learned about them from the recent news reports. "Once the Walter Reed stories ran, there was a collective feeling in the building, and certainly from the president, that whatever reasons or excuses, it was unacceptable," said Tony Fratto, deputy White House press secretary.

Eleven national volunteer organizations that help the wounded were called to the White House to meet with Bush on Wednesday, a meeting that White House officials said was planned before the Walter Reed stories broke. Cindy McGrew, founder of Operation Second Chance, a Maryland-based group that deals primarily with the wounded at Walter Reed, attended and said the president "wants to do all he can to help."

But the director of another organization, who spoke on the condition of anonymity so as not to anger the administration, called the event a "missed opportunity to ask people who have day-to-day interaction with the wounded to provide insight into how to fix this situation."

Anthony J. Principi, who served Bush as his first secretary of veterans affairs, said he was not sure Walter Reed is a political problem for the president but indicated that veterans groups are watching the situation carefully. "Veterans organizations have been very supportive of the president -- they respect and admire that he is stepping out on the issue and will hold people accountable. The president needs their support," he said.

The new commander of Walter Reed is Schoomaker, 58, currently commander of the U.S. Army Medical Research and Materiel Command at Fort Detrick, Md., home to biological weapon defense research. He is the younger brother of Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff.

It appears he has his work cut out for him. Yesterday, soldiers living in Building 18, the site of the worst problems, were told to pack their things so that Walter Reed could properly renovate the dank structure besieged by mold, leaks and rot. Some of the wounded were moved to another building on the post, while others were driven to a hotel in Silver Spring.

One soldier who had been living in Building 18 for 16 months, waiting to be treated for back problems, was told to report to barracks in Fort Meade, Md., according to his father. The soldier arrived at Fort Meade yesterday afternoon with his gear but was unable to move into his new accommodations -- the building had no elevator, and the soldier could not climb the stairs.

US Army Secretary Quits Over Row (BBC)

BBC.com, March 2, 2007

US Army Secretary Francis Harvey has resigned amid a row over the treatment of wounded US soldiers.

The move follows critical reports in the US media about the care of troops wounded in Afghanistan and Iraq at Washington's Walter Reed hospital.

The Washington Post said last week that some of the soldiers lived in buildings infested with rodents and cockroaches.

Mr Harvey was appointed in November 2004 and was responsible for the efficient functioning of the US army.

Mr Harvey's resignation was announced by Defence Secretary Robert Gates.

Our wounded soldiers and their families have sacrificed much and they deserve the best we can offer

Robert Gates It came a day after the head of Walter Reed Army Medical Center, Maj Gen George Weightman, was fired.

"I am disappointed that some in the army have not adequately appreciated the seriousness of the situation pertaining to outpatient care at Walter Reed," Mr Gates said.

"Some have shown too much defensiveness and have not shown enough focus on digging into and addressing the problems," he added.

Francis Harvey was appointed army secretary in 2004

The Washington Post newspaper claimed in a series of articles that conditions at Walter Reed, the most famous veterans' hospital in the US, were poor.

Outpatients lived in rat-infested rooms and bureaucracy got in the way of those trying to provide help to often badly injured soldiers, the articles reported.

The BBC's Justin Webb in Washington says that America's wounded veterans are regarded by most people in the country as truly heroic, so the fall-out has been considerable.

Mr Gates said that he was "concerned that some do not properly understand the need to communicate to the wounded and their families that we have no higher priority than their care".

"Our wounded soldiers and their families have sacrificed much and they deserve the best we can offer," he added.

Presidential address

According to our correspondent, the White House will hope that this trenchant intervention from Mr Gates will protect the president from political damage.

President George W Bush has been forced to address the issue in his weekly radio address - to be broadcast on Saturday - acknowledging that the treatment of the veterans has not been good enough.

"This is unacceptable to me, it is unacceptable to our country and it's not going to continue," he said, in an excerpt released by the White House.

He has announced that a cross-party commission will be formed to oversee health care for veterans.

Nonetheless, for many Americans it is a shock to discover that the men and women they care so deeply about have been so badly let down, our correspondent adds.

Army Secretary Ousted In Furor On Hospital Care (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 2 — Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey was forced to resign Friday over the handling of revelations that wounded soldiers were receiving shabby and slow treatment at Walter Reed Army Medical Center.

Even as the grim-faced defense secretary, Robert M. Gates, announced Mr. Harvey's dismissal, the Army put a new general in charge of the hospital, the second change of command in two days, and a clear signal that Mr. Gates wanted a clean break from the status quo.

Earlier, the White House had announced that President Bush would appoint a bipartisan panel to examine the medical treatment provided to wounded service members, both by the Defense Department and by the Department of Veterans Affairs.

"I am disappointed that some in the Army have not adequately appreciated the seriousness of the situation," Mr. Gates told reporters. "Some have shown too much defensiveness and have not shown enough focus on digging into and addressing the problems."

A senior Pentagon official said Mr. Gates had demanded Mr. Harvey's resignation because he was displeased that Mr. Harvey on Thursday, in dismissing the commander of Walter Reed, temporarily named Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley to take command. General Kiley, the Army's top medical officer, had earlier appeared to play down the problems at Walter Reed, where he was in command until 2004.

Mr. Gates's aggressiveness in addressing the problem has surprised many Pentagon officials who are still getting used to his style more than two months into his service.

Ordered by Mr. Gates to get an acceptable new commander in place by the end of the day, the Army announced late Friday that Maj. Gen. Eric B. Schoomaker, a veteran Army doctor and the brother of the current Army chief of staff, would take over command at Walter Reed.

In his weekly radio address, taped on Friday for broadcast on Saturday morning, Mr. Bush said, "This is unacceptable to me, it is unacceptable to our country, and it's not going to continue." The White House released a transcript without the usual embargo on its publication.

White House officials said the review ordered by Mr. Bush would examine soldiers' medical treatment starting when they were wounded, as they were moved to Defense Department hospitals and as they received care in V.A. facilities after leaving the armed services.

The White House commission seemed to overlap in at least some respects with a separate panel announced by Mr. Gates last week that he said had authority to examine living conditions, problems getting prompt care and any other issues at Walter Reed and other military-run hospitals the panel chose to examine.

Officials said the White House commission was likely to undertake a broader review and take longer with its investigation than the Pentagon panel, which has a 45-day deadline. Mr. Bush plans to name his commission's members next week.

House and Senate committees, too, are planning hearings on the matter next week. The House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform said Friday that it was issuing a subpoena to Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, who had been in command of the hospital since last August before his firing on Thursday. The panel has scheduled a hearing at Walter Reed on Monday.

The committee also made public an internal hospital memorandum written last September that warned that an Army decision to privatize support services at Walter Reed was causing an exodus of experienced career personnel and putting patient care "at risk of mission failure."

The scandal at Walter Reed is particularly embarrassing to the administration because many top officials have visited injured troops there. Although Mr. Bush has visited Walter Reed several times, his spokesman, Tony Snow, said last month that the president had learned about the situation from the newspaper and that he had given orders to "find out what the problem is and fix it."

Army officials have defended the treatment provided to most patients at Walter Reed, especially the most serious cases, those admitted to inpatient wards on its campus a few miles from the center of Washington.

But the administration has been unable to explain why adequate improvements at Walter Reed's nearby satellite facilities used to house outpatients were not made before the shoddy conditions were disclosed last month in a series of articles in The Washington Post. And the furor is unlikely to abate soon.

Mr. Harvey, the senior civilian official overseeing the Army, joined the Pentagon in 2004 after a long career as an engineer working mainly for defense contractors. He was an executive with the Westinghouse Corporation from 1969 to 1997.

In a speech last year, he said improved efficiency could reduce both the federal work force and the number of contractors.

But the House committee leaders said that at Walter Reed, hiring a contractor had resulted in a steep decline in the number of support personnel like maintenance workers to fewer than 60 last month, from 300 in early 2006.

An Army spokesman, Paul Boyce, said that "didn't help" efforts over the last year to improve conditions for patients in Building 18, the dilapidated 50-room former hotel across the street from Walter Reed where outpatients are housed. Before rushed renovations last month, the building had moldy walls, stained carpets and infestations of rats.

Walter Reed officials have also acknowledged that the large number of wounded from Iraq and Afghanistan, currently around 650 patients and outpatients, has taxed doctors, nurses and other care providers and forced them to rely more heavily on overflow facilities.

General Kiley, commander of Walter Reed from 2002 to 2004, left when he was appointed Army surgeon general. On a tour of the outpatient facilities for reporters last month, he took issue with the way the conditions were portrayed in some accounts.

"While we have some issues here, this is not a horrific, catastrophic failure at Walter Reed," he said. "I mean these are not good, but you saw rooms that look perfectly acceptable, you saw the day rooms with the pool tables and plasma screen TVs, and we're working every day to make those rooms better."

But those comments and others did not please Mr. Gates, aides said. Even though he issued a statement Thursday endorsing the decision to remove General Weightman, he was not aware that the Army had chosen General Kiley to be the acting commander, an appointment that lasted just one day.

"It could have been almost anybody but Kiley," said a senior Pentagon official, who was granted anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss Mr. Gates's thinking. Referring to General Kiley's service as the hospital commander, he added: "Some of this may well have developed and even started on his watch. And his comments also demonstrated a certain insensitivity."

General Schoomaker, 58, the new commander, had been commander of the Army's Medical Research and Material Command at Fort Detrick, Md. His brother, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, who is stepping down next month, was not involved in the decision to select him, the senior Pentagon official said.

In a visit to the outpatient facility last month before it was fixed up, Mr. Harvey called the conditions inexcusable. But he went on to place the blame for the situation on noncommissioned officers.

"We had some N.C.O.'s who weren't doing their job, period," Mr. Harvey said.

Army Secretary Quits In Walter Reed Scandal (CHIT)

By Aamer Madhani, John Biemer

Chicago Tribune, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Mired in controversy over the deplorable conditions at one of the Army's pre-eminent facilities for treating battle-scarred troops, Army Secretary Francis Harvey abruptly resigned Friday as the White House announced it would conduct a comprehensive review of the military's care of wounded soldiers.

Harvey's resignation came just a day after he ousted the two-star general who was commander of the Walter Reed Army Medical Center here after revelations that soldiers recovering from wounds suffered in Iraq and Afghanistan were being housed in moldy quarters, infested by mice and cockroaches.

Harvey had replaced the fired Maj. George Weightman as the head of Walter Reed with Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, a temporary replacement whose role in the scandal is still in question. Harvey's move angered Defense Secretary Robert Gates, who announced late Friday that he had accepted Harvey's resignation and that under-secretary Peter Geren would serve as acting secretary of the Army until a permanent replacement could be found. The Army also announced that Kiley would be replaced by Maj. Gen. Eric Schoomaker, the commanding general of the U.S. Army Medical Research and Materiel Command at Ft. Detrick, Md.

The Washington Post, which uncovered the decrepit conditions at Walter Reed, reported that Kiley had received complaints as early as 2003 but had done nothing to rectify the situation. After the newspaper's initial reports about the conditions late last month, Kiley derided the coverage as "one-sided."

Gates did not take questions from reporters, but made it clear that Harvey's ouster was related to his handling of the controversy.

"I am disappointed that some in of the Army have not adequately appreciated the seriousness of the situation pertaining to outpatient care at Walter Reed," Gates said. "Some have shown too much defensiveness and have not shown enough focus on digging into and addressing the problems."

The White House also announced on Friday that a presidential commission would review conditions at Walter Reed. President Bush expressed disappointment over the handling of the revelations and said that he has directed Gates to assess the situation, according to a White House transcript of the president's weekly radio address that is scheduled to air Saturday morning.

"These servicemen and women deserve the thanks of our country, and they deserve the best care our nation can provide," Bush said according to the transcript. "Yet some of our troops at Walter Reed have experienced bureaucratic delays and living conditions that are less than they deserve. This is unacceptable to me, it is unacceptable to our country, and it's not going to continue."

Veterans Affairs Secretary James Nicholson toured the Marionjoy Rehabilitation Hospital in Wheaton, Ill., west of Chicago on Friday. He said that the VA is doing its own inquiry into the care provided at its 155 medical centers throughout the country, which serve a million veterans a week, "to make sure that things are getting done the way they're supposed to be done."

Nicholson said that overall the VA is doing a good job in providing care for wounded veterans returning from the Iraq and Afghanistan wars.

"But these injuries are so serious that if there is just one that falls through the crack, it's unacceptable and it's painful to know about and so we have to get it perfect and that's the goal of the VA and I'm sure that's the goal of the Army," said Nicholson, who was also in town for a DuPage County Republican fundraiser.

Both the Senate and House armed services committees are planning hearings on the Walter Reed scandal, which has been compounded by recent news reports that many wounded Iraq veterans are receiving inadequate treatment from a beleaguered veterans health care system. The House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform announced it had issued a subpoena to compel Weightman, the ousted head of Walter Reed, to appear at a hearing on Monday to testify about an effort to privatize some support services at Walter Reed.

Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), chairman of the government oversight panel, and fellow committee member Rep. John Tierney (D-Mass.), told Weightman in a letter that privatization efforts at Walter Reed may have led to the management staff being cut from 300 to less than 60 earlier this year.

Walter Reed awarded a five-year, $120 million contract to IAP Worldwide Services for base operation support services, according to the letter. That company is tied to a former senior official of Halliburton, which has won millions of dollars in U.S.

contracts for providing support services in Iraq and Afghanistan. Vice President Dick Cheney served as Halliburton's chief executive from 1995 to 2000.

"It would be reprehensible if the deplorable conditions were caused or aggravated by an ideological commitment to privatize services regardless of the costs to taxpayers and the consequences for wounded soldiers," Waxman and Tierney wrote.

Bush Announces Plans To Investigate Veterans' Health Care (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson And Chris Adams

McClatchy Newspapers, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON - In more fallout from reports of appalling conditions at the Army's top medical facility, Army Secretary Francis Harvey resigned Friday and President Bush announced a far-reaching investigation into the quality of health care for wounded troops.

Bush said he'd appoint a bipartisan commission to examine the treatment of wounded military personnel "from the time they leave the battlefield through their return to civilian life." He said he was "deeply troubled" by reports of substandard care at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center, where some recuperating veterans complained of being neglected and left in moldy, deteriorating facilities.

The president will formally announce the new commission in his Saturday radio address, but the White House released an early transcript of his remarks. In an unusual move, it distributed his comments for immediate release, without waiting for his speech. He taped his comments Friday.

Bush said he would appoint the commission "in the coming days" and would set "a firm deadline" for a report.

Harvey's resignation came a day after Maj. Gen. George Weightman was ousted as the top commander at Walter Reed. Defense Secretary Robert Gates suggested that Harvey and Weightman were forced out because they downplayed problems highlighted by recent stories in The Washington Post. Some problems at Walter Reed were first reported as early as 2005 by the online magazine Salon.

"I am disappointed that some in the Army have not adequately appreciated the seriousness of the situation pertaining to outpatient care at Walter Reed," Gates said with what appeared to be barely contained anger. "Some have shown too much defensiveness and have not shown enough focus on digging into and addressing the problems."

He blamed the problems on Walter Reed's leadership, not its doctors, nurses and other health-care workers.

The Army later announced that Maj. Gen. Eric Schoomaker would become the new commander at Walter Reed, replacing Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, who spent just a day in the post after Harvey tapped him to fill in. Kiley, who'd served a previous stint at Walter Reed, drew objections from critics, who said he'd failed to confront some of the same problems that recently came to light.

The treatment of wounded soldiers and veterans has become a sensitive issue in the context of the Iraq war.

Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., the chairman of the House Oversight Committee, said the panel would subpoena Weightman to a hearing Monday. The Army had tried to prevent him from testifying.

The House Armed Services Committee announced plans for a hearing Thursday on conditions at Walter Reed.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., toured Walter Reed on Friday and complained that wounded soldiers had been directed to stop talking to reporters. In a letter to Harvey before he resigned, the Democratic presidential candidate said wounded soldiers "have earned the right to have their voices heard."

The Washington Post stories on Walter Reed were among a series of recent news accounts highlighting problems in medical care for veterans and active-duty military personnel.

McClatchy Newspapers early last month detailed widespread gaps in the Department of Veterans Affairs' mental health-care system and showed how veterans in many parts of the country have limited access to specialized treatment for post-traumatic stress disorder, the most frequent mental-health problem to emerge from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

McClatchy previously had documented problems in the VA's disability compensation and other benefits systems. An ABC News special this week highlighted troubles in the VA's care of veterans with traumatic brain injuries, and Newsweek magazine blasts the VA in its current cover story for a host of problems in its medical and benefits divisions.

Veterans' health care is a sensitive issue for an administration that claims to offer the best equipment and care to active-duty troops and veterans.

Accounts of dismal conditions at Walter Reed were particularly embarrassing for the White House because Bush often visits the hospital. His last trip was in December, but aides said he was unaware of any problems until he read about them in the newspaper.

"Some of our troops at Walter Reed have experienced bureaucratic delays and living conditions that are less than they deserve. This is unacceptable to me, it is unacceptable to our country and it's not going to continue," Bush says in his prepared radio remarks.

He adds, "As we work to improve conditions at Walter Reed, we're also taking steps to find out whether similar problems have occurred at other military and veterans hospitals."

Walter Reed is part of the Pentagon's military health system, designed to serve active-duty personnel. The VA's operations for military veterans are far larger, with more than 150 hospitals and more than 875 outpatient clinics nationwide.

In his radio speech, Bush points to the VA's expanding budget as evidence of "our ongoing effort to improve our service to our nation's veterans." If Congress approves his fiscal 2008 VA budget, he said, the agency's health-care budget will have jumped by 83 percent in the past six years and its overall budget will have increased 77 percent, to $86 billion.

There's no question that the VA's budget has grown recently, and the health system has received good marks for significant improvements.

At the same time, Democrats in Congress and others question whether the VA's budget is keeping pace with burdens imposed by increasing numbers of veterans coming back from the war, aging patients and rising medical-care costs.

"Yes, it has been increased, but certainly it hasn't been increased enough to meet the demands, the salary increases and inflationary factors," said Joe Violante, the national legislative director for Disabled American Veterans.

At a budget hearing two weeks ago, Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash., questioned the administration's estimate that the VA would treat 263,000 Iraq and Afghanistan war veterans next year - a figure that she suggested was too low.

In addition, Violante and others say the VA suffers from inconsistent access: good hospitals and clinics in some part of the country and understaffed or overwhelmed hospitals elsewhere.

Army Secretary Resigns In Scandal's Wake (AP)

By Robert Burns,

AP, March 3, 2007

Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey abruptly stepped down Friday as the Bush administration struggled to cope with the fallout from a scandal over substandard conditions for war-wounded soldiers at Walter Reed Army Medical Center.

Harvey's departure, announced on short notice by a visibly agitated Defense Secretary Robert Gates, was the most dramatic move in an escalating removal of officials with responsibilities over one of the military's highest-profile and busiest medical facilities.

Hours earlier, President Bush ordered a comprehensive review of conditions at the nation's network of military and veteran hospitals, which has been overwhelmed by injured troops from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Gates said Harvey had resigned, but senior defense officials speaking on condition of anonymity said Gates had privately demanded that Harvey leave. Gates was displeased that the officer Harvey had chosen as interim commander of Walter Reed — Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, the current Army surgeon general and a former commander of Walter Reed — has been accused by critics of long knowing about the problems there and not improving outpatient care.

"I am disappointed that some in the Army have not adequately appreciated the seriousness of the situation pertaining to outpatient care at Walter Reed," Gates said in the Pentagon briefing room. He took no questions from reporters.

Harvey was at Fort Benning, Ga., on Friday morning when he cut short his visit to return to Washington to meet with Gates.

In an interview in his office shortly after the announcement, Harvey said he offered Gates his resignation because he believed the Army let the wounded soldiers down. He said the furor has depressed the staff at Walter Reed, and he wanted to prevent any others from leaving or being fired.

"We can't have them leave," he said. "We can't have them be so demoralized that they leave. So I figured what the heck, if I offer my resignation that may stop all this bleeding and it was accepted."

Asked if Gates prodded him to leave, Harvey acknowledged the secretary wasn't happy with the way the Army handled the matter. But he said he had been thinking about stepping down for a few days and "I submitted my resignation."

He added, "We let the soldiers down, I'm the head of the Army. I thought it was necessary to do that."

On Thursday, Harvey fired the medical center's previous commander, Maj. Gen. George Weightman, for failures linked to the outpatient treatment controversy. Many had speculated that Weightman would be relieved of command, but Harvey's departure was a surprise. His last day in the job will be March 9.

Peter Geren, the undersecretary of the Army, will serve as Harvey's temporary replacement until Bush nominates a new secretary.

As Army secretary, Harvey is the service's top civilian official. He commands no troops. Along with the four-star general who is Army chief of staff, the secretary has statutory responsibility for training and equipping the Army. That includes responsibility for budgeting, recruiting and other personnel and resource policies.

The Army announced Friday that Maj. Gen. Eric B. Schoomaker, 58, will be the new commander of Walter Reed, which is located in Washington.

"From what I have learned, the problems at Walter Reed appear to be problems of leadership," Gates said. "The Walter Reed doctors, nurses and other staff are among the best and most caring in the world. They deserve our continued deepest thanks and strongest support."

Harvey said the Army was addressing the problems but added that since the revelations have now ruined Weightman's career and that of several other lower level solders, perhaps his own departure will "will stop further dismissals."

The revelations about shoddy facilities and wounded soldiers enduring long waits for treatment have embarrassed the Army and the Bush administration at a time when the White House is scrambling to shore up eroding support for the Iraq war. It has prompted numerous calls in Congress for more information, and sullied the reputation of what is supposed to be one of the military's foremost medical facilities.

An internal memo from Weightman last fall requested funding and additional personnel, saying that if shortfalls and the loss of skilled staff were not addressed "patient care services are at risk of mission failure."

Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, applauded Harvey's departure.

"I commend him for taking responsibility for the problems at Walter Reed," Skelton said.

The defense secretary indicated he was unhappy with the way Army leaders had responded to the Walter Reed disclosures.

"Some have shown too much defensiveness and have not shown enough focus on digging into and addressing the problems," Gates said. "Also I am concerned that some do not properly understand the need to communicate to the wounded and their families that we have no higher priority than their care and that addressing their concerns about the quality of their outpatient experience is critically important. Our wounded soldiers and their families have sacrificed much and they deserve the best we can offer."

The White House said the president would name a bipartisan commission to assess whether the problems at Walter Reed exist at other facilities. Last week, Gates created an outside panel to review the situation at Walter Reed and the other major military hospital in the Washington area, the National Naval Medical Center at Bethesda, Md.

The actions come after The Washington Post documented squalid living conditions for some outpatient soldiers at Walter Reed and bureaucratic problems that prevented many troops from getting adequate care.

Harvey has been Army secretary since November 2004.

He is the second consecutive Army secretary to be removed abruptly from office. In April 2003, then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld fired Thomas White, who had engaged in public disputes with Rumsfeld.

A former businessman trained as an engineer, Harvey counted as one of his proudest achievements a turnaround of the Army's recent recruiting slump. The Army missed its recruiting goal 2005 for the first time since 1999, and that same year Harvey instituted a series of changes that led to a recovery in recruiting.

Army Secretary Quits In Wake Of Hospital Scandal (CNN)

CNN.com, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Secretary of the Army Francis Harvey resigned Friday in the wake of recent reports of substandard conditions at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, a key facility treating troops wounded in Iraq.

Defense Secretary Robert Gates announced Harvey's resignation at the Pentagon, just a day after Harvey removed the hospital's commander, Maj. Gen. George Weightman, from his post.

Gates said Undersecretary of the Army Peter Geren will temporarily take Harvey's place. Harvey will leave on March 9.

"I thanked Dr. Harvey for his distinguished service to the department and to the nation," Gates said. "This flagship institution must have its new leadership in place as quickly as possible."

The Army later said Maj. Gen. Eric B. Schoomaker will take command of Walter Reed and the North Atlantic Regional Medical Command.

Schoomaker now commands the U.S. Army Medical Research and Material Command at Fort Detrick, Maryland.

Gates accepted no questions after his announcement, and didn't explain why Harvey resigned. However, he repeated something the Army said Thursday when Weightman was fired: The problems at the hospital reflect a lack of leadership.

"I am disappointed that some in the Army have not adequately appreciated the seriousness of the situation pertinent to outpatient care at Walter Reed. Some have shown too much defensiveness, and have not shown enough focus on digging into and addressing the problems."

Gates praised the doctors and other medical personnel at Walter Reed, and said they deserve support.

Troops recuperating from wounds they suffered in Iraq and Afghanistan were discovered to be living in substandard conditions in Building 18, an adjunct structure at Walter Reed that was once a hotel. There also were complaints of too much bureaucratic red tape.

Weightman, the fired commander, had said he was unaware of the substandard conditions.

But in a memo signed by a deputy to Weightman in September 2006, five months before reports of the problems at Walter Reed came to light, concerns were raised about care at the facility after the Army's decision to privatize support services there.

The memo obtained by the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee says Walter Reed "operations and patient care services are at risk of mission failure."

Harvey had been the Army's top civilian official since November 2004. Before President Bush appointed him to the position, he spent much of his career working for defense contractors, according his Army biography.

Earlier Friday, Bush said he is "deeply troubled" by the reports from Walter Reed and will form a bipartisan panel to assess medical care for wounded U.S. service members.

"This review will examine their treatment from the time they leave the battlefield through their return to civilian life as veterans, so we can ensure that we are meeting their physical and mental health needs," Bush will say in his weekly radio address, which is to air Saturday. A transcript was released by the White House on Friday.

He says he will soon announce commission members and set a deadline for their recommendations.

"Most of the people working at Walter Reed are dedicated professionals," Bush will say.

"Yet some of our troops at Walter Reed have experienced bureaucratic delays and living conditions that are less than they deserve. This is unacceptable to me, it is unacceptable to our country, and it's not going to continue."

The president said steps are being taken to find out whether there are similar problems at other military and veterans hospitals.

Bush said he is asking Congress for more than $86 billion for veterans' services for fiscal year 2008. If approved, "we will have increased the VA's health-care budget by 83 percent over the past six years, from about $20 billion to more than $36 billion."

Defense Secretary Sends Stern Message About Accountability (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks, Ann Scott Tyson

Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey was traveling outside Washington yesterday when he was notified that Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, his boss, wanted to see him as soon as possible.

By the end of the day, Harvey had returned from a trip to Fort Benning, Ga., and was out of a job -- fired because of the scandal over the poor treatment of outpatient soldiers at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center. He was the second Army secretary in a row to be relieved.

"The problems at Walter Reed appear to be problems of leadership," Gates said in a brief statement delivered at the Pentagon just after he met with Harvey.

Harvey's firing sent a strong message across the top of the military establishment that the new Pentagon chief, though a newcomer to the world of defense, would not be a passive manager and would hold senior leaders accountable for their actions. "There's a new boss in town, and the message is 'You guys need to do your job right,' " a Defense Department official said yesterday.

Indeed, in an interview shortly after Gates's statement, Harvey said: "We let the soldiers down. I'm the head of the Army. What can I say?"

The move was a "sudden, emotional decision on the parts of both secretaries," an Army official said, though Harvey maintained that it was his own decision to step down.

Pentagon officials said Gates was angry that as the scandal unfolded, the Army relieved the commander of Walter Reed, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, who had been in that job for only about half a year, and replaced him with Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, the Army surgeon general, who had previously commanded Walter Reed and was said by soldiers, their families and veterans' advocates to have long been aware of problems at the medical complex.

Harvey defended his decision to temporarily appoint Kiley as Walter Reed's commander. He said Kiley called him a few days ago and lambasted The Washington Post's series on the medical center. "He called me and said, 'I'm willing to defend myself. . . . I want to have an opportunity to defend myself, and it was wrong and it was yellow journalism at its worst, and I plan on doing it. Trust me.' " Harvey said. "I said, 'Okay, Kevin.' " Harvey added that Kiley was to be in the job only about a week until they could make a "thoughtful decision on who should replace him."

The Army's appointment of Kiley also set up a potentially embarrassing situation next week, when the general was scheduled to testify before two Senate committees about the Walter Reed situation. Yesterday, the Army appointed Maj. Gen. Eric B. Schoomaker as the new Walter Reed commander.

The White House also made it clear to the Pentagon that the scandal needed to be addressed more swiftly and vigorously than the Army appeared to be doing, defense officials said.

At a Senate Appropriations Committee hearing on Tuesday, Gates said he was "very concerned" about the situation at Walter Reed and wanted to make clear that "accountability on this will not be limited to a couple of [noncommissioned officers] and a junior officer once we know the facts."

While Gates did not explicitly mention his predecessor, the new defense secretary's approach to the problem has contrasted with the way Donald H. Rumsfeld's Pentagon handled allegations of wrongdoing. In the Abu Ghraib prison scandal, Pentagon officials were quick to point the finger at low-ranking soldiers, and only one officer who worked at the prison has faced court proceedings, even after numerous investigations found high-level problems with interrogation policies.

Gates said yesterday that "some in the Army have not adequately appreciated the seriousness" of the Walter Reed issue.

Former Army secretary Thomas E. White, who was fired by Rumsfeld in April 2003, said that the country being at war creates unique challenges for the service secretaries, especially the secretary of the Army. "The treatment of casualties is an extremely emotional issue, and there is a tremendous sense that these people should be well treated for the service they've rendered their country," White said. "And when they're not, that's an unacceptable situation."

Walter Reed Lapses Claim Another Top Army Official (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

Under pressure from Defense Secretary Gates, the Army secretary resigns.

WASHINGTON — Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey resigned Friday under pressure from Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, becoming the second top Army official forced to step down because of revelations of problems in the care of seriously injured soldiers at Walter Reed Army Medical Center.

In an unusually harsh denunciation, Gates said he was displeased with some Army officials over their handling of disclosures that soldiers had received substandard housing and poor outpatient treatment at Walter Reed.

"I am disappointed that some in the Army have not adequately appreciated the seriousness of the situation pertaining to outpatient care at Walter Reed," Gates said at the Pentagon. "Some have shown too much defensiveness and have not shown enough focus on digging into and addressing the problems."

The Army also named a new commander of Walter Reed on Friday — a day after Harvey had controversially appointed a previous head of Walter Reed, Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, as interim commander. A senior Pentagon official said Gates was upset that Harvey had appointed Kiley.

Military officers said the swift response by Gates and his willingness to move against top Army commanders and civilians was partly meant to differentiate him from his predecessor, Donald H. Rumsfeld. Throughout months of revelations of abuses by American soldiers at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq and elsewhere, Rumsfeld brushed off demands to punish ranking officers, and awarded one a medal for distinguished service.

President Bush, meanwhile, will tell the nation in his radio address today that he finds conditions at Walter Reed "unacceptable," and congressional Democrats have subpoenaed the hospital's former commander to what promises to be an acrimonious hearing at the Washington hospital Monday.

For Bush, the revelations came as an embarrassment. His radio speech — and its early release — represented an effort to contain the damage.

It was Harvey, the Army's top civilian official, who relieved Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman of his command of the hospital Thursday. In the same announcement, Harvey appointed Kiley, the Army's surgeon general and head of its Medical Command, as Walter Reed's acting commander.

But veterans groups, lawmakers and others had criticized Kiley — who headed Walter Reed from 2002 to 2004 — saying he had known about problems at the hospital and had failed to act.

On Friday, the Army appointed Maj. Gen. Eric B. Schoomaker as the new Walter Reed commander.

Last week, a day before Gates traveled to the hospital and publicly condemned the problems at Walter Reed, Kiley denied that there had been a "breakdown of leadership" and criticized the Washington Post stories that exposed problems at the hospital.

Although Gates declined to criticize Kiley last week, his comments Friday contradicted Kiley's stance that there had been no failure by hospital leaders. Gates singled out the doctors and nurses at the hospital for praise while criticizing the command.

"I want to reaffirm my confidence in the staff at Walter Reed and their professionalism and dedication to providing caring treatment," Gates said. "From what I have learned, the problems at Walter Reed appear to be problems of leadership."

Several military officials said Kiley also might be ousted from his post as surgeon general and Army medical commander. But the senior Pentagon official, speaking on condition of anonymity when discussing internal deliberations, said Kiley's fate would probably be determined by an independent review panel appointed by Gates last week to examine Army medical facilities.

Jerry Newberry, a spokesman for the Veterans of Foreign Wars, said Gates' actions had allayed his members' concerns that only low-level officials and officers would be held accountable for the problems at Walter Reed.

DOJ_NMG_0140214

"Obviously, [Gates] is a no-nonsense guy and means what he says. He's demanded people be held accountable and obviously they are," Newberry said.

Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.), a member of the Armed Services Committee, praised Gates' move.

"Secretary Gates gets a lot of points for what he did today," said McCaskill, who has drafted a measure to improve housing for wounded soldiers and to cut through bureaucracy.

But she said she did not think the problems at Walter Reed could be fixed until Kiley was replaced.

"He is responsible for the command culture that allowed the situation to continue even after he knew about it," she said. "It is clear he knew about it. The problems with the outpatients were brought to him. I hope Secretary Gates is not finished."

Military officials said Harvey had also failed to speak candidly enough about the problems.

On Thursday, during a round-table discussion with reporters, Harvey refused to entertain questions about the growing scandal, saying he had received legal advice against commenting on investigations of Army personnel.

When pressed to discuss the Army investigation, Harvey was curt: "Just let us do it," he said. "When it's done, we'll let you know."

Failure to take responsibility, acknowledge the problems or explain remedial steps was unacceptable to Gates, military officials said.

"Secretary Harvey was an outstanding leader, but he got it wrong on this one," said the senior Pentagon official. "And the secretary [Gates] is serious about accountability."

Although Army officials acknowledged Harvey's missteps in dealing with the hospital crisis, he has been popular with many officers.

Named Army secretary in 2004, Harvey is a former defense industry executive who spent much of his career as a senior executive for Westinghouse Corp. He has a doctorate in metallurgy and material sciences from the University of Pennsylvania.

In his radio address today, Bush is to announce the creation of a bipartisan presidential commission to review all medical care for wounded service members. The commission would be in addition to the independent panel appointed by Gates.

"Some of our troops at Walter Reed have experienced bureaucratic delays and living conditions that are less than they deserve," an advance Bush text says. "This is unacceptable to me, it is unacceptable to our country, and it's not going to continue."

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles) will head a congressional hearing at the hospital Monday.

At the hearing, Weightman, the medical center commander fired Thursday, will be questioned about a 2006 memo warning that a patient overload had strained hospital staffs and threatened care.

Preserve 'Core' Of No Child Left Behind Act, Bush Urges (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

He warns Congress against 'watering down' the education law.

LOUISVILLE, KY. — President Bush urged Congress to avoid broad changes to the education law that represented one of his key domestic policy accomplishments, saying Friday that "watering down" the No Child Left Behind Act "would be doing thousands of children a disservice."

"It's working," Bush said. "We can change parts of it for the better, but don't change the core of a piece of good legislation that's making a significant difference in the lives of a lot of children."

The law, which Bush signed in 2002, is to expire this year, and the president expressed his willingness to work with Capitol Hill's new Democratic majority on renewing it. He singled out the Democratic chairmen of the Senate and House education committees — Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Rep. George Miller of Martinez — as crucial to those negotiations.

DOJ_NMG_0140215

Kennedy and Miller helped provide bipartisan support for No Child Left Behind, but since its passage they and other Democrats have said that the administration has failed to provide sufficient funds to carry out its requirements.

Democratic leaders now can push for these and other changes to the law that they could not enact when Republicans controlled Congress.

Bush spoke to a crowd in the gymnasium of an elementary school in New Albany, Ind., before addressing a Republican Party fundraiser in nearby Louisville, Ky., later Friday.

Even as Bush focused on the education issue, reminders were plentiful of the foreign policy matters that have defined his presidency — his response to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and his decision to invade Iraq.

As Bush's motorcade neared the school, it passed a clutch of antiwar demonstrators; one held a sign reading, "War Leaves Every Child Left Behind." Elsewhere, he passed a banner reading, "Thank You for Keeping Us Safe."

At the fundraiser, Bush spoke to about 650 contributors to the National Republican Senatorial Committee and Mitch McConnell's 2008 reelection campaign. The Kentucky Republican, the Senate minority leader, will be seeking his fifth term.

McConnell estimated that Bush's appearance would take in about $2.1 million.

A key provision of the No Child Left Behind Act required states to establish uniform tests for assessing students' progress and school quality.

The measure's supporters say this has promoted greater accountability in public education and helped motivate improved student performance in some subjects.

But along with criticism of the funding level for the law, some skeptics have charged that it has hamstrung teachers by putting too much emphasis on "teaching to the test."

Earlier this year, an independent commission assembled by the nonpartisan Aspen Institute think tank recommended more than 70 changes to the law, including requiring an "exit exam" for high school seniors.

Bush has not said what changes he would accept. But he opposes relaxing testing requirements or requiring a national test to replace state exams.

He said Friday that he also favored speeding up the process through which parents learn about a school's test results to make it easier for them to decide whether to seek additional help for their children.

Bush Staffers Ordered 3 Ejected From Event, Man Says (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

DENVER, March 2 -- A volunteer said Friday that he was acting on orders from White House staffers when he helped eject three people from a taxpayer-funded event President Bush was attending, according to the man's attorney.

The volunteer, Michael Casper, said in a deposition that two White House employees told him to throw out the three after Casper saw them behaving suspiciously, lawyer Sean R. Gallagher said.

Casper named the White House employees as Steven A. Atkiss, deputy director for travel, and Jamie O'Keefe, lead advance staffer for the 2005 event, Gallagher said.

White House spokesman Blair Jones said he could not comment on pending litigation.

Leslie Weise and Alex Young, two of the three people who were thrown out, filed a federal lawsuit against Casper and Jay Bob Klinkerman, both volunteers with the event's host committee. Weise and Young say that they were told to leave because of their political views and that the White House had a policy of ejecting dissenters from the president's appearances.

Martha Tierney, an American Civil Liberties Union lawyer representing the plaintiffs, said Atkiss and O'Keefe would be added as defendants.

Justice Thomas Scorns Media, Affirmative Action In Interview (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

'That's a lie,' he says of the notion that he was recruited for college.

WASHINGTON — In a rare interview, Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas described himself as a high-achieving student who was mentored by a prominent priest when he enrolled in a Catholic college in Massachusetts in the late 1960s. But he bitterly rejected the idea that he benefited from affirmative action because he was black.

"That was the creation of the politicians, the people with a lot of mouth and nothing to say, and your industry," Thomas told a writer for Business Week magazine. "Everything becomes affirmative action."

In 1968, shortly after the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., the Rev. John Brooks began recruiting young black men to enroll at College of the Holy Cross, a Jesuit school in Worcester, Mass.

The initial class of 28 included Washington lawyer Theodore V. Wells Jr., who is representing former vice presidential aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby; Pulitzer Prize-winning novelist Edward P. Jones and investment banker and former New York City deputy mayor Stanley Grayson — as well as Thomas, the high court's only African American.

In an interview that accompanied the magazine's profile of Brooks, Thomas insisted he was not recruited to go to Holy Cross. After dropping out of a Missouri seminary in 1968, Thomas returned home to Savannah, Ga.

"A nun suggested Holy Cross. That's how I wound up there," he said. "Your industry [the news media] has suggested that we were all recruited. That's a lie. Really, it's a lie. I don't mean a mistake. It's a lie.

"That thing that has astounded me over the years is that there has been such an effort to roll that class into people's notion of affirmative action," he continued. "You hear this junk. It's just not consistent with what really happened."

Thomas expressed disdain for the news media several times during the interview.

"One of the reasons I don't do media interviews is, in the past, the media often has its own script," he said. "The media, unfortunately, have been universally untrustworthy because they have their own notions of what I should think or I should do."

At times, Thomas described himself as a solid student in college. "I had always been an honors student. I had always had really high grades, so that was never a problem." But he also said he struggled: "I'm not a school person. I never liked school. My best day of school was the day I graduated."

Thomas described how Brooks, then a dean of Holy Cross, won an "amnesty" for black students in December 1969 after they had quit the college en masse. Five black students had been singled out and expelled for taking part in a larger protest related to the Vietnam War. The other blacks decided to quit in solidarity with those who had been expelled. Thomas said his college career might have ended there had the priest not intervened.

"The black kids were being treated unfairly. I said: 'Look, if we're not going to be treated fairly here, let's leave,' " Thomas said. "Thank God for Ted [Wells] … and Father [Raymond] Swords and Father Brooks. They worked it…. What if he [Brooks] had just said: 'Let them go.' God only knows where I would be."

Brooks, now 83, told the magazine the initial decision to expel the five black students "was racism, basically." He persuaded Swords, the college president, to readmit them.

After graduating from Holy Cross in 1971, Thomas enrolled at Yale Law School and graduated in 1974. He took a job in Missouri with the state's then-attorney general, John Danforth. When Danforth was elected to the Senate, he took Thomas with him to Washington, and later lobbied to get him on the Supreme Court.

In 1991, when Justice Thurgood Marshall, the court's first African American, announced his retirement, President George H.W. Bush chose Thomas to succeed him.

In the interview, the now 58-year-old Thomas described his current life as an exhausting struggle. He pointed out a drawing in his office that shows an African American man draped over a desk with his hands stretching toward the floor. Thomas said a friend gave him the drawing because "he thought it captured my life."

"Look at the exhaustion," he said. "Mental. Physical. Spiritual. Just constant change. You just want to slow down. You see people take a walk and you want to, too."

U.S. Selects Design For New Nuclear Warhead (WP)

By Walter Pincus

DOJ_NMG_0140217

The National Nuclear Security Administration has selected a design from Lawrence Livermore and Sandia national laboratories that could become the basis for the first new nuclear warhead produced by the United States in more than 20 years.

The purpose of the new Reliable Replacement Warhead is to provide, beginning in 2012, a new generation of secure nuclear warheads -- initially for submarine-launched missiles -- that would provide a credible deterrent well into the mid-21st century.

"RRW will take advantage of today's science to ensure long-term confidence in the future stockpile" of nuclear warheads, Thomas P. D'Agostino, the NNSA's acting administrator, said yesterday. The Livermore design beat out one submitted by Los Alamos National Laboratory because there was a "higher confidence" that it could be certified without underground nuclear testing, D'Agostino said. He added that the Los Alamos design has some "highly innovative" features that will be developed "in parallel with the Livermore effort."

The design team will work with the Navy over the next 10 months to define a cost schedule and a production plan. The NNSA's 2008 budget includes $88 million for the RRW, though Congress could limit that funding and slow the program.

According to a chart prepared by the NNSA for Congress and made available to The Washington Post, the RRW program "decreases the likelihood of the need for nuclear testing for certification." Another program goal is to build the warheads so that "unauthorized use of the weapon" would be "impossible without re-manufacture," according to NNSA charts.

The new warheads would require an upgrade of the nation's 50-year-old nuclear weapons manufacturing complex, according to the NNSA. The current U.S. stockpile of about 6,000 "legacy" warheads is already being refurbished. Beginning in the early 1990s, as the Cold War ended and a test moratorium between the United States and Soviet Union was reached, the United States halted the development of new warheads and shifted to supervising its stockpile, making sure the deployed warheads remained reliable. At the same time, those no longer needed began to be dismantled.

During the administrations of George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton, the Pentagon and the Energy Department planned to put the stockpiles through a life-extension process every 20 to 30 years. The nonnuclear components of the warheads were to be tested and replaced if necessary. With the United States now committed to reducing its deployed warheads to between 1,700 and 2,200 by 2012, the stockpile five years from now would primarily consist of older warheads -- with fewer than half of them refurbished, according to the NNSA.

The Bush administration's 2001 Nuclear Posture Review called for a study on developing a new generation of nuclear weapons, including a controversial nuclear "bunker buster" and special warheads designed for destroying chemical or biological weapons. Congress did not fund those programs and, instead, redirected the money toward a refurbishment program for existing warheads -- a slow and time-consuming process.

It took almost 15 years to refurbish the W-87 warheads on the Minuteman III ICBMs -- six years to determine what needed replacement and eight more to complete the process, according to NNSA and Pentagon officials. And the W-76 -- the warhead for the Trident submarine-launched ICBM -- has been under study for refurbishment since 1998, but work on modernizing the warheads is just starting.

The NNSA has long said that one goal of the RRW is to "render unauthorized use of weapon impossible," a quote taken from the still-secret National Security Presidential Directive 28, titled "Nuclear Weapons Command, Control, Safety, and Security." The new RRW design includes a "use control" device, which locks the nuclear element of a weapon so it cannot be used should it fall into enemy hands.

Livermore Lab To Build Hydrogen Bomb (LAT)

By Ralph Vartabedian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

It's picked mostly because it assured that no underground testing would be necessary.

Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory on Friday was declared the winner in a competition to design the nation's first hydrogen bomb in two decades, a major step in restarting production of nuclear weapons.

The Bush administration said the program would improve the U.S. stockpile's reliability, security and safety and would allow for a reduction in the thousands of weapons held in reserve for a potential war.

DOJ_NMG_0140218

Critics reacted sharply, saying the program sent the wrong international message when the U.S. was trying to stop the spread of nuclear weapons.

Key members of Congress said the program was moving too fast.

"I have serious concerns with the process leading up to today's announcement, and with the priorities of the Department of Energy," said Rep. Peter J. Visclosky (D-Ind.), chairman of the appropriations subcommittee that would pay for the program.

"Although a lot of time and energy went in determining the winning design for a new nuclear warhead, there appears to have been little thought given to the question of why the United States needs to build new nuclear warheads at this time," he said.

The award culminates a frenetic competition held since 2005 between Livermore in the Bay Area and Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico. Sandia National Laboratories, which provides engineering for the arming system, was part of both teams, and its California branch will continue the program with Livermore.

Research on some aspects of the Los Alamos design also will continue and may be included in the Livermore bomb, said Tom D'Agostino, acting chief of the Energy Department's National Nuclear Security Administration.

Livermore won largely because of its conservative approach, assuring it could build the bomb with no need for underground testing.

The U.S. temporarily halted underground testing in 1992 during the George H.W. Bush administration and then indefinitely during the Clinton administration. The program will spend eight to 12 months assessing the cost, schedule and scope of the effort, D'Agostino said.

The victory is an important boost for Livermore, which is managed under contract by the University of California.

"I can't tell you how honored the California team is," said Bruce Goodwin, chief of the nuclear weapons program at Livermore. "I am personally humbled by this."

Livermore Lab Tapped To Design New Nuke (SFC)

By James Sterngold

San Francisco Chronicle, March 3, 2007

The Energy and Defense departments have chosen the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory to design the country's first new nuclear warhead since the Cold War, giving the Bay Area institution the central role in a program that could involve billions of dollars.

The decision, announced Friday, was a clear victory for Livermore, which bested its storied sister lab, the Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico, in a competition to lead the research.

Officials said Los Alamos -- where the first atomic bombs were designed and built in the Manhattan Project in World War II -- would still be involved in nuclear weapons design but in an unaccustomed subordinate role.

The Sandia National Laboratories, an engineering program with facilities at Livermore and in New Mexico, also will be a partner with Livermore as the United States develops the most important, if strongly contested, nuclear weapons program in a generation.

The program -- called the Reliable Replacement Warhead -- is likely to have a modest initial impact on Livermore, which is managed by the University of California. Officials said there would be no significant increase in staffing or spending in the short term, and the next step would involve developing detailed budgets.

For the all the excitement over Livermore's victory -- and clear disappointment at Los Alamos -- the question of whether the new nuclear weapons actually will be built is still far from settled. The announcement was an important symbol of the Bush administration's efforts to revive the entire nuclear weapons production complex, based on an argument that the old stockpile is growing more difficult to maintain and should be replaced. But there is substantial resistance in Congress, among both Republicans and Democrats, and among some weapons experts.

Some argue that the current stockpile -- an estimated 6,000 warheads -- remains in excellent condition and will satisfy U.S. defense needs for decades to come. Others have expressed deep concern that a ramped-up manufacturing program could encourage other countries, such as Iran and North Korea, to push ahead with their own bomb programs.

"What worries me is that the minute you begin to put more sophisticated warheads on the existing fleet, you are essentially creating a new nuclear weapon, and it's just a matter of time before other nations do the same thing," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif. "In fact, this could serve to encourage the very proliferation we are trying to prevent."

Rep. Pete Visclosky, D-Ind., the chairman of the House appropriations subcommittee, which controls nuclear weapons spending, described the weapons effort as having a "make-it-up-as-you-go-along character" and as an example of misplaced priorities.

"This announcement puts the cart before the horse," Visclosky said. "Although a lot of time and energy went into determining the winning design for a new nuclear warhead, there appears to have been little thought given to the question of why the United States needs to build new nuclear warheads at this time. My preference is that the Department of Energy would have spent their resources reconfiguring the old Cold War complex and dismantling obsolete warheads."

Rep. Ellen Tauscher, D-Walnut Creek, whose district includes Livermore, said she shared some of those concerns.

"I have to admit that I'm thrilled that Livermore won," said Tauscher, the chairwoman of the Strategic Forces Subcommittee of the House Armed Services Committee. But she agreed it was not clear that any new weapons were needed, and she insisted that Congress would hold the weapons complex on a tight leash by scrutinizing budgets carefully.

"This is just one step in what could be a long series of steps," she said.

Visclosky and Tauscher said they planned hearings on the new weapons program soon.

Lab and government officials, well aware of the skepticism in Congress, went out of their way Friday to stress that the program remained in a preliminary phase.

"This is absolutely not an announcement to build a new warhead," said Thomas D'Agostino, the acting director of the National Nuclear Security Administration, which oversees the weapons complex. "This is absolutely proceeding on a design effort. ... This is not about starting a new arms race."

D'Agostino also stressed that, if the United States were to build and deploy the new weapons, the increased reliability would mean the country could sharply reduce its stockpile down to levels not seen since the 1950s.

The Reliable Replacement Warhead program involves building weapons that would, in principle, be more reliable and safer than existing warheads but would fit on existing missiles. The first warheads would replace those on Trident missiles, which are carried on nuclear-powered submarines.

Congress has mandated that the weapons be built without any underground testing -- a technical feat that has never been tried before -- and that they could not involve new capabilities or new military missions. Underground testing has been banned since 1992.

The Bush administration has requested $119 million to support design studies for fiscal 2008. Government officials did not estimate the total cost of replacing the nation's nuclear stockpile, but experts generally agree that it would be a multi-billion-dollar endeavor over several decades.

Both Republicans and Democrats have insisted they will fund the research efforts on a year-to-year basis to ensure that the new weapons are built only if they are needed and can be deployed without testing.

But assessments of the program's designs by outside experts have undercut some of the government's assertions, and some experts have complained about the lack of a timetable or firm plan for how many new weapons would be needed.

C. Bruce Tarter, a former director of Livermore and head of a team of outside scientists that has been reviewing the designs, said at a scientific conference two weeks ago that there is no empirical evidence that the old weapons are deteriorating and need to be replaced. He also said the design just approved would be the first in a series of new generations of warheads to be built over a span of decades.

Only a small number of the claimed benefits of the new warheads, Tarter added, would be included in the first of the new warheads; it would take many generations and many years for all the promised benefits to be realized.

In addition, D'Agostino insisted Friday that the warhead was in an initial design phase. However, lab officials said researchers not only have produced extensive designs -- each lab prepared more than 1,000 pages of testing and design specifications -- but they have already conducted non-nuclear tests of the critical detonation devices and other components. They have even begun to plan in detail how the weapons would be manufactured.

The officials said the designs presented by Los Alamos and Livermore had some critical differences. The Livermore design was based on a weapon that was built and actually tested during the Cold War but never deployed. This "robust test pedigree" gave Livermore the advantage, D'Agostino said.

The Los Alamos team designed a weapon that used previously tested elements, but it combined them in a more innovative way and incorporated more safety features. D'Agostino said the Livermore design was chosen because "it is the more conservative approach," but the more innovative features of the Los Alamos bomb might be incorporated later. Either way, he said, Los Alamos would continue to have extensive involvement in the design effort.

That was not much consolation for Los Alamos' proud scientists. Los Alamos has been criticized in recent years for a string of security lapses, and some officials there had believed it would be impossible to let Los Alamos win for political reasons.

Brad Holian, a retired Los Alamos scientist who still works part time in the weapons division, said the "team is thoroughly demoralized."

He described as "dog treats" the idea that Los Alamos scientists could participate by reviewing Livermore designs and working on some secondary components.

Feds Select Plan For New Nuclear Warhead (AP)

By H. Josef Hebert

AP, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Bush administration selected a design Friday for a new generation of atomic warheads, taking a major step toward building the first new nuclear weapon since the end of the Cold War two decades ago.

The military and the Energy Department selected a design developed by the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory in California over a competing design by the Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico, according to government sources who spoke on condition of anonymity in advance of a formal announcement.

The decision to move ahead with the warhead, which eventually would replace the existing arsenal of weapons, has been criticized as sending the wrong signal to the world at a time when the United States is assailing attempts at nuclear weapons development in North Korea and Iran and striving to contain it.

But military and Energy Department officials have argued that the new U.S. warhead will not add to the nuclear arsenal. They maintain the new design will make the weapons stockpile more secure and reliable without the need for actual underground testing.

The warhead has been the focus of an intense competition between Los Alamos and Lawrence Livermore, the government's two premier nuclear weapons labs.

The two facilities submitted separate designs nearly a year ago. Lawrence Livermore's design is based on a warhead actually tested in an underground detonation in the 1980s. Los Alamos had a design based on a fresh approach that has not undergone testing.

One of the assurances given by defense officials to Congress is that the new warhead will not have to undergo actual testing. Once developed, it would be used in the Trident missiles on submarines and eventually would replace warheads on the Air Force's missile arsenal, officials said.

Administration officials, including the military, have argued that today's aging warheads are harder to maintain and as they age it will become more difficult to ensure their reliability.

The new design is advertised as being more robust with additional features to safeguard them against possible theft or misuse.

Of overriding concern to members of Congress has been that the warhead be developed without the need for underground tests. The administration has sought to assure Congress that the design would not require such testing.

The administration also argues that a phasing out of current warheads with the more modern design will allow additional reductions in the number of warheads that will be needed.

The decision Friday establishes a clear blueprint for designing the new warhead, officials said. A final go ahead is expected to be made by the president within two years, with the first warheads to be completed by 2012.

It has not been determined how much the program will cost. The administration asked Congress for $119 million for the fiscal year beginning Oct. 1 to push ahead with further design work.

Advocates for the warhead say it would give military commanders greater assurance of reliability and could speed the reduction of the deployed number of nuclear warheads from 6,000 to fewer than 2,000 by 2012.

New Nuclear Warhead Design For US (BBC)

BBC.com, March 3, 2007

The Bush administration has selected the design for America's first new nuclear warhead in nearly two decades.

US officials say the warhead will not add to the country's nuclear arsenal, but will replace existing missiles.

Critics have complained it sends the wrong signal at a time when the White House is leading efforts to curb Iran and North Korea's nuclear ambitions.

The chosen design was developed in a Californian laboratory and is based on a warhead already tested in the 1980s.

The US Congress authorised design work on a new warhead in 2005 on the basis that there would not be any fresh missile tests.

No nuclear underground tests have been conducted since a ban in 1992.

The new warhead, due to be operational in five years' time, will be used to replace Trident missiles on submarines.

'No arms race'

Making the announcement, US officials said the plan was simply to replace older, less reliable warheads with a safer version.

"This is not about starting a new nuclear arms race," said Thomas P D'Agostino, acting head of the National Nuclear Security Administration (NNSA).

Scientists at the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory would now continue work on the design, costing and development of the programme, he said.

Democratic Senator However, says the BBC's Jamie Coomarasamy in Washington, at a moment when the White House is trying to stop North Korea and Iran developing their nuclear programmes, some see the decision to press ahead with a new US warhead as sending an unfortunate mixed message.

Democratic Senator Dianne Feinstein was among the critics in Congress.

"The minute you begin to put more sophisticated nuclear warheads on the existing fleet, you are essentially creating a new nuclear weapon. And it's just a matter of time before other nations do the same," the Associated Press quotes her as saying.

"This could serve to encourage the very proliferation we are trying to prevent."

Nuclear non-proliferation groups have also criticised the move, warning that it could lead to proliferation and saying there is no need to replace the US' Cold War-era stockpile.

The NNSA has said the destruction of ageing warheads will mean that in five years' time, the number held by the US will be at its lowest since the 1950s.

Locking Up The Ghost Of Congress Past (NYT)

Congress's quid-pro-quo corruption scandal continues to haunt the Capitol as Bob Ney, the once-unbeatable lawmaker, slips off to his prison sentence of two and a half years for peddling influence to Jack Abramoff, the bribe-dishing lobbyist already doing six years in a Florida case.

As the House's special task force considers whether Congress needs an outside monitoring panel to help enforce stronger integrity standards, we suggest that it start with an in-depth briefing on the Abramoff-Ney downfall — complete with cash-flow charts and poll data on how the scandal has tainted the public's view of lawmakers.

It shouldn't take more than that to persuade the task force of what is needed.

The House ethics committee sat mute and petrified for a year while the news media and prosecutors peeled back the Abramoff scandal. An independent integrity office to investigate allegations of ethics violations is exactly the restorative needed by the ethics committee. Unfortunately, no one knows what is on the task force's agenda because the bipartisan group has decided to start its work with private meetings. Public hearings may or may not come later as the lawmakers face a May 1 deadline for making recommendations. There may be some virtue in eliciting candor in private, but sooner or later the House very much needs to hear from a galvanized public that sent a clear demand for ethical reform when it voted the Republicans out of power last year.

The Democratic Senate has already run away from a proposed integrity office. The House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, deserves credit for ordering consideration of the sensitive subject of an outside watchdog. But the study group must not be shrouded in secrecy nor its work be allowed to drag on beyond May 1. For all the tenderness of the task, lawmakers should focus on where and how Mr. Ney went wrong and try to ensure that it does not happen again.

A Better Way On Presidential Succession (WP)

By Norman Ornstein

Since Sept. 11, 2001, the speaker of the House has been required for security purposes to take government planes for official business. The White House rightly called "silly" recent criticism of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's desire to have a plane that could fly to her San Francisco district nonstop, which would be larger than the plane her predecessor used. But this flap raises a more serious issue -- that of presidential succession.

Pelosi takes a military plane because the speaker of the House is second in line to succeed the president, behind only the vice president. That's what drove the Department of Homeland Security to demand the extra level of security for then-Speaker Dennis Hastert. But should the speaker of the House even be in the line of succession?

Who succeeds a president (after the vice president) is set by law, not fixed in the Constitution. The process has been addressed seriously three times. In 1792, Congress put the president pro tempore of the Senate and the speaker of the House, in that order, in the line, behind the vice president. It added no others. After the assassination of President James Garfield in 1881, there was a lengthy period with no vice president and no congressional leaders -- and therefore no one in line to succeed President Chester Arthur. An 1886 act took out the lawmakers and put in Cabinet officers, starting with the secretary of state.

In 1946, President Harry Truman, who had recently taken a dangerous trip to Potsdam with his secretary of state and was aware that with no vice president the line of succession was thin, pushed hard for a new order. The act was revised in 1947 to put the two top lawmakers back in and included after them members of the Cabinet in order of the creation of their offices.

We still have that process today.

When the Second Congress enacted the first presidential succession act, it was highly controversial. Congress was dominated by Federalists; they did not want Secretary of State Thomas Jefferson, a leader of the rival Democratic-Republican Party, to be next behind the vice president. They turned to their own congressional leaders, a solution that was immediately challenged by James Madison, among others, as unconstitutional.

The Constitution says Congress can create a line of succession from among "Officers" of the United States, clearly meaning executive branch officials. But it also says that no one except the vice president shall serve simultaneously in the executive and legislative branches. The congressional majority brushed aside that argument. But it is a position accepted by most constitutional scholars.

Truman knew the constitutional arguments, but he believed strongly that more legitimacy came to a president who was not elected if that person had been previously elected to another office; thus, the top congressional leaders, national figures both, were restored to primacy (with the order reversed to mollify the more powerful House leaders of the time, Sam Rayburn and Joe Martin.) The constitutional issues, and any serious questions about the overall process, were pushed to the back burner and have remained there since.

But having congressional leaders in the presidential line of succession is wrong for more than constitutional reasons.

First, congressional leaders frequently are of the opposite party and viewpoint of a president; if a president and vice president were to die at the beginning of a term, the country would have four years of a president representing the opposite of what it voted for -- a situation made even worse if the change in direction came as a result of a terrorist action. Southern proslavery insurgents actually plotted to kill everyone in the line of succession to Abraham Lincoln to change the policy and political direction of the Union.

Second, congressional leaders have a built-in conflict of interest. When Andrew Johnson was impeached by the House and tried in the Senate, he escaped removal from office by one vote -- and among those who voted against him was the Senate president pro tempore, Benjamin Wade of Ohio, who would have succeeded Johnson had he been ousted.

The president pro tempore of the Senate, traditionally the most senior member of the majority party, poses another problem: He is usually the Senate's oldest member. For several years, Strom Thurmond, in his 90s and clearly not up to the job of president, was nonetheless third in line for the post.

The terrorism threat to Washington underscores a deeper problem -- everyone in the line of succession resides in Washington.

A suitcase nuclear bomb downtown or an attack at a presidential inauguration could wipe out everyone in that line and leave a vacuum in leadership at the worst possible time.

A better option would be to include top Cabinet members, such as the secretaries of State, Treasury and Defense, and then allow a president to designate several others -- all requiring Senate confirmation -- including qualified people of breadth who reside outside the capital area.

It won't be easy for Speaker Pelosi and President Pro Tem Robert C. Byrd to agree to take themselves out of the succession queue. Doing so -- while pushing for a meaningful update of presidential succession overall -- would be a great act of statesmanship. It would even be worth keeping the military plane.

What History Books Teach About The Market's Drop (WSJ)

By Peter A. McKay

The Wall Street Journal, March 3, 2007

Investors have reason to hope that history repeats itself.

Although they may have to wait out some turbulence along the way, there is evidence that stock-market drops like the one on Tuesday often give way to solid gains.

Research by analysts at Legg Mason Capital Management of past market performance after the Dow Jones Industrial Average, Standard & Poor's 500-stock index and Nasdaq Composite Index all fell by at least 3% the same day, showed that one year later, each had gained at least 14%.

All three indexes were little changed one month after the big one-day selloffs. Including Tuesday, there have been 27 such daily drops, going back to 1974.

Sentiment on Wall Street this past week seemed to acknowledge that history. Most professional stock pickers fretted over the market's downturn but ultimately declined to slash their forecasts for the market's 2007 performance.

"The question on everyone's mind this week has been, are we going into a bear market?" said portfolio manager David Nelson, of Legg Mason. "To me, it seems the answer is no."

Many noted the stock market's relentless run-up since last summer and interpreted the selloff, which continued through the end of the week, as an unpleasant but necessary bump along a road that they believe will lead still higher in the long run.

Still, it was a tough week. The Dow industrials fell 4.2%, the biggest weekly percentage drop since March 2003, ending at 12114.10. The blue-chip average is now off 2.8% this year and more than 670 points below its record close less than three weeks ago.

On Friday, the market's newfound volatility remained on full display. The Dow opened lower, rose to show a gain of more than 13 points prior to midday, but finished near its intraday lows. In the end, the Dow stumbled 120.24 points, or 1%, on the day.

Among its 30 components, insurance giant American International Group was a rare bright spot, up more than 3% after announcing a strong profit, a share-buyback plan and a more-generous dividend policy.

The broad S&P 500 fell 1.1% Friday, or 16.00 points, to 1387.17, off 4.4% on the week and down 2.2% this year. The tech-stock-focused Nasdaq Composite shed 1.5%, or 36.21 points, to close at 2368.00, off 5.8% on the week. The Nasdaq, which had been leading the Dow and the S&P in gains for the year, is now down 2% in 2007.

The University of Michigan announced a large, unexpected drop in its monthly reading of consumer confidence, adding to the bearish mood in the market.

Also, the yen continued its recent surge against the dollar. Analysts say the unwinding of what are known as carry trades, in which investors seek to profit from interest-rate differences between countries, seems to be draining money from the stock market in the U.S. The dollar fell 1.3% against the yen Friday.

In the wake of Tuesday's initial selloff, Robert E. Weissenstein, managing director at Credit Suisse Securities LLC, said he doesn't believe the current market volatility will persist.

"I think that we'll quickly get back to the level where you want to be an owner [of shares] again," Mr. Weissenstein said.

Strategist Stuart Schweitzer of J.P. Morgan Private Bank still sees risks in the months ahead, noting that it now seems slumping housing prices could last longer than most of Wall Street had been expecting.

But he added that the stock market's recent downturn was "healthy," since it may effectively head off the need for a sharp downturn later.

"You've had a lot of people expecting the market to correct at some point along the way, but they've been afraid to sell because the market looked like it was on a one-way stairway to heaven," Mr. Schweitzer said.

In U.S. market action Friday:

Stocks fell; bonds rose. The 10-year note gained 11/32 point, or $3.44 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.515%. The 30-year bond rose 15/32 to yield 4.651%.

The dollar weakened, to 116.85 yen, from 117.59 yen. The euro rose to $1.3194 from $1.3186.

Dow Ends Its Worst Week Since 2003 (WP)

By Tomoeh Murakami Tse

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

NEW YORK, March 2 -- The Dow Jones industrial average ended its worst weekly performance in four years Friday, as technology stocks sank and the yen continued to rally against the dollar.

The Dow shed 120.24, or 1 percent, to close at 12,114.10. For the week, the Dow was down 4.2 percent. The tech-heavy Nasdaq composite index fell 36.21. to close at 2368, down 5.9 percent for the week. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index retreated 16 points, to 1387.17, and was down 4.4 percent for the week. Year-to-date gains for all three indicators evaporated.

"There's a growing sense of anxiety that there are more shoes to drop," said Stuart Schweitzer, global markets strategist at J.P. Morgan Private Bank. "I don't think it'll be over until there's more pain."

Heightened concerns about high-risk subprime mortgages added to the market's jitters, with federal bank regulators calling on lenders to exercise caution when making the loans.

The Dow seesawed mostly in negative territory throughout the day. Then, in late trading, it dropped another 50 points as traders tried to close out positions for the week. Although the final session of the week can often result in high trading volume, far fewer shares changed hands yesterday as the market searched for a bottom and money managers warned investors not to panic. Declining issues outnumbered gainers by 3 to 1 on the New York Stock Exchange.

The biggest losers included high-profile tech stocks, with Cisco Systems and Intel down substantially. Among the winners were some pharmaceutical stocks, including Merck, and American International Group, which announced a buyback of up to $8 billion in shares.

Some consumer staples and utilities showed strength, but three trading sessions after the Dow's 400-point plunge, the markets remained volatile.

DOJ_NMG_0140225

Yields on U.S. bonds fell yesterday, although not to the levels seen after the market's decline Tuesday. The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note, which moves inversely to price, fell to 4.50 percent from 4.55 percent Thursday.

Gold fell 3.1 percent, to $641.50, for its biggest one-day loss in almost five months.

"You'd expect it to be higher," said Marc Chandler, head of foreign currency strategy at the banking firm Brown Brothers Harriman. "This is like the million-dollar question."

Traders and analysts said they were watching the yen as it continued its rally against the dollar. The yen closed at 116.75 to the dollar, compared with 117.58 Thursday. Against other major currencies, the dollar was mixed.

The ascent of the Japanese currency is worrisome because it suggests that investors who have been borrowing yen to invest in riskier, higher-yielding assets elsewhere in a flush market were reversing their bets. That could hurt the availability of capital worldwide.

"The pendulum had swung to greed for a long time, and now it's swinging back," Chandler said.Movers

American International Group rose $2.13, to $69.54, after announcing stock repurchasing plans and higher dividends.

Merck, which got a mixed verdict in a trial over its arthritis drug Vioxx, was up 20 cents, to $44.19.

Home Depot declined 44 cents, to $39.01, continuing a two-week slide.

Gap fell 63 cents, to $18.40, after announcing that its annual forecast was below analysts' estimates.

Stocks Post Worst Week In Over 4 Years (AP)

By Tim Paradis

AP, March 2, 2007

NEW YORK (AP) - Stocks stumbled in the final session of a tumultuous week Friday as the yen rallied against the dollar and concerns about the U.S. economy still dogged investors after Tuesday's huge drop. The Dow Jones industrials logged their worst weekly performance in more than four years.

The Dow, as it had Thursday, poked tentatively into positive territory Friday before retreating as the yen furthered its gains and investors failed to shake their unease.

Larger economic concerns such as the ascendent yen have dominated Wall Street for much of the week after Tuesday's worldwide selloff that sent the Dow down 416 points and rattled investor confidence about the state of the U.S. economy.

Neil Massa, senior trader at MFC Global Investment Management, said stocks wobbled Friday after the yen broke through a key resistance level of 116.80. The dollar fell 0.92 percent to 116.86 yen.

Concerns lingered about a decline in the yen carry trade, which refers to the process of borrowing yen to acquire assets with greater yields in other currencies. A slowdown could hurt liquidity worldwide. Concerns about Japanese interest rates also weighed on investors.

A well-received profit report from American International Group Inc. (AIG) kept the Dow industrials from falling further Friday; the insurer and pharmaceutical company Merck & Co. (MRK) were the only two advancers among the index's 30 stocks. Merck, which received a mixed verdict Friday in a trial over its former painkiller Vioxx, finished up 20 cents at $44.19.

The Dow fell 120.24, or 0.98 percent, to 12,114.10. The Dow has fallen seven of the last eight sessions.

Broader stock indicators also fell. The Standard & Poor's 500 index fell 16.00, or 1.14 percent, to 1,387.17 and the Nasdaq composite index slid 36.21, or 1.51 percent, to 2,368.00.

For the week, the Dow fell 3.3 percent, the S&P 500 lost 4.4 percent and the Nasdaq fell 5.9 percent. For the Dow and the S&P 500, it was their biggest weekly point drop since the week ended July 19, 2002. And for the Nasdaq, it was the poorest weekly showing since the week ended Sept. 21, 2001, the first week of trading after the 9/11 terror attacks.

Bond prices rose sharply as economic concerns lingered and raised hopes for an interest rate cut. The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note fell to 4.51 percent from 4.55 percent late Thursday. The dollar was mixed against other major currencies, while gold prices fell sharply.

Light, sweet crude settled down 36 cents to $61.64 per barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange after settling at a more than two month high Thursday.

"I think looking at the world economies as a whole it just seems like growth is slowing across the board, or at least that's the impression," Massa said.

Diane Dercher, chief economist at Waddell & Reed, said investors are trying to sort through the myriad signals the markets have given off this week.

"Fundamentally, I don't think a lot has changed this week and I think it's been more of a psychological re-evaluation of risk and a lot of this is focused around what's happened in the Asian markets," she said.

"There is a renewed focus on how weak the economy is going to be and the data that we've gotten this week have been very mixed and that just adds to confusion," Dercher said.

With Friday offering little of the economic data that had at turns boosted and deflated sentiment during the week, investors again looked abroad for direction. Performance of overseas markets has taken on renewed importance this week after a nearly 9 percent drop in the Shanghai Composite Index helped touch off the worldwide selling and sent U.S. stocks reeling. The major U.S. indexes each lost more than 3 percent Tuesday, erasing $632 billion in shareholder equity, according to S&P.

The pullback in stocks came after an enviable run-up. The stock market had gone more than 45 months without a drop of more than 2 percent in a single session - until Tuesday, when concerns the economy would slow and dent corporate profits came to a boil.

Fed Chief Ben Bernanke told Congress during the week that a single event didn't trigger Tuesday's slide, which was the biggest point drop in the Dow since trading resumed following the Sept. 11 attacks. While the drop brought many tense moments for investors, many observers said stocks were overvalued and were due to consolidate.

On Friday, St. Louis Federal Reserve President William Poole told reporters in Santiago, Chile, the week's pullback didn't appear to be "a huge issue," according to wire service reports.

With trading Friday less frenetic than in previous days, investors had some time to parse individual stocks as they looked for bargains.

AIG's fourth-quarter profit rose sharply from a year earlier when the world's largest insurer spent $1.64 billion to settle charges over its accounting practices. Profits were slightly below Wall Street's forecast though investors were likely pleased by the company's announcement it would repurchase $5 billion in stock in 2007. The company also is targeting a 20 percent annual increase in its dividend. AIG rose $2.13, or 3.2 percent, to $69.54.

Dell Inc. (DELL) rose 17 cents to $23.18 after the computer maker's profit fell 33 percent amid weak laptop sales. While revenue fell more than expected, the overall results weren't as sour as some investors had feared.

Gap Inc. (GPS) fell 63 cents, or 3.3 percent, to $18.40 after the company's fourth-quarter earnings dropped 35 percent amid problems that include its newest chain, which the company plans to close.

Subprime lenders fell again Friday as investors remained concerned about soured loans. New Century Financial Corp. (NEW) warned it would restate financial results for three quarters last year to fix accounting errors for losses related to bad loans. New Century fell $1.20, or 7.6 percent, to $14.65.

Declining issues outnumbered advancers by about 3 to 1 on the New York Stock Exchange, where consolidated volume came to 3.36 billion shares, compared with an unusually heavy 3.92 billion shares traded Thursday.

The Russell 2000 index of smaller companies fell 15.59, or 1.97 percent, to 775.44.

Overseas, Japan's Nikkei stock average closed down 1.35 percent, while the Shanghai Composite Index was up 1.23 percent and Hong Kong's Hang Seng index added 0.49 percent. Britain's FTSE 100 finished higher by less than 0.01 percent, Germany's DAX index fell 0.56 percent, and France's CAC-40 slid 0.62 percent.

The Dow Jones industrial average ended the week down 533.38, or 4.22 percent, at 12,114.10. The Standard & Poor's 500 is down 64.02, or 4.41 percent, at 1,387.17; the Nasdaq composite is down 147.10, or 5.85 percent, at 2,368.00.

The Russell 2000 index closed the week down 51.20, or 6.19 percent, to end at 775.44.

The Dow Jones Wilshire 5000 Composite Index - a free-float weighted index that measures 5,000 U.S. based companies- ended the week at 14,060.13, down 669.70 points from last week. A year ago the index was at 13,022.96.

Investors On Edge After Week Of Turmoil (FT)

By Christopher Brown-Humes, Paul J. Davies, Richard Beales

Financial Times, March 3, 2007

US stocks lost more ground on Friday after a turbulent week that saw European bourses endure their worst week for four years and Wall Street suffer its biggest one-day fall since markets reopened after the September 11 2001 terrorist attacks.

The global equity sell-off that began on Tuesday more than eradicated all this year's gains, leaving investors on edge over the outlook for next week.

"Investors had become complacent about the outlook for the global economy, especially the US, and the prices of many risky assets had been bid to unsustainably high levels," said Julian Jessop, of Capital Economics.

The flight from risky investments triggered a surge in volatility across financial markets. It began on Tuesday when Chinese stock markets fell 9 per cent amid concerns over the health of the US economy and the subprime mortgage market.

The worries about the US subprime mortgage market were underscored on Friday by the Federal Reserve and other US financial regulators who said they were worried that some borrowers did not understand the risks of such loans.

"It's a classic risk sell-off after a very strong bull run," said Robert Buckland, chief global equity strategist at Citigroup. "Whatever has gone up the most is going down the most."

Wall Street, which suffered its steepest one-day fall in equities since 2001 on Tuesday, remained under pressure on Friday. The S&P 500 closed 1.1 per cent lower at 1,387.17, the second-worst day in a week in which the index lost 4.4 per cent. The Dow Jones Industrial Average was down 4.2 per cent on the week.

A flight to safety boosted global government bond prices, with 10-year US Treasury yields falling to 4.5 per cent from 4.67 per cent a week earlier.

The Nikkei 225 Average in Japan ended the week down 5.3 per cent and the Shanghai Composite index fell 5.6 per cent.

The yen climbed 3.5 per cent against the dollar as investors cut back "carry trade" positions, which involve borrowing in low-yielding currencies to buy higher yielding assets elsewhere.

In Europe, the FTSE Eurofirst 300 suffered its biggest weekly fall since March 2003, dropping 5.2 per cent. In London, the FTSE 100 fell 4.5 per cent to 6,116.2 – also its worst week since March 2003.

Down End To A Very Down Week (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

This week, investors heard that the economy was more vulnerable than they thought. A result was Wall Street's worst week in four years.

Share prices ended the week where they have spent seven of the last nine days: in the red.

After small but fleeting gains in the morning yesterday, the Dow Jones industrial average lost 120.24 points. The broader Standard & Poor's 500-stock index never turned positive yesterday and ended the day down about 1 percent.

The Dow fell 0.98 percent, to 12,114.10, yesterday. The S.& P. fell 16 points, to 1,387.17, and the Nasdaq fell 36.21 points, or 1.51 percent, to 2,368.00.

For the week, the Dow fell 4.2 percent, the S.& P. 500 lost 4.4 percent and the Nasdaq fell 5.9 percent.

As investors and economists look to the week ahead, they see signs of encouragement but also some uncertainty about what could happen.

Starting with a survey on the strength of the service sector on Monday and ending with the Labor Department's monthly employment report, investors will have a buffet of data to soothe or fray their nerves.

"The big question now is, Will the labor market tell us that the broader economy is O.K.?" said Julia Coronado, an economist with Barclays Capital. "Or will the labor market tell us in fact that things are weakening and we're heading down?"

One factor that investors and economists found reassuring during this week's stock slide was that the economy still appeared to be on steady footing. One reason for that was a strong job market.

If the Labor Department's figures show that employment deteriorated in February, the market could take another dive on the assumption that economic weakness is much more widespread than previously thought.

Early indications are that the report could be weaker than January's. A survey of economists by Bloomberg News forecast that the unemployment rate would remain at 4.6 percent, but that the number of jobs added would fall to 98,000, from 111,000.

During the market's headier days, a low unemployment number could have spurred an upswing. Investors have been known to cheer downbeat economic data on the chance that it could move the Federal Reserve to cut interest rates.

But with a more anxious mood on Wall Street, a surprisingly bad number is the last thing investors want.

"The market liked the idea that rates were on hold and the economy was basically not going anywhere," said Rob Carnell, chief international economist for ING Financial Markets. "It was the stability that was the really useful, positive feature for equities markets over the last few months."

The employment number is particularly telling because the health of the job market has a cascading effect on the economy, with job growth and wages directly influencing consumer spending.

Consumer spending, in turn, influences manufacturing activity and capital investment, two segments of the economy that showed signs of trouble this week.

Two other economic indicators that will also be released next week have the potential to move the markets, but to a smaller degree than the employment report.

On Monday, the Institute for Supply Management will release its monthly survey on business activity for the service sector. Preliminary forecasts are predicting a decline from January.

And on Tuesday, the government releases revisions to its fourth-quarter data on productivity and labor costs. Productivity is expected to decline while labor costs are expected to jump.

"It's going to look very inflationary," Ms. Coronado said. "It could spook the market a bit."

Yesterday's decline heightened concerns that the sell-off might not be as temporary as many experts have said it will be. If the slump deepens next week, market experts said it would be even harder to undo as already-nervous investors pull back even further.

"People are stepping back a little bit, and they're going to be a little more careful about what decisions they make," said William Rhodes, chief investment strategist with Rhodes Analytics. "You have a good deal of uncertainty. You don't know how long it's going take this to work it's way out."

In the Treasury market, bonds rose yesterday, with the benchmark 10-year Treasury up 13/32, to 101. The yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, fell to 4.50 percent from 4.55 percent Thursday.

Jobs, Productivity Data Will Offer Nervous Investors A Lot To Chew On (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, March 3, 2007

After a week in which stocks took their wildest ride in years, in which Alan Greenspan uttered the word "recession" and in which economic data pointed in various directions, investors are understandably desperate for any decent clues as to where the U.S. economy is headed.

They might not get what they want in the coming week, but they will get something big to chew on: the government's report on February employment. The monthly estimate of how many people companies added to their payrolls is notoriously volatile and subject to revision -- just the kind of data that tend to shock investors and send markets into gyrations. Nevertheless, taken together with previous readings, the full jobs report will offer some valuable insight.

Aside from a fresh glimpse at job growth and wages -- both important drivers of consumer spending -- the report will provide a clue as to how company executives are actually feeling. That is important, because recent data have suggested they aren't too optimistic about the future. The latest report on durable goods, for example, showed companies cutting back their spending on big-ticket capital goods such as computers and machine tools -- a sign that they might not be expecting to have a lot of business to do over the next year or so.

But if executives are genuinely pessimistic, they should also be hiring fewer people. So far, that hasn't been the case.

Over the three months ended in January, nonfarm payrolls added a monthly average of 171,000 jobs, according to the government's most recent estimates. That is above the level consistent with an economy growing at its long-term, inflation-adjusted potential rate of about 3% annually.

Some economists worry that shifting weather patterns could make the February jobs number look pretty bad. That is because the Labor Department takes its payroll readings from the week that includes the 12th day of the month. That week was warm in January, but stormy and cold in February. "You could easily build houses in shirtsleeves in early January, but by the time you got to February the ground was frozen solid" in many parts of the country, says Richard Berner, chief U.S. economist at Morgan Stanley in New York. He estimates that nonfarm payrolls will add only 25,000 jobs in February.

Even if the payrolls number proves strong, though, that doesn't mean the economic outlook is rosy. Companies' hiring practices are sometimes a bit behind the times. Often they keep bringing on workers even as their markets are beginning to evaporate, and wait until things get really bad before letting people go. That is why, historically, the amount of output companies get out of each hour worked -- known as labor productivity -- has been a better harbinger of the future health of the economy than hiring.

According to the latest data available, productivity all but stopped growing in the third quarter of last year, and bounced back a bit in the fourth. But the government will revise its estimate of fourth-quarter productivity on Tuesday -- probably sharply downward, mirroring this week's downward revision of fourth-quarter economic activity. "That will not be viewed as good news," says Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at consultancy Global Insight.

Crude Edged Higher In Week, But Stock Drops Add Caution (WSJ)

By Matt Chambers

The Wall Street Journal, March 3, 2007

The crude-oil futures market, which usually has an inverse price influence on shares, is closely eyeing U.S. stocks, as traders log their concern over the damage a slowdown in U.S. and Chinese growth could do to oil demand.

While crude-oil prices often ignore, or cause, big moves in benchmark U.S. indexes, the latest stock market jitters are related to concern about Chinese economic growth, which is estimated to have accounted for nearly 40% of increased oil demand in 2006. As a result, benchmark oil prices on the New York Mercantile Exchange have been weighed down by uncertainty over stocks and ended the week just 50 cents, or less than 1%, higher at $61.64 a barrel. This is despite refinery glitches that helped push gasoline futures up 8% in that time amid forecasts for record U.S. summer fuel demand.

"The bull market in crude was mainly due to reduced spare [oil production] capacity and more demand," a large part of which was from China, said Kyle Cooper, director of research at consulting firm IAF Advisors in Houston. "There's concern China is looking to put the brakes on the economy, and there has also been talk of the possibility of a U.S. recession."

China's influence on the global economy was in full effect Tuesday when a slump in the volatile Shanghai Composite Index resulted in a U.S. stock selloff.

Oil's relationship to the stock market is usually seen in terms of the damage higher energy costs can do to economies, with crude spikes lowering share indices and lower oil prices doing the opposite.

"Crude and stock markets don't go hand in hand, typically they diverge, but given some of the views of investors, you're getting everything down on expectations we're slowing" said Joseph Quinlan, a market strategist at Bank of America Asset Management in New York. "The view that the twin engines of growth [China and America] are decelerating is going to filter into the oil markets."

In other commodity markets:

NATURAL GAS: With the heavy usage period winding down for the heating fuel, futures prices eased. Natural gas for April delivery on Nymex settled 4.5 cents lower at $7.243 a million British thermal units.

SUGAR: Futures raced to two-month highs. Top importer Russia decided not to raise the nation's raw sugar import duty in April. May-delivery sugar at the New York Board of Trade rose 0.25 cent to 11.22 cents a pound.

Bernanke Talks On Inflation, Globalization (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

DOJ_NMG_0140230

The Wall Street Journal, March 3, 2007

Globalization hasn't had a significant impact on reducing inflation in the U.S. and may have raised it, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said.

Nor has globalization weakened the Fed's control over interest rates, Mr. Bernanke said in remarks prepared for delivery Friday night to the Stanford Institute for Economic Policy Research in California.

Some economists have argued that globalization puts downward pressure on U.S. inflation, making the Fed's job easier. Former Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan Monday said the integration of many countries since the fall of the Soviet Union into the world economy has "brought world unit labor costs down, brought inflation down and interest rates down." But he also said that as that impact fades, long-term rates could rise by one to two percentage points world-wide in the next three to five years.

Mr. Bernanke, however, said increased trade with China has reduced U.S. inflation, now running at about 2%, by only about 0.1 percentage point. And he noted that while these emerging economies have added to the global supply of manufactured goods, they are also adding to the demand for oil and other commodities.

"There seems to be little basis for concluding that globalization overall has significantly reduced inflation in the U.S. in recent years; indeed, the opposite may be true," he said.

The Fed's outlook for inflation is influenced by spare capacity in the U.S. economy. But some economists and Fed officials have argued that because of globalization, the degree of spare capacity in the global economy also needs to be considered. While some research has found a link between global capacity and domestic inflation, Mr. Bernanke said Fed researchers have cast doubt on it.

Merck Receives A Split Verdict From New Jersey Jury In Vioxx Trial (WSJ)

By Heather Won Tesoriero

The Wall Street Journal, March 3, 2007

A New Jersey state court jury delivered a split verdict in the first phase of the latest Vioxx trial, finding that Merck & Co. adequately warned doctors of the drug's heart-attack risks in the case of one plaintiff but not of another.

The eight-person jury found that in the case of both plaintiffs the drug maker violated a state consumer-protection statute by misrepresenting the drug's cardiovascular risks in marketing.

The case of Frederick "Mike" Humeston, 61 years old, of Boise, Idaho, now will move into a second phase to determine whether or not Vioxx was a cause of his heart attack -- and what damages, if any, should be awarded.

Mr. Humeston's case was tried previously in 2005, and Merck prevailed. New Jersey Superior Court Judge Carol Higbee later ordered a new trial after new evidence emerged.

The other plaintiff in this trial, Kathleen Messerschmidt, sued Merck over the fatal heart attack of her brother, Brian Hermans, who died on Sept. 15, 2002. The Vioxx label was changed to include further cardiovascular risk information in April 2002, making it harder to prove that Mr. Hermans was the victim of a failure on Merck's part to warn doctors. But the jury will now hear evidence to determine whether damages for consumer fraud should be awarded to Ms. Messerschmidt.

Merck withdrew Vioxx from the market in September 2004 following a study that linked the drug to an increased risk of heart attacks and stroke. The company has been hit with some 28,000 lawsuits and has said it intends to fight each case. Since the first trial in the summer of 2005, the Whitehouse Station, N.J., company has won eight trials and lost four.

Bush Helps GOP Senators Raise $2.1 Million (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

LOUISVILLE, March 2 -- President Bush headlined a fundraiser Friday for Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) and the National Republican Senatorial Committee that netted $2.1 million. Organizers called it the largest fundraiser in state history.

Speaking to a dinner crowd at the century-old Seelbach Hilton Louisville Hotel, Bush defended his decision to send more troops to Iraq. He also criticized those in Congress who oppose the plan, saying, "They have a solemn responsibility to support those who wear the uniform of the United States."

The event was the second GOP fundraiser in a week for Bush, who continues to be a major Republican draw despite his dismal approval ratings. On Monday, he spoke at a Washington event that raised $10.4 million for the Republican Governors Association.

Before coming here, Bush spoke at Silver Street Elementary School in nearby New Albany, Ind., where he urged Congress to reauthorize the No Child Left Behind education law.

The measure, which requires states to set educational standards and to hold schools accountable for meeting them, is helping to improve student achievement, he said.

"This is a piece of legislation that is vital for the country, in my judgment," Bush said. "It is working, and we ought to make sure it stays in law."

Clinton, Romney Lead Among Insiders (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

Party leaders' opinions about presidential candidates often shape the race. Deep partisan divisions remain.

Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton and Republican Mitt Romney have emerged as the leading presidential favorites among party insiders, according to a new Los Angeles Times Poll, which found deep partisan divisions over the country's direction and top issues in the 2008 campaign.

The survey showed former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina in second place among Democratic Party leaders, ahead of Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois. It pointed up danger signs for Sen. John McCain of Arizona, who trailed former Massachusetts Gov. Romney and former New York City Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, the leader among Republicans in national voter surveys.

It also signaled GOP concerns about holding the White House for another four years — 42% of party leaders said it would be tougher to elect a Republican after eight years under President Bush, and just over half said the GOP nominee should campaign on moving the country in a new direction.

"I love President Bush, I really do," Cindy S. Phillips, a Republican national committeewoman from Mississippi, said in a follow-up interview. "But you can't be the same as the person before you. You have to bring your own touch, your own ideas."

Phillips is looking hard at Giuliani.

The poll surveyed members of the Democratic and Republican national committees, the governing bodies of the two major political parties. Though relatively few, these insiders could have an important role in deciding which of their candidates face each other in November 2008, thanks to the influence many wield in their states.

"The DNC and RNC members are not just delegates" to the national nominating conventions, said Charlie Cook, a nonpartisan campaign analyst in Washington. "They are key organizers and opinion leaders. They can help build or kill a groundswell, make a candidate's challenge in a state easier or much harder. They matter a lot."

The poll also offers a different reading of sentiments than national voter surveys, which tend to be heavily influenced by name recognition at this early stage of the campaign.

A similar poll of DNC members about four years ago found significant backing for Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts as well as surprising support for Edwards and former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean — at a time when the latter two made comparatively weak showings in voter surveys. The three ended up as the top contenders for the Democratic nomination, won by Kerry.

The Times Poll, directed by Susan Pinkus, interviewed 313 of 386 DNC members and 133 of 165 RNC members from Feb. 13-26. Since the poll attempted to interview current state members of each organization rather than a random sample, there is no margin of error.

The survey found no candidate enjoying a lock on institutional support. To the contrary, more than 1 in 3 RNC members had no favorite; just under 1 in 3 DNC members had no preference.

Among Republicans, Romney had the most backing among party insiders, with 20% support, followed by Giuliani with 14%, McCain with 10% and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich of Georgia — who has said he might enter the race in the fall — with 8%.

In a potentially worrisome sign for McCain, just over 1 in 10 RNC members said they would not support him if he won the party's nomination in his second attempt.

"It shows just how much resistance there is within the Republican establishment to McCain and how open the party is to candidates who either aren't very conservative, like Giuliani, or only recently minted conservatives, like Romney," Cook said. "McCain has worked pretty hard since 2000 to be a team player, but these numbers would suggest that there is still a problem for him."

Among Democrats, Sen. Clinton of New York had the backing of 20% of party leaders, followed by Edwards with 15%, Obama with 11%, former Vice President Al Gore — who is not in the race — with 10% and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson with 9%.

Regardless of whom the insiders supported, Giuliani and Clinton were each rated their party's strongest prospective nominee with the best shot at winning the White House.

The insiders were divided over their most important criterion for backing a candidate. Just over a third of Republicans said issues were the most important factor. Nearly 4 in 10 Democrats said the most important factor was a candidate's chance of winning the White House.

The survey turned up a dramatic split over the direction of the country and the problems the presidential candidates should address.

Whereas 83% of Republicans said the country was on the right track — and all said the economy was doing well — 95% of Democrats said the country was headed the wrong way, and more than 6 in 10 said the economy was in bad shape.

Not surprisingly, partisans were also worlds apart over the war in Iraq, with the overwhelming majority of Republicans supporting Bush's policies and Democrats nearly unanimous in their opposition.

There was less agreement among Democrats over an exit strategy. Just over half of DNC members favored legislation requiring Bush to begin withdrawing U.S. troops; 17% favored the more dramatic step of cutting off funding. About 2 in 10 Democrats said Bush should not be required to withdraw troops.

Despite insiders' differences and the considerable attention the war has gotten in the campaign, particularly among Democrats, many said Iraq was unlikely to be the decisive issue in their respective party primaries. Sixty-five percent of Republicans and 50% of Democrats said the war would be an important issue in the 2008 contest, but not the most important. But 48% of Democrats said Iraq would be the most important issue.

"The Democrats, by and large, have similar positions on the war," said Terry Lierman, chairman of the Maryland Democratic Party, who is neutral in the primary. "What's going to differentiate them is a further vision and means to address everything from poverty to wages to jobs to a more equitable view of our foreign policy."

Asked the most important issue for Democrats to address, nearly 6 in 10 party insiders said healthcare, followed by Iraq. Among Republicans, about 1 in 3 said the war and reconstruction of Iraq, followed by domestic security and global terrorism. Just over 20% of Republicans cited the immigration issue as a priority, compared to 2% of Democrats.

Despite some big names lurking in the background — notably Gingrich and Gore — 85% of Republican insiders and 98% of Democrats said they were satisfied with those running.

Though Gore would make "an excellent candidate ... I think he's doing just fine where he is," said Marianne Stevens, vice chairwoman of the Maine Democratic Party, who is also uncommitted. "I'm not sure he'd want to put himself and his family through all that again."

Among Democrats, all of the candidates — declared and prospective — enjoyed overwhelmingly favorable ratings except three: Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio, who is making his second White House bid; the Rev. Al Sharpton, who ran for president in 2004; and former Sen. Mike Gravel of Alaska. They were viewed more negatively than positively.

On the Republican side, views of the candidates were mixed. Giuliani and Romney were each viewed favorably by 83% of party leaders, and Gingrich by 78%. McCain was viewed favorably by 56% of GOP insiders and unfavorably by 38%.

Other, lesser-known GOP candidates received generally favorable ratings, with two exceptions. Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, who has sharply criticized the war, and Rep. Tom Tancredo of Colorado, an outspoken foe of the president's immigration policy, were seen more negatively than positively.

There was little difference among Democrats and Republicans over the prospect of Americans electing an African American, Latino or woman president: Strong majorities in both parties said the country was ready.

Republicans were more optimistic about the chance of electing a Mormon, which probably reflects good feelings for Romney. Nearly 8 in 10 GOP insiders said the country would elect a Mormon president, compared to 48% of Democrats.

"It could be a hassle with some people," said Phillips, the GOP's Mississippi committeewoman. "One question I did ask was how far back [in Romney's family] is the plural marriage thing. They said his great-grandfather, and I said, 'OK, that's far enough.' "

Timing, Donors Drive Long-haul Strategy For '08 (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 3, 2007

Richard M. Nixon, running for the Republican presidential nomination in 1968, refused to campaign until the last moment, filing his candidacy and driving into New Hampshire just six weeks before that state's first-in-the-nation primary.

Forty years later Pat Buchanan, a veteran of that Nixon campaign and a New Hampshire primary winner himself in 1996, still chuckles at the strategy, which was so successful it chased Mr. Nixon's opponent, George Romney, out of the race.

But Mr. Buchanan says it probably can't be repeated.

With 10 months to go before the first primary vote is cast, every serious campaign has a full operation -- promising a long, drawn-out affair that is likely to fatigue voters and the candidates themselves.

"All of this strategy is really about donors and timing, what's going to be best to raise money, rather than what's going to be best for keeping voters' interests in your campaign," said Michael McDonald, a professor at George Mason University who studies voter turnout.

With a giant set of primaries increasingly likely for Feb. 5, the 2008 nomination will depend far more on television ads, and candidates will need a large bank account to compete.

Chuck Larson, an adviser to Sen. John McCain's operation in Iowa, which traditionally holds the first caucuses, said the campaign is definitely starting earlier.

"In 1999, for example, eight years ago, we took our first trip down to meet then-Governor Bush on approximately March 3, to encourage him to run for president," Mr. Larson said. "Here we are almost eight years to the date and we have had campaigns with field staff on the ground in Iowa for nearly a year."

Still, he doubts Iowans will get fatigued, saying they enjoy their position with the first-in-the-nation caucuses.

Curtis Gans, director of the Committee for the Study of the American Electorate, said voter fatigue is a myth and when it comes time to vote, voters do their duty.

"On the elections, the major elections, when there's something to decide, people vote," he said.

Mark J. Rozell, another George Mason professor, said the problem is that political insiders already are dissecting and speculating about the campaigns, though the public isn't paying attention.

"We've had lots of polls and predictions already, and many more to come -- but we're all just talking to each other," Mr. Rozell said. "By the time the public gets seriously interested, anything important that there is to say about the candidates has already been said by leading observers."

If the campaigns seem early and intense to voters, to the campaign staffs it's only natural, said Katon Dawson, chairman of South Carolina's Republican Party.

"If anything it started late," he said. "This race is over this time next year. We have races for mayor that last seven months."

With a May 15 Republican debate scheduled for Columbia, S.C., Mr. Dawson said it's possible some candidates "may not make it off that stage."

DOJ_NMG_0140234

The grind of a long campaign is exactly what kept Mr. Nixon out of New Hampshire, Mr. Buchanan said. In his losing bid for the presidency in 1960, Mr. Nixon realized he wore himself out, which he thought was part of the reason he looked so tired in the famous decisive televised debate with John F. Kennedy.

Mr. Buchanan said Mr. Nixon told him waiting also would give the press time to beat up on his New Hampshire opponent, Mr. Romney.

"Let them chew on him for a little while," Mr. Nixon told Mr. Buchanan.

And once Mr. Nixon entered the race, he still only campaigned two or three days out of the week, spending the rest of the time recharging in Florida, using television ads to keep a presence. Mr. Romney, meanwhile, exhausted himself by doing a long series of events each day.

The strategy worked beautifully. On Feb. 28, two weeks before the primary, Mr. Romney took himself out of the running, delivering the state to Mr. Nixon.

Mr. Buchanan and Mr. McDonald both said the one potential candidate who could afford to wait this time around is former Vice President Al Gore, a Democrat.

Mr. McDonald said Republican Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former New York City mayor, also could have tried that, but he ended up jumping into the race to convince donors he is serious about running.

"The amount of money that's going to be spent in this campaign, the candidates have a real incentive to get that fundraising apparatus going," Mr. McDonald said.

Mr. Dawson said with a winner probably chosen in early February, the real difference this time around will be the long gulf between the time the nomination is settled and the nominating conventions, which will come in September.

"I can't imagine the search for a VP candidate -- that's what's going to consume some of the down time, along with fundraising and party building," he said.

Conservatives Look For A Winning Hand (WP)

By Michael D. Shear. Anne E. Kornblut

Lack of Candidate to Rally Around Has Key GOP Constituency Feeling Glum

Each year for more than three decades, a handful of icons of the American conservative movement have met for a friendly game of seven-card stud in a Washington hotel suite the night before the annual Conservative Political Action Conference, or CPAC.

This week, according to several participants, the mood around the poker table could hardly have been more glum.

"Nothing focuses the mind like an impending hanging," said longtime conservative fundraiser Richard A. Viguerie, paraphrasing the English essayist Samuel Johnson. "And Republicans feel an impending hanging with Hillary looming on the horizon."

The possibility of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton as president was bad enough. Even worse is the absence of a Republican candidate to rally around.

The movement's leaders "are all pretty much agreed that there is no clear conservative choice," said the game's host, David A. Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union. "Or even an unclear conservative choice."

The apprehension of Keene and his poker partners is shared not only by the more than 5,000 activists on hand as the conference began yesterday. It is mirrored across the broader constituency of the Republican Party.

Between the war in Iraq, President Bush's low approval ratings, the recent midterm defeats and a void at the top with neither the president nor the vice president in the race, several Republican strategists said the mood is drearier than it has been since 1992.

"There's a sense that the Republican brand is down and it needs to come back up again if there's going to be a chance," said John Feehery, who served as communications director for Tom DeLay when the Texan was House majority leader.

Even among White House staff members, there are frequent morbid jokes that the next occupant will be a Democrat, and there has been no mass exodus of Bush administration officials to Republican campaigns as there might have been during a more optimistic time.

Polling data, though an unreliable predictor of an election 20 months away, suggest Republicans have as good a chance of keeping the White House as losing it. Republicans are marginally ahead in many of the hypothetical head-to-head contests, suggesting that the country as a whole is divided down the middle when it comes to choosing a president.

Still, the party's mood is shaping the contest, and even leading Republicans are not overly optimistic. "I'm confident that we'll do fine," Sen. John McCain of Arizona said with uncharacteristic caution last week when asked to gauge the party's chances in the next presidential campaign cycle.

McCain, considered a front-runner for the GOP nomination, said his belief is that the country is still a "right-of-center nation, and the Republican Party is still a right-of-center party," adding, with a broad grin, that the GOP nominee can win "if the guy's not too big of a jerk."

Other Senate Republicans dodged the question. Sen. John E. Sununu of New Hampshire said last week that he is not a good person to ask about the party's prospects next year. Sen. John W. Warner of Virginia, who has endorsed McCain, waved away a question about 2008.

"It's going to be bad," a senior aide to a Senate Republican said, "but maybe we've maxed out, and the only place to go now is up."

That sense of foreboding has helped propel several of the campaigns, particularly that of former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, who in another season might not have stood a chance among Republican voters. Now, fearing they may lose, some Republicans have said they would be willing to consider someone more moderate if that is their only chance of retaining control of the White House.

"I think there's concern because the president's numbers are down and we just came off a bad election," said Warren Tompkins, a prominent Republican operative in South Carolina who supports former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney. "People are still a little down and a little shell-shocked from what happened in the last cycle."

One force who could revive the party is Clinton, Tompkins said, if she wins the Democratic nomination. "She will awaken us and get the party out of the doldrums, especially in my world," Tompkins said, referring to the South.

Polls give that theory credence, and they also suggest that either McCain or Giuliani would have greater luck drawing away independents and Democrats in a general election than the Democratic front-runners, Clinton and Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.), would have in attracting Republicans.

A recent Washington Post-ABC News poll showed Republicans having much more negative views of the Democratic contenders, particularly Clinton, than Democrats have of the Republican candidates.

Between pep talks from conservative leaders, activists at the CPAC yesterday listened to a series of Republican candidates -- minus McCain -- who trouped before them in hopes of sparking interest from the party's most committed base of supporters and a key part of the primary electorate.

The activists do not like Giuliani's support for abortion rights, gun control and gay rights. They are suspicious of Romney's positions on social issues given his more liberal pronouncements as governor. And they are wary of McCain, who did not help himself by skipping the convention. To express their dissatisfaction, some attendees wore stickers that said "Rudy McRomney" in a circle with a slash through the words.

Giuliani and Romney commanded huge crowds, many of them college students waving signs. But Giuliani's low-key speech had less partisan red meat than did Romney's, and the crowd reacted accordingly.

Giuliani gave only a glancing mention to social issues, emphasizing instead the areas of agreement. "I don't agree with myself on everything," he joked. He talked about the need for leadership, improving education and aggressively fighting terrorism.

Romney described having "stood at the center of the battlefield" on social issues as governor. "I fought to protect our family values," he said. He promised to appoint conservative judges and carry on the fight against terrorism.

The lesser-known candidates drew smaller, but often intense, crowds. Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas fired them up with vows to oppose same-sex marriage and bring faith "back to the public square."

"I don't think these people reflect my conservative beliefs," said Kyle Bristow, 20, a sophomore at Michigan State University and a supporter of long-shot presidential candidate Tom Tancredo, a congressman from Colorado. "Conservatives will lose if we're going to nominate liberals."

Viguerie, the movement veteran, said that he is not optimistic about victory in 2008 and that he tells conservatives to focus on the long term. "I think it will be '012 or '016," he said.

In the meantime, he suggested that conservative Republicans withhold support from McCain, Giuliani and Romney -- at least for the time being. "I don't think it's worth the conservative energy right now," Viguerie said.

A Mood Of Gloom At CPAC (POL)

By Jonathan Martin

The Politico, March 3, 2007

At first blush, the state of the Vast Right-Wing Conspiracy appears to be strong. Here at the annual Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC), a few thousand students, activists, hopeful pols and professional hangers-on have descended on one of Washington's larger hotels to affirm and amplify the right-wing gospel.

But even though every conservative group from the Islamic Free Market Institute to The American Protectionist is here in force, there is considerable grumbling about the health of the movement. From conservative pioneers to up-and-coming true believers, many attendees are looking for leaders -- and they're uncertain about the current crop of presidential candidates and not even thrilled with the current occupant of the White House.

"I'm disenchanted, I'm disenfranchised, I'm just dissed," quipped David Bossie, the president of Citizens United and a tireless congressional investigator in the Clinton era.

"It's a struggle," said conservative activist and public relations specialist Mike Thompson. "Conservatives want to win, but they aren't really sure the guys at the top of the field are conservative." Reconciling purity and pragmatism is always a challenge, Thompson added, but it's especially so going into 2008 because "of the fear of the other side."

Some of the ire at the CPAC conclave is directed squarely at Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), whom many conservatives suspect talks the talk when it comes to movement ideals but harbors dangerously moderate instincts.

On Thursday, Bossie gleefully unveiled a 22-page dossier kneecapping McCain ("He's No Ronald Reagan: Why Conservatives Should Not Vote for John McCain"). But Bossie also said his beef wasn't just with the one Republican presidential aspirant – McCain -- who skipped the CPAC festivities

His McCain manifesto "may be the first, but it's not going to be the only," Bossie said by way of warning to the other GOP aspirants.

It's not just skepticism about McCain, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney that has members of the movement in a funk.

While conservatives here are appreciative of his steadfastness in the war on terror, President Bush has disappointed some on the right who had high hopes.

Bush has "made so many mistakes," said the Eagle Forum's Phyllis Schlafly. "The war is a disaster and he flubbed the [immigration] issue."

And the leading GOP contenders to succeed Bush? "They're all equally unacceptable," Schlafly said.

Comparisons with the ultimate CPAC icon, Ronald Reagan, are, of course, inevitable in this crowd. While Bush has never addressed the gathering, now in its 34th year, CPAC proudly posts on its Web site all the years that Reagan addressed the conference (12 times all told). And as veteran activists recall, the Gipper did far more than give perfunctory after-dinner remarks.

"Reagan wasn't just at the head table," said a wistful Richard Viguerie, "he walked among us." The direct mail guru said conservatives "are leaderless at this point in time."

"They no longer look to Republican leaders, whether it's President Bush or Republicans in Congress."

Conservatives, Bossie said, "are desperately looking for an heir to Reagan's mantle." And among the top three contenders, "I don't think that any of these candidates are up to that."

But it's not just the old-timers, pining for the good old days that always look better in hindsight, who have soured the mood at CPAC.

"There is no agenda," said Soren Dayton, a young consultant and blogger, complaining that GOP candidates are only offering up predictable platitudes. "You say you're pro-life, you say you'll ban gay marriage and you say you'll cut taxes."

Many of the younger bloggers here, at least those not actively working for a campaign, are in no hurry to get on board with the 2008 contenders.

"I'm for letting them fight it out for a while," said Mary Katharine Ham, who writes for the conservative TownHall.

Some GOP gurus dismiss the overlay of pessimism. Grover Norquist admits that "there's no Ronald Reagan that everybody's in love with," but he takes a more hopeful view of the rightward shifts of Romney, McCain and Giuliani.

"We have candidates going to where Reagan is," pointed out the anti-tax crusader. "That's good, that's called progress."

Conservatism would be in trouble, Norquist added, if the top candidates were saying, 'I'm not where Reagan is, and I don't want to be.' "

"There's no Rockefeller wing of the party left," he observed.

Indeed, the conservative movement has consolidated their control over the GOP and kept successive Democratic hopefuls out of the White House.

As John O'Neill, Sen. John F. Kerry's fellow Swift Boat veteran-turned-nemesis put it when I asked him about the 2004 race: "mission accomplished."

The question now is what the next mission is and who will lead it.

Romancing The Conservatives (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow, Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 3, 2007

Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney yesterday delivered a faultlessly tailored appeal to more than 1,000 grass-roots conservative activists hungry for a renewed commitment to limited government.

Addressing the 34th annual Conservative Political Action Conference, Mr. Romney stood out from the pack of Republican presidential aspirants that included Rudolph W. Giuliani and Mike Huckabee by promising to end taxes on earnings from interest, dividends and capital gains, and to cap federal spending and veto every attempt to break that cap -- whether proposed by a Republican or Democratic Congress.

"I know how to veto. I like vetoes," Mr. Romney said.

Mr. Giuliani, the former New York City mayor who served in President Reagan's Justice Department, said the late president understood that ideas, not race or ethnicity, are what identify Americans.

Drawing nearly as much applause but not the repeated standing ovations Mr. Romney received, Mr. Giuliani said, "it's very critical to begin every discussion" of Iraq and Afghanistan with the understanding that the United States is a nation that covets peace.

"Maybe we made a mistake in calling it the 'war on terror.' It is a war [by terrorists] on us," he said.

Mr. Giuliani also told the conservatives he shared their goal of offering school choice. But he skimmed over other deep differences, telling the crowd they share some beliefs and not others, just like "your relationship, I think, with your husband, your wife, your children."

In interviews afterward, some attendees said Mr. Giuliani lost momentum when he heaped lavish praise on Abraham Lincoln.

While many conservatives regard the Civil War president as the spiritual founder of the Republican Party, others deeply resent him as a man who ruthlessly suspended constitutional rights and freedoms in order to militarily challenge the South's belief in its right to secede. Some saw similar disdain for individuals' rights in Mr. Giuliani's successful war on crime in New York City.

Mr. Giuliani took the side of the Bush administration on an issue that troubles civil libertarian conservatives, saying that "you need the tools like the Patriot Act and legal intelligence surveillance."

"Rudy thought he was addressing a Republican audience," said Mike Long, chairman of the New York State Conservative Party. "Mitt understood this is an audience of people who are conservatives first."

Mr. Romney and Mr. Giuliani consistently rank in the top tier of Republican presidential contenders, along with Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich. Mr. McCain is the only major candidate not to address CPAC, while Mr. Gingrich, who today is to give the closing speech of the three-day conference, has said he won't make a decision about running until September.

Many conservatives argue Republicans lost in last year's elections because they forgot conservative principles, particularly limited government. Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana, a key voice for limited government, said the elections were the bottom of a descent he has seen coming.

"We're no longer off course. We've run aground. Six years without a course correction was simply too much," he said.

So powerful is the anti-tax sentiment among conservatives here that Mr. Huckabee, who just recently had refused to rule out raising taxes, announced he was signing Americans for Tax Reform's Taxpayer Protection Pledge not to raise taxes.

Mr. Romney, though, made the boldest overture of the day, saying it is "time to take government apart and put it back together, but this time let's make it simpler, smarter and smaller."

Coming into the conference, conservatives were looking for a champion and Mr. Huckabee summed up the attitude of many.

"The theme might be, dude, where's my candidate?" the former Arkansas governor said. "Well, I like to think that maybe he's standing in front of you."

He urged conservatives to go beyond the powerful lures of money and name recognition in choosing whom to back.

"If celebrity and money are the criteria to be president of the United States then Paris Hilton might be our next president," Mr. Huckabee said, adding he was a consistent conservative during his more than 10 years as governor.

Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican, said he would be "the family president" who would be proudly pro-life, and also would tackle big government through a flat tax.

Holding up a copy of the tax code, he said, "This should be taken behind the barn and killed with a dull ax."

Rep. Tom Tancredo, a Colorado Republican who is also exploring a bid for president, said he was surprised by the quadrennial rush to the right for many of the leading candidates.

"For those of us who have been conservatives even before Al Gore invented the Internet, this is all mildly sort of amusing," he said.

Mr. Tancredo, a major opponent of illegal entry into the United States, concedes he probably won't win, but said he will make sure candidates address issues central to conservatism.

"The conservative movement is not supposed to choose a candidate; it's supposed to produce one," he said.

For his part, Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican, warned that the country is facing a growing threat from China, and said the country needs to change the trade policies that have sent key defense industries overseas.

"The arsenal of democracy is being fractured and sent across the world," he said.

Romney And Giuliani Make Pitch To Conservatives (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 2 — Mitt Romney of Massachusetts and Rudolph W. Giuliani of New York are both Republican presidential candidates who have been voted into office by largely Democratic electorates. They both have a history of taking liberal positions on social issues. And both are viewed warily by conservative Republicans who are integral to the party's presidential nominating process.

Mr. Romney, the former governor of Massachusetts, and Mr. Giuliani, the former mayor of New York, sought to address those challenges on Friday with speeches to conservative advocates gathered for an annual conference in Washington.

To a certain extent, they approached the task in similar ways: by presenting themselves as devotees of Ronald Reagan who had tamed Democratic excesses in their communities. Mr. Giuliani talked about cutting crime, welfare and taxes; Mr. Romney talked of cutting taxes and the size of government.

Yet they parted company on how they dealt with the more difficult question of their positions on social issues. Mr. Romney made no mention of his past support of abortion rights and gay rights, instead focusing on his current opposition to abortion and same-sex marriage. He portrayed himself as someone who stood at the barricades as his state sought to permit same-sex marriage and to remove restrictions from abortion and stem cell research.

"I stood at the center of the battlefield on every major social issue," Mr. Romney said in a speech to the gathering, the Conservative Political Action Conference. "I fought to preserve our traditional values, and to protect the sanctity of human life. I vetoed bills. I filed new bills. I enforced a law that banned out-of-state same-sex couples from coming to Massachusetts to get married."

Mr. Giuliani made no mention of his support for gay rights, abortion rights and gun control. Instead, he suggested that he and his audience had many more agreements than disagreements.

"Ronald Reagan used to say, 'My 80 percent ally is not my 20 percent enemy,' " Mr. Giuliani said. "What he meant by that is, we don't all see eye to eye on everything. You and I have a lot of common beliefs that are the same, and we have some that are different."

"We do believe in many of the same things, I'm sure," he said. "We believe in giving freedom to people. I think the core of the Republican Party and the historic mission of the Republican Party and the Republican Party makes its greatest contribution when it's giving more freedom to people."

The third major Republican presidential contender, Senator John McCain of Arizona, skipped the event; his aides said he was raising money in California and Utah. But his absence did not shield him from attacks, albeit indirect ones. Mr. Romney invoked bills Mr. McCain had sponsored to control campaign financing and his alliance with Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts on legislation to permit some illegal immigrants to apply for citizenship, two unpopular measures in this audience.

"If I'm elected president, I will fight to repeal McCain-Feingold," Mr. Romney said, referring to the campaign spending bill.

The conference drew thousands of attendees, many of whom waited in a long line out the door for a late-afternoon appearance by Ann Coulter, the conservative author and commentator. Still, the tone of the conference was less excitement about the 2008 campaign than concern about the ideological credentials of the three leading contenders for the Republican nomination.

Mr. Giuliani arrived to a rousing reception, but the room grew silent and restless as Mr. Giuliani wandered through a speech that lasted 40 minutes. By contrast, Mr. Romney arrived to a much more subdued reception but left to rousing applause.

"The governor knocked this speech out of the park," said Paloma A. Zepeda, a marketing consultant and conservative blogger who said she came into the room with "serious doubts" about Mr. Romney, and left saying she was leaning toward supporting him. By contrast, she said, Mr. Giuliani "took a risk by coming to C.P.A.C., and he managed to not allay a single conservative fear about a Giuliani candidacy."

In perhaps an unlucky bit of scheduling, Mr. Giuliani appeared after Wayne LaPierre, the executive vice president of the National Rifle Association, who gave a blistering attack on gun laws pressed for New York City by Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, also a Republican, who was elected with Mr. Giuliani's very strong support. "Everything they do in New York City on guns smacks of hypocrisy," Mr. LaPierre said.

He made no mention of Mr. Giuliani. Mr. Giuliani did not address Mr. LaPierre's criticism.

Mr. Giuliani focused on what has been one of his electoral strengths: his performance as mayor after the attacks on the World Trade Center. Mr. Giuliani departed from a standard criticism of President Bill Clinton by Republicans, who have faulted him for not recognizing the emerging terrorist threat after the first attack on the World Trade Center and the bombing of the U.S.S. Cole.

"I don't blame people for that," he said. " I don't think it's instructive or helpful to do that."

DOJ_NMG_0140240

The problem for conservatives is that the candidates they may be more inclined to support — Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas and Mike Huckabee, the former governor of Arkansas — are generally seen as being longer-shots to winning the nomination. Mr. Huckabee got in a jab, making reference to Mr. Romney's disclosure last week that he had only recently joined the National Rifle Association. "I'm not a latecomer to the N.R.A," Mr. Huckabee said. "I was the first governor in America to have a concealed carry permit, so don't mess with me."

GOP Candidates Preen For Conservatives (GAN)

By Chuck Raasch

Gannett, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON — Invoking Ronald Reagan at every turn, a coterie of Republican presidential contenders tried to burnish their credentials Friday before the year's largest gathering of conservative activists.

Ex-New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani and ex-Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney both received warm but not raucous audience responses as they tried to calm doubts about their commitments to conservative principles.

Before an audience of several thousand at the Conservative Political Action Conference, a somewhat subdued Giuliani avoided the social issues that separate him from many conservatives — he supports abortion and gay rights — instead concentrating on his record as a tax-cutter, budget balancer and post-9/11 leader.

Quoting Reagan, Giuliani said "an 80% friend is not your 20% enemy." Invoking Reagan's optimism and applying it to the war on terrorism, he said victory was inevitable — if difficult — because "the human soul and the human heart is moving in our direction."

"We will get there the way Ronald Reagan got us there — peace through strength," Giuliani said, using another Reagan line.

Touching a conservative nerve, Romney said he'd appoint judges who would strictly interpret laws.

"It is the people who are sovereign in America, not a few folks in black robes," Romney said.

He explained his conversion from a pro-abortion rights Senate candidate in 1994 into an anti-abortion, anti-gay marriage position as the result of his being thrust in the middle of embryonic stem cell and the gay-marriage debates while he was governor of Massachusetts

"He gave a good, bullet point-like speech demonstrating how he beat back liberalism in Massachusetts while giving conservatives a lot to look forward to in a Romney administration," said veteran conservative strategist Greg Mueller, who had not yet endorsed a candidate.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., decided to bypass the conference, which some activists said could hurt him. Romney had the most direct attack on McCain, calling for repeal of the 2002 campaign finance reform measures McCain sponsored with liberal Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis.

Several lesser-known candidates may have helped themselves, in the process taking veiled swipes at what they see as election-year conversions by Romney and Giuliani.

Mueller said Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., did well defending "true-blue, unapologetic conservatism."

Ex-Gov. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas, who shares Bill Clinton's hometown of Hope, Ark., was applauded as he sought to portray himself as a lifelong conservative who believed in the Reaganesque "faith, family and freedom."

"This country is strong because there is a culture of life," Huckabee said.

Huckabee called abortion a "principled" and "defining" issue and said he was "troubled" by people who claim to be opposed to abortion but do not want to outlaw it. While Giuliani has not changed his support of abortion rights, he recently said in South Carolina that he would appoint "strict constructionists" — code words for conservative judges — if elected president.

Brownback said the Supreme Court is "one vote away from overturning Roe vs. Wade," and drew loud applause when he proclaimed that "there is not a fundamental right to abortion" in the Constitution.

Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., a staunch illegal immigration opponent and self-described "huge long shot" candidate, by inference mocked Giuliani and Romney.

"Conversions are supposed to be made on the road to Damascus, not on the road to Des Moines," he said.

GOP Candidates Woo Key Conservatives (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

Giuliani and Romney draw large crowds while Ann Coulter's remarks prove to be the most controversial.

WASHINGTON — Republican presidential contenders Rudolph W. Giuliani and Mitt Romney made their case to influential conservatives Friday, positioning themselves as allies to the gathering despite mixed records on such high-profile social issues as abortion, gay marriage and stem cell research.

Romney, the former Massachusetts governor, and Giuliani, the former New York mayor who has staked out an early lead in polls of the GOP rank-and-file, each drew overflow crowds of several thousand at the annual meeting of the Conservative Political Action Conference.

Also addressing the crowd, but attracting less attention, were four GOP candidates with more solid conservative credentials but lesser national identities — Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, Rep. Duncan Hunter of El Cajon, and Rep. Tom Tancredo of Colorado.

Noticeably absent was Sen. John McCain of Arizona, who in his second bid for the Republican presidential nomination has sought to overcome opposition from the party's conservative base that helped doom his campaign in 2000. But McCain has made little discernible headway among the activists at Friday's event and he skipped it to campaign in Utah and his home state.

The conference is sponsored by the American Conservative Union and dozens of other like-minded organizations, and it provides an opportunity for power brokers based in Washington and conservative leaders elsewhere in the country to compare notes and plot strategy.

Giuliani pitched himself as a fiscal conservative who in New York cut taxes, reduced crime and thinned out welfare rolls — and would do the same at the national level. He defended the Bush administration for launching the war in Iraq, conducting a controversial domestic spying program and enacting the Patriot Act, saying that the U.S. needs to remain "on the offensive" in fighting terrorism.

Giuliani did not disavow his support for abortion rights, gay rights and gun control — issues he did not mention in his speech. But in a clear reference to his stands, he called for conservatives to embrace President Reagan's brand of big-tent Republican politics.

"We don't all agree all the time," Giuliani told his audience. "But the point of a presidential election is to decide who you believe the most."

He received sporadic applause during his remarks. Romney, who spoke several hours later, provoked a more enthusiastic response.

Romney criticized McCain by name, taking the senator to task for his efforts to rewrite campaign finance laws and immigration policy — comments that brought applause.

The former governor did not mention Giuliani. But in a possible effort to contrast himself with the former mayor, who has been married three times, Romney invited his wife, Ann, to join him at the podium. She made a point of noting that they will celebrate their 38th wedding anniversary this month and that they have five sons and 10 grandchildren.

Romney's efforts to court support from conservatives has been hampered by criticism that he has only recently embraced their positions on various social causes after airing more liberal views while seeking office in Massachusetts. For instance, in a failed 1994 Senate race, he stressed his support for gay rights. And he has acknowledged that he has changed his view on abortion, opposing it after previously taking a pro-choice position.

On Friday, he detailed his efforts to fight gay marriage and stem cell research during his four years as governor.

"I stood at the center of the battlefield on every major social issue, and I defended the sanctity of human life," Romney said, prompting a standing ovation.

Some of those at the conference said they remain unconvinced that Romney or Giuliani would stay true to conservative causes if either won the White House.

"People are tired of seeing people coming in right and turning left," said the Rev. LeRoy Thomas, chaplain for the National Black Republican Assn. He supports Brownback.

DOJ_NMG_0140242

But David Bellows, an instructor at the Rev. Jerry Falwell's Liberty University in Lynchburg, Va., said many conservatives would be willing to compromise on candidates who do not agree with them on every issue but share their general values. "We need to … concentrate on whether they are conservative in their values, not necessarily whether they are antiabortion or not, " he said.

Some who arrived at the conference undecided left with Romney campaign signs, including Margo Saule, 65, a horse breeder from Charlottesville, Va.

Saule called Romney's speech "straightforward," saying "I liked his convictions."

As for his recent change on abortion, Saule said it did not bother her.

"People change their minds," she said. "I don't think he changed his opinions to become more electable."

Others said that Giuliani would do a better job of protecting the country from terrorism, and that his track record on national security trumped his liberal leanings on social issues.

"He's great on protecting us from terror, bringing down crime and taxes," said June Nichols, 70, a consultant from Merritt Island, Fla.

The day's most controversial speaker proved to be conservative pundit Ann Coulter, who at the end of her speech — which followed Romney's — used a slur to refer to Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards.

Coulter said she had intended to comment on the former senator from North Carolina, "but it turns out you have to go into rehab if you use the word 'faggot,' so I … can't really talk about Edwards."

The Democratic National Committee chairman, Howard Dean, quickly issued a statement calling on the GOP presidential candidates at the conference to "denounce her hateful remarks."

A Giuliani spokeswoman said she had not heard the speech, and a Romney spokesman did not return calls late Friday.

Tancredo Demos Stump Speech (DENP)

By Ann C. Mulkern

Denver Post, March 3, 2007

Washington -- The next president must possess core conservative principles or risk losing the election and much of what America stands for, Rep. Tom Tancredo told a cheering crowd today at a conservative convention.

The Littleton Republican who is considering a presidential run presented his political vision in a speech to the Conservative Political Action Conference.

In a packed and cheering ballroom, Tancredo said it's imperative to crack down on illegal immigration and reject "the cult of multi-culturalism" that he says is destroying American values. Tancredo also declared the need to return to traditional conservative ideals, including opposition to legalized abortion.

"With the world at war, and the very survival of Western Civilization at risk, with the Supreme Court potentially one death or retirement away from reversing Roe Vs. Wade," Tancredo said, referencing the case that legalized abortion, "real conservatives cannot afford to sit this one out."

Tancredo was one of several potential and declared presidential candidates appearing at the conference, an annual Washington D.C. gathering of the right wing of the Republican Party. In presidential election season, it serves as an audition for candidates wanting to capture conservative activists and impress the national media with their ability to draw crowds.

Tancredo has formed a presidential exploratory committee, saying he sees the need for a true conservative in the race. He touted his conservative credentials and used three Biblical references during his speech.

Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., and Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., also spoke.

Conservative Political Action Conference members will take a straw poll Saturday indicating which candidates they most support.

Walking on to the stage to the strains of the theme from the movie "Rocky," Tancredo said he's a "huge long shot" and compared himself to the hero of the Oscar-winning boxing movie.

Tancredo alternately spoke about his potential to win the presidency, saying he knows it's David vs. Goliath, but that "David won." But he also seemed to concede he won't advance when he said he wants "a candidate in this presidential election that I can vote for."

"I'm so tired of voting because the person is the lesser of two evils," Tancredo said. "I want to be able to vote for somebody &I believe is leading a crusade, somebody who I actually want to participate in that crusade because they inspire me to do so.

"I may not be that person, I understand," Tancredo said. "But look for that in whoever it is you're going to support."

Some Tancredo supporters at the event said they believe he can win the nomination, despite the fact that lead candidates are raising an estimated million dollars a week. Tancredo's congressional bank account had $189,000 when he made the last required disclosure at the end of 2006.

"I absolutely think he can get elected," said Nathan Rager, 21, of Virginia. "He's the most well-known conservative in this race."

According to Rager, Former New York Mayor Rudy Guiliani has a liberal record. Romney's record on conservative issues isn't consistent, he said. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., "is just an amnesty supporter," he said, referring to McCain's support of a legal status for illegal immigrants.

Republican K.C. McAlpin of Virginia didn't vote for President Bush in either 2000 or 2004, choosing instead an independent candidate. He wouldn't say whom. He said he'll do so again rather than vote for McCain, Romney or Guiliani.

Tancredo, McAlpin said "is an authentic conservative."

Romney supporter Ruth Malhotra, 23, of Georgia, however, said while Tancredo's done a "amazing work" on the immigration issue, he's "not presidential material.

"When you're looking at someone to lead our country, you need a strong record of leadership, more broadly defined," Malhotra said. "I don't think Tom Tancredo is the best person to lead our country."

During his speech, Tancredo demonstrated his fondness for controversy. He repeated his tempest-provoking remark made last year that Miami is like a Third World Country. He talked about the letter he received from then-Florida Gov. Jeb Bush. In that letter, Bush said Florida people celebrated diversity.

"I'm all for celebrating diversity," Tancredo told the crowd. "When you make a state religion out of it, that's when you have a problem."

He said that the country needs a leader who knows we need a strong national defense "because our enemies are psychopaths and our allies are the French."

When comparing himself to the fictional Rocky character, Tancredo joked that one of the differences between himself and Sylvester Stallone was that "probably Sylvester Stallone does not smoke cigars. But I do."

The crowd erupted in large cheers and hoots. Last month, a Capitol police officer came to Tancredo's congressional office after a neighbor smelled smoke and called police. Tancredo was smoking a cigar, which is legal in lawmakers' offices.

"Although we are in the middle of a place that's run by what I refer to as the lifestyle Nazis here in Washington D.C., that don't let you do things like smoke in public places, in my office in the capitol anyway, the smoking lap is lit, even if my next door neighbor doesn't like it."

Ann Coulter Calls John Edwards "Faggot" (UPI)

UPI, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 2 (UPI) -- Best-selling right-wing author Ann Coulter, speaking to a conservative audience in Washington Friday, called former Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C., a "faggot."

Coulter was a featured speaker at the 34th annual Conservative Political Action Conference. Following her prepared remarks, televised on C-Span, Coulter was asked to talk about Edwards.

"It turns out you have to go into rehab if you use the word 'faggot,' so I'm kind of at an impasse -- I can't really talk about Edwards," she said.

"Rehab" may have been a reference to "Grey's Anatomy" star Isaiah Washington's decision to go into rehab during a public relations firestorm after he called one of his co-stars a "faggot."

DOJ_NMG_0140244

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean called on Republican presidential candidates, especially those who attended the conference, to denounce Coulter's remark, Fox News reported.

Coulter has previously suggested that other prominent Democrats are gay -- including former Vice President Al Gore, former President Bill Clinton and Sen. Hillary Clinton, Editor & Publisher reported. All of them, including Edwards, are married, and Bill Clinton's heterosexual tendencies caused a certain amount of well publicized trouble for him as in the White House.

But Did Ginger Rogers Wear Flip-Flops? (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

"It's an honor to be here in high heels, walking backwards," Mitt Romney said yesterday as he began his address to the Conservative Political Action Conference.

Don't panic, Phyllis Schlafly: He was merely referring to a previous speaker's invocation of an old joke. But for a guy trying to win over religious conservatives, it was a strange opening line.

If the former Massachusetts governor is going to win the Republican presidential nomination, he is going to have to overcome suspicions that he is a supporter of alternative lifestyles and other things that rile the right -- and a discussion of women's footwear may not be the way to do it.

Outside the ballroom at the Omni Shoreham, a man was strolling about in a dolphin costume and a T-shirt declaring "Flip Romney: Just another Flip Flopper From Massachusetts." The porpoise was ready to burst his blowhole: "First he was pro-choice, now magically he's pro-life. First he's for gun control, then he's against it."

Other CPAC attendees handed out full-size yellow Romney flip-flops announcing, "1992: Romney voted for Democrat Paul Tsongas for president." On each chair was a "Romney multiple-choice exam" about gun control, taxes, abortion and gay rights; the answer to each question was "both A and B." Another flier juxtaposed Romney's photo with John Kerry's, warning that Romney "told Planned Parenthood he supports Roe v Wade!"

For Romney, it showed a measure of bravery just coming to CPAC. John McCain skipped the event, and Rudy Giuliani gave a timid speech that avoided abortion and gay rights. CPAC is, after all, not a place to showcase diverse viewpoints.

In the session preceding Romney, Rep. Sam Johnson (R-Tex.) said of Cindy Sheehan, whose son died in Iraq: "She's an idiot." In the session after Romney, Ann Coulter used an anti-gay slur to describe John Edwards (the line drew applause) and asked: "Did Al Gore actually swallow Michael Moore?" When a questioner asked Coulter why she praises marriage but broke off so many engagements, she responded by calling the questioner ugly.

Sen. Jim Inhofe (R-Okla.) got the crowd cheering early in the day. "I have been called -- my kids are all aware of this -- dumb, crazy man, science abuser, Holocaust denier, villain of the month, hate-filled, warmonger, Neanderthal, Genghis Khan and Attila the Hun," he announced. "And I can just tell you that I wear some of those titles proudly."

Inhofe repeated his view that man-made global warming is "the greatest hoax ever perpetrated on the American people," and he quarreled with a Bush administration proposal to list polar bears as a threatened species. "They're overpopulated," he declared. "Don't worry about it: The polar bear is fine." His staff handed out supporting documentation, including the claim that "MARS HAS GLOBAL WARMING DESPITE ABSENCE OF SUVs."

Still, even the CPAC faithful know that the true conservatives in the GOP presidential race, figures such as Rep. Duncan Hunter (Calif.), have little chance of prevailing. Attendees here were, instead, talking about the least bad options among the major contenders: McCain, Giuliani and Romney.

That explains why, of more than 5,000 CPAC attendees, only 336 were on hand to hear Hunter deliver a speech proposing a wall across the Mexican border. By contrast, 1,500 people jammed the room to hear Romney. Several hundred more had to watch on televisions in the hallway. "Note rapturous crowd applause," Romney's lawyer, Ben Ginsburg, instructed a reporter. There were, in fact, several red "Mitt" mitts and blue Romney signs among the attendees.

The governor got off to a bad start when anti-tax activist Grover Norquist, assigned to introduce Romney, couldn't be located. "Grover apparently made a pit stop," the master of ceremonies announced. The pit stop went on for five minutes, forcing organizers to entertain the crowd with video titled "The Hillary Show" by the anti-Clinton Web site Stophernow.com.

Norquist said that the difficulty of being a conservative in Massachusetts made Romney like Ginger Rogers in the old joke: She "did everything Fred Astaire did, except backwards and in high heels."

The handsome Romney had a smooth delivery, but he looked mechanical as he used the teleprompter, which apparently malfunctioned while he was trying to quote Ronald Reagan. "I'll make sure I get it here right," he said, as he reached for his notes.

The governor began his discussion, sensibly, with economic policy, where his conservative credentials are not questioned. But he didn't quite have his message ready for a bumper sticker. "If I am elected president, I am going to cap non-defense discretionary spending at inflation minus 1 percent!" he vowed.

It was time for the social issues, and Romney wasn't holding back. "I stood at the center of the battlefield on every major social issue," said the man who once vowed to best Ted Kennedy in support of gay rights. "I fought to preserve our traditional values and to protect the sanctity of human life."

"This isn't the time for us to shrink from conservative principles," Romney said before he departed. Indeed, for Romney, it is the time to adopt them.

The speech didn't sway Flip the dolphin, who continued his rounds. But Romney had, at least, won over Coulter. "I think he's probably our best candidate," she said. She'd prefer Duncan Hunter, she said, but "I'm being realistic." And, besides, "I love Mormons," Coulter said. "In 1992, Bill Clinton came in third in Utah."

McCain Wins Spartanburg Straw Poll (CNN)

By Alexander Mooney

CNN.com, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Arizona Sen. John McCain won a Spartanburg, South Carolina straw poll Friday, an early sign of how conservative South Carolinians might view the GOP presidential field.

McCain beat former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani by two votes, 164-162, according to Spartanburg County GOP chairman Rick Beltram. California Rep. Duncan Hunter came in third with 158 votes.

A total of 776 people voted in the straw poll.

McCain Wins GOP Presidential Straw Poll (TSSC)

The State, March 3, 2007

U.S. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., won the Spartanburg County Republican Party presidential straw poll on the second day of vote counting.

McCain was third when tallying was suspended Thursday. But by Friday afternoon, McCain had leapt into first in the final vote, according to The Associated Press.

The final results were: McCain, 164; former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, 162; U.S. Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., 158; U.S. Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., 85; former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, 80; and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, 21.

Noticeably Absent From The Giuliani Campaign: His Children (NYT)

By Russ Buettner, Richard Pérez-Peña

DOJ_NMG_0140246

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

As he embarks on a campaign for the presidency, former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani is going forward without two people who once played supporting roles in his political life: his children, Andrew, 21, and Caroline, 17.

Andrew Giuliani has been at his father's side in campaign commercials and inaugurations since he was a toddler, famously bounding across the stage in a rambunctious manner and mimicking his father's rhetorical flourishes during Mr. Giuliani's 1994 mayoral inauguration.

But Mr. Giuliani's relationship with Andrew has grown strained and distant since his very public and bitter divorce from Andrew's mother, Donna Hanover, and his marriage to Judith Nathan, according to Andrew and others familiar with the relationship.

In a telephone interview yesterday, Andrew, a sophomore and member of the golf team at Duke University, acknowledged having had difficulties with Ms. Nathan, and said that he and his father had recently tried to reconcile after not speaking "for a decent amount of time."

"There's obviously a little problem that exists between me and his wife," the younger Mr. Giuliani said. "And we're trying to figure that out. But as of right now it's not working as well as we would like."

Andrew Giuliani said he would not participate in his father's campaign, saying his devotion to becoming a professional golfer within three years allows no time for distraction.

While he would not say how long he had been estranged from his father, others close to the family said it appeared to have been for at least a year.

Similarly, a distance appears to have developed between Mr. Giuliani and his daughter, now a high school senior who is to attend Harvard University in September.

The familial tensions come as Mr. Giuliani prepares to run for president and as other Republican contenders deploy their children as campaign assets.

Mr. Giuliani's three marriages have already bubbled up as an issue. In February, Ann Romney, the wife of Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts governor, noted that her husband "had only one wife" — comparing him to other leading Republican candidates who had gone through divorces.

Some campaign Web sites highlight pictures of candidates with family members, but Mr. Giuliani's does not mention his children, though it includes photographs and mentions of Ms. Nathan.

The Giuliani campaign declined to comment about the former mayor's relationship with his children, and Ms. Hanover did not respond to messages left at her home and office.

Mr. Giuliani once prided himself on attending all his children's events and went to Andrew's high school football games and Caroline's plays. But he stopped at some point after his marriage to Ms. Nathan in 2003. He missed his son's graduation, in 2005, and his daughter's plays in the last 18 months, said people who attended those events.

In the interview, Andrew Giuliani spoke of his father's campaign, aware that he would have to address his absence. He said the decision not to participate hinged on his goal of becoming a professional golfer.

"I am going to be focused on my golf for the next, well really I don't even know for the next how long, but definitely over the next bunch of years," he said. "So I'm not going to have time to, even if I wanted to, be in the campaign."

He said that he and his father had recently begun trying to reconcile. "For a while there, we weren't talking, for a decent amount of time," Andrew said. "But lately we've been having more contact and trying to figure things out."

In 1989, Ms. Hanover and Andrew, then 3, were at Mr. Giuliani's side when he declared his mayoral candidacy. Caroline appeared with the family in campaign commercials after her birth in August that year.

When Mr. Giuliani ran in 1993, he and Andrew were featured playing baseball; Caroline appeared in a commercial blowing soap bubbles.

Clintons, Obama Hope To Woo Black Support In Selma (CNN)

By Mary Snow

DOJ_NMG_0140247

NEW YORK (CNN) -- As they battle for support in the black community in their quest for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama will attend Sunday's commemoration of the historic 1965 Selma voting rights march.

However, Clinton will bring along a not-so-secret weapon -- her husband, former President Bill Clinton.

"There is no white politician in America who is more popular in the African-American community than Bill Clinton," said Jamal Simmons, a Democratic strategist. "So she has a very strong card to play."

The results of one recent poll suggest that card is one she may need. (Watch how the former president can help Sen. Clinton)

An ABC News-Washington Post survey, taken late last week, found that Obama, from Illinois, was the choice of 44 percent of black Democrats, compared to 33 percent for Hillary Clinton, with a sampling error of plus or minus 8 percentage points. That was a marked shift from the beginning of the year, when she led Obama 60 percent to 20 percent. (Full story)

However, the poll found that the New York senator's favorable rating among black voters was 85 percent, compared to 70 percent for Obama, although his favorability has climbed 16 points since the beginning of the year.

Rep. John Lewis, D-Georgia, one of the leaders of the Selma march 42 years ago, said the competition for black voters between the senators is "a very difficult position to be in, but it's a good position to be in."

"We have choices," he said.

Simmons said that while black voters have a great deal of loyalty for Bill Clinton, "the question is whether that loyalty transfers to Hillary Clinton, and that's really the test she'll have to meet."

On Sunday in Selma, the former president will be inducted into the Voting Rights Hall of Fame. It will be the first major public appearance the Clintons have made together since Hillary Clinton announced in January that she would seek the Democratic nomination, and political observers will be looking keenly at how well she fares alongside her husband.

"There is, of course, something of a risk that when the Clintons appear next to one another, sometimes Bill can outshine her, and his connection to the community," said political analyst Stu Rothenberg of The Rothenberg Political Report.

Selma March Raises Political Stakes For Obama, Clinton (GAN)

By Ana Radelat

Gannett, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON — When Democratic presidential candidates Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama march over the Edmund Pettus Bridge in Selma, Ala., on Sunday, their political fortunes may rise or fall with each step.

Clinton, who represents New York in the Senate, and Obama, who represents Illinois, are heading South to woo black voters who could decide key early primaries next year.

"It's smart politics," said Ron Haskins, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution. "(Selma) is sacred civil rights ground."

Both candidates say they want to honor the memory of the historic 1965 march that captured the nation's attention and sped approval of the Voting Rights Act. Both will give speeches at historic black churches in Selma before they make their way across the bridge.

"This is an opportunity for her to show her respect for what was accomplished in Selma and the civil rights movement," said Mo Elleithee, spokesman for the Clinton campaign.

Jen Psaki, spokeswoman for the Obama campaign, said the senator — who was 3 years old when the historic march took place — wanted to make a "personal trip" to the famed civil rights site.

"His hope is that this is not something that is overly politicized," Psaki said.

But after polls this week showed Obama gaining popularity in the African-American community, Clinton raised the stakes by announcing that her husband, former President Bill Clinton, will march with her.

Bill and Hillary Clinton have strong support among African Americans, support they want to keep, Haskins said, while Obama is still in the process of introducing himself to that key Democratic constituency.

"Polls seem to show that when African Americans realize he's black, his support shoots up," Haskins said.

Both candidates hope their words this weekend are heard by black voters in South Carolina, which will hold the first-in-the-South Democratic presidential primary Jan. 29, one week after the New Hampshire primary. Nearly half the voters in the South Carolina primary will be black.

Alabama, another state with large numbers of black Democratic primary voters, also hopes to move its primary election from June to early February so it would be held on the heels of the South Carolina contest.

The rivalry between Hillary Clinton and Obama for black voters has put some black leaders in a difficult position because they are uncomfortable endorsing a presidential candidate this early in the political season.

Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., an original participant in the 1965 march who was beaten while trying to cross the Edmund Pettus Bridge, has repeatedly invited his congressional colleagues to join him in retracing his steps on the anniversary of the march. Lewis has declined to endorse either Hillary Clinton or Obama.

"This is not a political venture," said Brenda Jones, Lewis' press secretary. "For congressman Lewis, it is a spiritual experience."

Rep. James Clyburn, the black South Carolina lawmaker who is considered a king maker in his state's Democratic presidential primary election, also has refrained from backing either candidate.

But Rep. Artur Davis, D-Birmingham, who represents Selma in Congress, was among the first lawmakers to embrace Obama's candidacy.

Davis, who urged Obama to travel to Selma, has said the senator's candidacy would "ignite a feeling of national purpose and renewal that our country has not witnessed in my lifetime."

Clinton Donor Wanted By FBI In Scheme To Funnel Money (LAT)

By Robin Fields, Chuck Neubauer

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

The businessman, influential in Pakistani circles, also aided Boxer.

WASHINGTON — A Pakistani immigrant who hosted fundraisers in Southern California for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton is being sought by the FBI on charges that he funneled illegal contributions to Clinton's political action committee and Sen. Barbara Boxer's 2004 reelection campaign.

Authorities say Northridge businessman Abdul Rehman Jinnah, 56, fled the country after an indictment accused him of engineering more than $50,000 in illegal donations to the Democratic committees. A business associate charged as a co-conspirator has entered a guilty plea and is scheduled to be sentenced in Los Angeles next week.

A federal law enforcement source said prosecutors had not dealt with the political committees in conducting their investigation and had no evidence that the committees knew the contributions were illegal.

Officials for both committees said they were unaware of the investigation or indictments until they were contacted by The Times, and said they would not keep the donations.

The case has transformed Jinnah from a political point man on Pakistani issues, a man often photographed next to foreign dignitaries and U.S. leaders, into a fugitive with his mug shot on the FBI's "featured fugitives" wanted list.

Jinnah's profile peaked in 2004 and 2005 as he wooed members of Congress to join a caucus advancing Pakistani concerns and brought Clinton to speak to prominent Pakistani Americans, lauding their homeland's contributions to the war on terrorism and calling relations with Pakistan beneficial to U.S. interests.

Jinnah and his family donated more than $100,000 to the Democratic Party and Democratic candidates. Now friends say they believe Jinnah has returned to Pakistan.

Attempts to reach him and his relatives were unsuccessful. A "For Sale" sign stood in his yard on Thursday, and a neighbor said the family had not lived there for months.

Jinnah's troubles appear to have begun when he attempted to circumvent election laws by reimbursing friends, business contacts and their family members for contributions made in their names, according to court records. Federal statutes set limits on contributions to federal campaigns and political action committees and bar donations made in the names of others.

Authorities say that from June 2004 to February 2005, Jinnah directly or indirectly solicited contributions from more than a dozen "conduits," reimbursing them with funds from his company, All American Distributing, a seller of cellphone service and accessories.

Authorities said the scheme allowed Jinnah to get around limits then in effect on individual donors of $5,000 per year to PACs and $2,000 per election to candidates, as well as the ban on using corporate money for political donations.

Jinnah's case has been handled with discretion by the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles, which recently lost a high-profile case against former Clinton campaign official David Rosen. Rosen was acquitted of charges of filing false reports about a Hollywood fundraiser given for Clinton in 2000.

The indictment of Jinnah, handed down in May without a news release, mentions only the initials of the committees that received the illegal donations, referring to them as "HP" and "FB." However, the charging document filed against Stuart Schoenburg, who authorities say is a co-conspirator, identifies one of the committees as HillPac, the leadership committee Clinton formed after her first Senate campaign and which she still uses.

Though Clinton cannot use HillPac to fund her presidential campaign directly, it has allowed her to donate to Democratic candidates and organizations, as well as to pay some political staff and travel expenses.

The Times was able to identify donations to Boxer's campaign by cross-referencing dates and contributors' initials listed in the indictment with campaign finance records. The "FB" in the indictment stood for "Friends of Barbara Boxer."

According to the indictment, Jinnah arranged $30,000 in donations to HillPac by having Schoenburg, a Tarzana television producer, approach family members and others to act as straw donors.

Schoenburg and five others contributed $5,000 apiece. Jinnah later reimbursed them with funds from his corporation, prosecutors say. In one instance, authorities allege, Jinnah and Schoenburg agreed to write "production" in a reimbursement check's memo line, falsely indicating it was payment for production services.

"The campaign clearly had no knowledge of these activities," said Howard Wolfson, a spokesman for Clinton.

He said HillPac would not keep the contributions cited in the indictment, as well as others from Jinnah and his family.

The indictment says Jinnah also found 14 straw donors to give $28,000 to the 2004 reelection campaign of Boxer (D-Calif.). Among the contributors were five employees of Jinnah's company, Schoenburg and several members of Schoenburg's family, records show.

Schoenburg, 76, pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor count of conspiracy in July. Contacted this week, he said he would not comment on the case. "My attorney told me not to talk to you," he said. His sentencing is scheduled for Monday, but his attorney said it was likely to be postponed.

Rose Kapolczynski, a consultant who ran Boxer's 2004 campaign, said no one on Boxer's staff knew of Jinnah's indictment or the illegal contributions.

"We were very surprised," she said, adding that neither the FBI nor the Justice Department had requested information from the campaign for the case.

Jinnah hosted or co-hosted two fundraisers for Boxer, she acknowledged.

In addition to the donations cited in the indictment, Boxer will also give away $8,000 contributed by Jinnah and his relatives, either to charity or the U.S. Treasury, Kapolczynski said.

Pakistani Americans are relatively new players in U.S. politics, not nearly as organized or affluent as Indian Americans, who often are on the opposite side of the same international issues.

In early 2000, a controversy erupted when a group of Pakistani Americans hosted a $50,000 fundraiser for Hillary Clinton as President Clinton was deciding whether to visit Pakistan on a Southeast Asia trip. The Clintons denied the contributions swayed the decision to make the stop.

Later that year, Jinnah hosted a luncheon fundraiser for then-First Lady Clinton at his house, an event depicted in a photo posted on the website Pakistanlink.com. Jinnah hosted a second fundraiser for Clinton in October 2004.

That year, he also helped form the Pakistani American Leadership Center, which describes itself as a coalition of Pakistani Americans seeking to further U.S.-Pakistan ties. It has helped persuade more than 70 House members to join the Congressional Pakistan Caucus.

The group was particularly jubilant when Rep. Howard L. Berman (D-Valley Village), who had previously sponsored a bill targeting Pakistan for sanctions related to its nuclear program, agreed to become a member.

Jinnah met with Berman and then issued a statement welcoming the congressman to "a new and hopefully long-term relationship with the Pakistani American community."

Jinnah has been substantially less active in the last year, however. A spokesman for the leadership center said Jinnah had not attended group events since mid-2005 and had not paid his board dues for the year.

Jinnah, who is married with at least two children, has owned a string of businesses in Southern California since at least 1990, including frozen yogurt shops as well as cellphone-related enterprises. As a legal permanent resident, though not a U.S. citizen, he can make campaign contributions here.

In September, after his indictment, Jinnah put his latest company — Advanced Communication Technology Inc., which did business as All American Distributing — into Chapter 7 bankruptcy.

Most cases involving issues of campaign finance errors or improprieties are handled civilly by the Federal Election Commission, rather than criminally by the Justice Department. Spokesman Thom Mrozek said he could not comment on how the U.S. attorney's office came to investigate Jinnah.

Obama Calls Iran Threat To U.S., Israel (CHIT)

By John McCormick

Chicago Tribune, March 3, 2007

Seeking to woo Jewish votes and contributions, Sen. Barack Obama told an audience in Chicago Friday that he considers Iran "one of the greatest threats to the United States, Israel and world peace" and pledged he would try to end that nation's uranium enrichment program.

As he criticized the Bush administration's Iraq policies, the Democratic presidential candidate suggested that the danger posed by neighboring Iran has grown in recent years because of U.S. policy in the Middle East.

"One of the most profound consequences of the administration's failed strategy in Iraq has been to strengthen Iran's strategic position, reduce U.S. credibility and influence in the region, and place Israel and other nations friendly to the United States in greater peril," Obama (D-Ill.) said before a regional gathering of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, a major pro-Israel lobbying group.

In advance of the group's national conference later this month in Washington, where Obama will court donors one-on-one, his campaign had been looking for a friendly audience to make a major policy speech on U.S.-Israel policy.

By speaking to about 800 of the committee's members at the Sheraton Chicago Hotel & Towers, Obama was able to reaffirm his support of Israel, as voters consider the early presidential field. Democratic front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) made a similar speech to the group's members in her home state on Feb. 1.

Despite the eagerness of local news crews for him to comment on the topic, Obama made no mention of a revelation reported Friday by the Baltimore Sun that he has white ancestors who owned slaves. A spokesman also said he would not be taking any media questions.

Racial issues will again be at the forefront Sunday, as the senator appears in Alabama to deliver the keynote address at an event that commemorates the 1965 Selma-to-Montgomery voting rights march, an occasion that will also attract Clinton and her husband, the nation's 42nd president. Before his departure, Obama will headline a major labor rally in Chicago Saturday morning.

Like labor, the Jewish community is an essential constituency for any Democrat running for the White House.

John Green, a senior fellow with the Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life, said research suggests it is not uncommon for Jews to represent as much as 20 percent of the donors in a presidential primary.

"Jews are strong Democrats as a group and are a very important source of money for presidential candidates," he said. "This is a pretty significant financial constituency."

Green said Jews represent only small part of the total electorate, but can also play a key role in swing states such as Florida. "In a close election, this is a critical bloc," he said.

Although Green said Obama might struggle to differentiate himself from Clinton on social issues, his early opposition to the war in Iraq could help.

"Jews are particularly opposed to President Bush's positions in Iraq," he said. "She has had a little bit of a different policy position on the war in Iraq and that is a place where he could distinguish himself from her."

Rabbi Ira Youdovin, executive vice president of the Chicago Board of Rabbis, said some Jews were initially supportive of efforts to remove Saddam Hussein when reports of weapons of mass destruction were credible and Israel could be a target. "Today, there is far less approval and a sense that maybe the war wasn't a good idea," he said.

Josh Block, a spokesman for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, said Jewish voters lean mostly Democratic, but that the group is not monolithic in its support for the party.

"It requires nurturing," he said. "It can't be taken for granted."

In one of many lines that drew applause, Obama called for "fully funding military assistance" for Israel and continued work on missile defense programs. "And when Israel is attacked, we must stand up for Israel's legitimate right to defend itself," he said.

Obama focused much of his speech on Iran, but stressed the need for greater communication among all players in the region. "My plan includes a robust regional diplomatic strategy that includes talking to Syria and Iran — something this administration has finally embraced," he said.

Earlier this week, Obama also met with family members of kidnapped Israeli soldier Ehud Goldwasser in Washington.

Jeff Simon, a financial planner from Northbrook who attended the speech, said the senator hit all the right notes for his audience.

"He touched on all the key issues," he said. "He said the right things."

Obama Blames U.S. For Stronger Iran (AP)

AP, March 2, 2007

CHICAGO (AP) -- Democrat presidential candidate Barack Obama on Friday blamed Bush administration failings in Iraq for strengthening the strategic position of Iran, which he says must be stopped from acquiring nuclear weapons.

Illinois senator said that means "direct engagement" with Iran similar to the meetings with the Soviet Union at the height of the Cold War.

"A consequence of the Administration's failed strategy in Iraq has been to strengthen Iran's strategic position; reduce U.S. credibility and influence in the region; and place Israel and other nations friendly to the United States in greater peril," according to a text of a speech Obama delivered to the American Israel Public Affairs Committee.

The Bush administration recently altered its position, with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice saying this week that the U.S. is willing to talk to Iran on security in Iraq.

Obama also emphasized in his speech his commitment to protecting the security of Israel, which he called "our strongest ally in the region and its only established democracy."

"Our job is to renew the United States' efforts to help Israel achieve peace with its neighbors while remaining vigilant against those who do share this vision," Obama said.

The speech was the second time in recent months that Obama has formally addressed foreign policy in his hometown of Chicago. In November, Obama called for a reduction of U.S. forces in Iraq at the Chicago Council on Global Affairs.

But Obama focused on Iran Friday, calling President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's regime "a threat to all of us."

A member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Obama said the world _ not just the United States _ must stop Iran's uranium enrichment program.

"While we should take no option, including military action, off the table, sustained and aggressive diplomacy combined with tough sanctions should be our primary means to prevent Iran from building nuclear weapons," Obama said.

Obama said Iranian nuclear weapons would destabilize the region and could set off a new arms race.

Fellow senator and Democratic rival Hillary Rodham Clinton has warned Bush not to take any military action against Iran without congressional OK.

DOJ_NMG_0140252

Iran has refused to freeze its enrichment-related activities and the U.N. Security Council has imposed sanctions targeting its nuclear and missile programs and persons involved in them.

Iran has refused to halt its nuclear program, contending it is to provide energy _ not weapons _ for the country.

Obama Had Slaveowning Kin (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 2 — Genealogists have uncovered a new ingredient in the melting pot identity of Senator Barack Obama, the Illinois Democrat who hopes to become the first black president. His white maternal ancestors once owned slaves.

Mr. Obama is the American-born son of a white woman from Kansas and a black man from Kenya. The genealogists, led by William Addams Reitwiesner, studied the family history of Mr. Obama's mother and determined that Mr. Obama's great-great-great-great grandfather, George Washington Overall, owned two slaves listed in the 1850 census in Nelson County, Ky.

Mr. Obama's great-great-great-great-great grandmother, Mary Duval, also owned two slaves, the records show.

Mr. Reitwiesner, who works for the Library of Congress, posted the information on his personal Web site a while ago, said a genealogist who worked with him. The Baltimore Sun reported the findings on Friday.

The details emerged the same week that the Rev. Al Sharpton disclosed that his great-grandfather was owned by a relative of Senator Strom Thurmond of South Carolina, once a defender of segregation.

Historians said the disclosures highlighted the deep, though often unknown and unacknowledged, imprint of slavery in the lives of present-day Americans.

Bill Burton, a spokesman for Mr. Obama, said the senator had long known that he was related to Jefferson Davis, president of the Confederacy, and that another forebear had fought for the Union in the Civil War. Mr. Burton said the findings showed Mr. Obama's ancestors were "representative of America."

"It is a true measure of progress that the descendant of a slave owner would come to marry a student from Kenya and produce a son who would grow up to be a candidate for president of the United States," Mr. Burton said.

Where's His Right Hook? (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

As I sit across from Barack Obama in his Senate office, I feel like Ingrid Bergman in "The Bells of St. Mary's," when she plays a nun who teaches a schoolboy who's being bullied how to box.

I'm just not certain, having watched the fresh-faced senator shy away from fighting with the feral Hillary over her Hollywood turf, that he understands that a campaign is inherently a conflict.

The Democrats lost the last two excruciatingly close elections because Al Gore and John Kerry did not fight fiercely and cleverly enough.

After David Geffen made critical comments about Hillary, she seized the chance to play Godzilla stomping on Obambi.

As a woman, she clearly feels she must be aggressive in showing she can "deck" opponents, as she put it — whether it's Saddam with her war resolution vote or Senator Obama when he encroaches on areas that she and Bill had presumed were wrapped up, like Hollywood and now the black vote.

If Hillary is in touch with her masculine side, Barry is in touch with his feminine side.

He turned up his nose at his campaign's sharp response to Hillary and her pinstriped thug, Howard Wolfson. He told The Times's Jeff Zeleny that he had not been engaged in the vituperative exchange because he was traveling on a red-eye flight, getting a haircut and taking his daughters to school.

I ask why he couldn't have managed the donnybrook while he traveled and did errands. Since he's sitting across from me using his BlackBerry, I wonder: "Where was your BlackBerry? Did your aides not ask you how to respond or did you not want to ride herd on them — even just to tell them to ignore Hillary?"

"Look, I came up through politics in Chicago," he says. "When I arrived in Chicago in 1985, I didn't know a single person. Seventeen years later, I was the United States senator and in a position to run for president. So I must know a little something about politics."

Channeling Ingrid, I press on and say: "I know you want to run a high-minded campaign, but do you worry that you might be putting yourself on a pedestal too much? Because people also want to see you mix it up a little. That's how they judge how you'd be with Putin."

"When I get into a tussle," he replies, "I want it to be over something real, not something manufactured. If someone wants to get in an argument with me, let's argue about how we're going to fix the health care system or where we need to go on Iraq."

If campaigns follow the arc of the hero myth. ...

"What's the demon that I've slain?" he finishes. "You're getting kind of deep on me here. I think that, for me, the story was overcoming a father's absence and reconciling the different strands of my background and coming out whole."

Has he ever been struck by the similiarity of Bill Clinton's growing up without his father?

"You don't want to go on with too much pop psychology," he replies. "Somebody said that every man is either trying to live up to his father's expectations or trying to make up for his father's mistakes. And in some ways, when your father's not there, you're doing both. You try to live up to the expectations of somebody who's not present to tell you that you've done a good job, but you're also trying to make up for the mistakes that partially led to his absence."

Does Al Gore have first dibs on the presidency?

"I love Al Gore," he replies. "He's a smart guy." He said he liked Mr. Gore's seriousness on issues he cares deeply about. "This sounds clichéd, but this week I had five mothers of folks headed to Iraq cry during rope lines where I was shaking hands and had me hug 'em. This stuff is just not a game. ... Now that doesn't mean that there's not the basic blocking and tackling of politics. I've got to raise money. I've got to manage my press. We've got to respond rapidly to attacks. But what I don't want to do is get drawn into the sport of it."

When the Tiger Woods of politics goes to a civil rights commemoration in Selma, Ala., this weekend — just as the story breaks that his white ancestors had slaves — he will compete for attention with Hillary and the man billed as the first black president. How does he feel about the Clintons double-teaming him?

Talking about the woman he described at the Beverly Hills fund-raiser as smarter, better-looking and meaner then he is, he grins: "My wife's pretty tough."

Dodd Urges Opponents To Attend NH Debate (NHUL)

New Hampshire Union Leader, March 3, 2007

Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., yesterday urged all his opponents for the Democratic Presidential nomination to participate in the April 5 political debate in Manchester.

"New Hampshire voters deserve a chance to see Presidential candidates on one stage answering tough questions," said Beneva Schulte, communications director for Dodd.

"If it's not too early in the campaign season for candidates to host million dollar fundraisers, it's not too early to debate the issues."

While several Democratic hopefuls have committed to participating in the debate, Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York and Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois have not.

The debate will be co-sponsored by the New Hampshire Union Leader, CNN and WMUR-TV.

Vilsack Says Early Polls Didn't Show His Strength (DMR)

By Thomas Beaumont

Des Moines Register, March 3, 2007

Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack criticized public opinion polls Friday and said his presidential campaign was running stronger in Iowa than early surveys reflected before he gave up his bid for the 2008 Democratic nomination a week ago.

"I don't want to sound like sour grapes, but you should not pay attention to early polls," Vilsack said during taping of "Iowa Press," a public affairs program on Iowa Public Television.

"Iowa polls are not accurate in terms of caucus support," he added, saying that polls sponsored by news organizations do not screen for the small audience of Democratic Party activists who plan to attend their precinct caucuses.

The caucuses are scheduled to launch the sequence of nominating contests next year. Polls in Iowa showed Vilsack, who said he would win his state's pivotal nominating contest, trailing the field's nationally known candidates.

"We were absolutely convinced, and I remain convinced and will as long as I live, that I would have won the Iowa caucuses based on the information that we had that is legitimate," he added.

Vilsack insisted it was his inability to raise money that forced him from the race, not the difficulty of breaking through the buzz surrounding his better known peers, New York Sen. Hillary Clinton, former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama.

Vilsack had trailed Edwards, who has remained popular among Iowa Democrats since his second-place finish in the 2004 caucuses. Vilsack also had trailed Obama and Clinton in most polls, albeit closely.

Some polls are faulty, but it's wrong to paint all of them as imprecise, Des Moines pollster Ann Selzer said.

"Many polls are out there making headlines without a lot of discipline in their method to nail down the people who will show up on caucus night or vote in a primary. But not all polls are bad," said Selzer, who conducts The Des Moines Register's Iowa Poll and contracts with other newspapers. "I've seen several polls in Iowa with decent sampling, and not one says Tom Vilsack had a good shot to take Iowa on caucus night."

Vilsack said he planned to meet with several of his former competitors in the coming weeks. Clinton, Edwards and Obama have trips planned within the next 10 days. New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson was planning to campaign in Iowa today and Saturday, having announced his candidacy in January. Likewise, Delaware Sen. Joseph Biden was planning to campaign in Iowa in early March.

Vilsack said he is most concerned with closing down his campaign, helping former staff members find work, and paying off a campaign debt. But as January approaches, he said he would look closely at the candidates with an eye toward making an endorsement.

"I think the chances are good that I'll do that, but I don't know that for certain," he said.

Vilsack also dismissed the idea that he planned to run for U.S. Senate. The former two-term governor, state senator and Mount Pleasant mayor has often said he had no interest in returning to a career as a legislator.

"I'm more of an executive kind of guy," he said.

U.S. And Brazil Seek To Promote Ethanol In West (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews, Larry Rohter

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 2 — President Bush, hoping to reduce demand for oil in the Western Hemisphere, is preparing to finish an agreement with Brazil next week to promote the production and use of ethanol throughout Latin America and the Caribbean, according to administration officials.

The agreement could lead to substantial growth in the ethanol industry in Brazil as technology and manufacturing equipment developed there is exported to other countries in the region.

Much of the ethanol produced there is made from sugar cane and is far cheaper to produce than the corn-based ethanol that has been nurtured by protective tariffs and government mandates in the United States.

But the agreement has already begun to prompt complaints from politicians from corn-producing regions of the United States. They fear that the plan would lead to an increase in imports of cheap foreign ethanol and undercut American producers.

By increasing ethanol production and consumption, particularly in countries that produce sugar, officials of the Bush administration hope to reduce the region's overall dependence on foreign oil and to take some of the pressure off oil prices.

As a side effect, American officials contend, the program could also reduce the influence of Hugo Chavez, the president of oil-rich Venezuela.

Mr. Bush is scheduled to meet in São Paulo next week with Brazil's president, Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva.

Administration officials are hoping to complete a memorandum of understanding that calls for cooperation between the countries on research and common standards for biofuels, as well as on helping other countries replicate Brazil's expertise in producing ethanol from sugar.

The agreement is largely a framework and provides few details, according to administration officials who have been briefed on the agreement but who spoke on condition of anonymity because it has not yet been completed.

Government officials in Brazil confirmed the agreement. Senior Brazilian government officials said the most important effect of a collaboration with the United States would be in promoting a broader international market for Brazilian ethanol technology.

Brazil and the United States account for a total of more than 70 percent of global ethanol production. The agreement is aimed at encouraging other countries, especially small and poor sugar cane producing countries in the Caribbean and Central America, to become producers.

"This is more than a document, it's a point of convergence in the relationship that is denser and more intense than anything we've seen in the last 20 or 30 years," Antonio Simões, the director of the energy division of the Foreign Ministry of Brazil, said in a telephone interview from New York. "Brazil will profit, the United States will profit, and so will third countries. It's a win-win situation for everyone involved."

"The good thing is that a poor country can reduce what it pays for imported oil and earn money exporting this," Mr. Simões said. "That way they will have more money to invest in social programs, and the production of energy will be democratized in the world, with 100 countries producing energy instead of just 15 or 20."

Eventually, the two countries hope to use their accord to spur production of renewable fuels beyond the hemisphere. Brazil is interested in encouraging sugar-cane-based ethanol production in Africa, where it has extensive trade and cultural ties, and in Asian nations like Thailand.

Brazil's own direct exports of ethanol reached a record last year. But demand for the fuel is growing so rapidly within Brazil that the government's immediate priority is to satisfy its domestic market.

But Brazilian business groups see commercial opportunities in supplying advanced equipment to other countries setting up their own ethanol distilleries.

"We want ethanol to become a global commodity, and for that to happen, Brazil can't be the only producer," said José Luiz Oliverio, vice president for operations at Dedini Industries, Brazil's leading manufacturer of equipment for sugar cane and ethanol mills. "We've been growing and processing sugar for 500 years, and we are confident of our ability to maintain our leadership in this sector."

American officials expressed a similar enthusiasm for making ethanol and ethanol-producing equipment on a huge scale. The biggest area of cooperation, they said, will be in helping countries identify and remove obstacles to building their own ethanol production capacity.

Mindful of protests from domestic ethanol producers and from the powerful American farm lobby, administration officials are not expected to even hint at a reduction in American tariffs on foreign ethanol.

Nor does the administration appear ready to offer money or loan guarantees for construction of ethanol plants in other countries.

In a letter to President Bush on Thursday, Senator Charles Grassley, Republican of Iowa, said he failed to understand "why the United States would consider spending U.S. taxpayer dollars to encourage new ethanol production in other countries."

The proposed partnership, Mr. Grassley warned, could become a backdoor way for Brazil to escape the tariff on imported ethanol that currently insulates American producers.

The United States imposes a tariff of 54 cents a gallon on imported ethanol, but Caribbean nations and countries in the Central American Free Trade Agreement are exempt from those duties if they make the ethanol from products grown in their own countries. Using Brazilian technology for refining sugar-cane-based ethanol, such countries could in time become exporters to the United States.

In addition, Caribbean nations can export a limited amount of ethanol that comes indirectly from Brazil and other countries. Under the Caribbean Basin Initiative, which has been in force for years, countries can take partly processed ethanol from a country like Brazil and carry out the last step in processing before shipping it to the United States. But the region is allowed to export that kind of ethanol only up to a limit of 7 percent of United States' ethanol consumption.

Last year, the United States imported about 600 million gallons of ethanol, and about 200 million gallons came indirectly from Brazil through the Caribbean, according to Robert Dineen, president of the Renewable Fuels Association, a trade group that represents ethanol producers. The total imports of all kinds of ethanol amounted to slightly more than 10 percent of American consumption last year.

For the moment, American ethanol producers are watching warily but not protesting.

"I don't believe the fundamental objective of the administration is to produce ethanol in the Caribbean for export to the United States," Mr. Dineen said. But, he added, American companies will be watching to see if the initiative becomes "the camel's nose under the tent."

U.S. Ready To Release N. Korean Assets (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, March 3, 2007

The United States will soon recommend releasing a significant amount of frozen North Korean bank accounts, officials say, which diplomats hope will keep North Korea from reneging on its pledge to scrap nuclear weapons.

The Treasury Department could announce as soon as next week that several million dollars connected to North Korea are not tainted by links to rogue nuclear proliferation or allegations of counterfeiting, smuggling and other crimes.

The U.S. move is expected to prompt overseas bank regulators to unfreeze between $8 million and $12 million from about $24 million in blocked assets, one official said.

Treasury and State Department officials spoke on condition of anonymity to describe results of an ongoing Treasury review.

Although the amount of money is relatively small, the frozen accounts became an unexpectedly large stumbling block in troubled nuclear negotiations with Pyongyang. The move was an affront to the secretive communist regime, and it had a devastating ripple effect that further estranged North Korea from the global banking system.

North Korea pointed to what it called unfair U.S. sanctions as a reason to boycott disarmament talks for more than a year. The restrictions were still a sore point when the North did return to talks in December. The North Korean negotiator refused to discuss the country's weapons until Washington budged.

An agreement to resolve the matter within 30 days was key to a potential breakthrough deal that the North struck Feb. 13 with the United States and four other nations.

The money is held by a blacklisted bank in Macau that North Korea accuses of complicity in counterfeiting and money laundering. A Treasury Department delegation was in Macau, a semiautonomous territory of China, this week to discuss results of the department's 18-month review of the Banco Delta Asia accounts.

"We intend to handle this matter in a straightforward way based on the evidence and the law," Treasury Undersecretary Stuart Levey said Friday. "As we have always said, the designation of Banco Delta Asia as a primary money laundering concern is separate from the nuclear talks."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other diplomats had also said the financial restrictions were a law enforcement matter that should not affect the nuclear negotiations, but it was clear even before the Feb. 13 deal that one issue could not be resolved without the other.

"They've gathered a real mountain of information," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Wednesday. "They've gone through it ... and I expect in the coming period of time the Treasury will be addressing the issue of how they have resolved the issue related to Banco Delta Asia."

Washington slapped restrictions on Banco Delta Asia in 2005 and put it on a money-laundering blacklist, prompting Macau to freeze the $24 million. Banks worldwide then shunned North Korean business for fear of losing access to American markets.

Banco Delta Asia has said money might have been laundered at the bank, but there was no evidence the institution was aware it was being used for that purpose. It said it was a small, family owned bank that didn't have the technology to check big batches of U.S. currency for fake bills.

The bank also said it used a dated computer system and it didn't pay enough attention to maintaining its own books. It also has said the bank didn't have adequate written anti-money-laundering policies for its staff.

South Korea's foreign minister met with Rice and other senior U.S. officials Friday at a crucial moment in North Korean disarmament efforts. The North said in the February accord that, in exchange for aid, it would close its main nuclear reactor within 60 days. A much larger shipment of aid — about $250 million worth — would follow once the North had declared all its nuclear programs and begun to disable them.

As part of the nuclear agreement, on Monday and Tuesday in New York, the lead U.S. envoy at the nuclear talks, Christopher Hill, and his North Korean negotiating counterpart, Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Gwan, are to discuss first steps toward establishing normal ties after decades of hostility that followed the 1950-53 Korean War. Kim arrived in New York Friday night from San Francisco, where he held private talks with a number of Asian experts.

Seoul Wants No Trace Of Nukes (WT)

By David R. Sands, Andrew Salmon

The Washington Times, March 3, 2007

South Korea's foreign minister said yesterday that North Korea must abandon all aspects of its nuclear endeavors, including a suspected uranium enrichment program, as part of a deal to solve the peninsula's nuclear crisis, even if the program has barely gotten off the ground.

Song Min-soon, Seoul's minister for foreign affairs and trade, sidestepped new questions over the state of Pyongyang's uranium-enrichment program, the key charge in the Bush administration's case that the North had violated past agreements to halt its nuclear weapons programs.

"Whether [the uranium program] is just a single piece of paper or actual, tangible facilities, all these efforts should be abolished in the course of implementing" the six-nation deal reached Feb. 13 to end the North's nuclear programs, Mr. Song said on a visit to Washington.

The South Korean envoy made the comment just before a meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in which the recent North Korea nuclear deal reached Feb. 13 in Beijing was a prime topic of conversation.

The latest nuclear crisis on the divided Korean Peninsula dates back to 2002, when Bush administration officials said the North admitted it was secretly enriching uranium even as it suspended a parallel plutonium program to make nuclear bombs. The North has denied it made the admission, and U.S. intelligence officials now say they do not know the scope of the North's uranium programs.

In Pyongyang yesterday, officials from the North and South agreed to work on the first phases of the Feb. 13 accord, as well as on reuniting divided families, testing a pan-Korean rail link and preparing new shipments of aid to the North.

"The South and the North will work jointly to ensure a sound implementation of the agreement on denuclearizing and peace on the Korean Peninsula," the two sides said in a joint statement issued after four days of ministerial-level talks.

The Beijing deal calls for a phased end to all the North's nuclear programs in return for aid, energy and the prospect of full diplomatic relations with the United States and countries in the region.

But South Korean officials yesterday refused to restore full aid shipments until the North's main nuclear reactor facility had been shut down. Seoul suspended aid after the North's missile tests last summer, and Pyongyang responded by cutting diplomatic contacts and meetings of divided families.

The South agreed verbally to provide the North with rice and fertilizer, but did not specify the date of delivery or the amount to be shipped.

"We plan to provide rice and fertilizer at the level of previous years," South Korean Unification Minister Lee Jae-joung told reporters, "but we will do it in stages, following the necessary process."

In Washington, Mr. Song said he planned to coordinate closely with Washington as the nuclear deal moves ahead.

Some U.S. conservatives have criticized the deal, saying the North will pocket the promised aid and renege again on promises to end its nuclear programs. But Mr. Song said "speculation" about whether Pyongyang could be trusted was "rather futile," and the key will be convincing the North that its own best interests lie in denuclearization.

"Showing North Korea that the clouds hovering over it have a silver lining will help dispel its sense of insecurity so it may breathe comfortably in its nuclear-free future," he said. "In this case security is a subjective state of mind rather than an objective condition of being."

The International Atomic Energy Agency, the United Nations' nuclear watchdog, said yesterday its director, Mohamed ElBaradei, would be making a two-day visit to Pyongyang starting March 13 -- five years after the North expelled IAEA inspectors and resumed plutonium production for nuclear bombs.

The North's chief negotiator is also in the United States, preparing for unprecedented talks next week with U.S. officials on the opening of diplomatic relations. The talks are expected to take place next week.

•Andrew Salmon reported from Seoul.

S. Korea Refuses North's Request For Restored Aid (WP/AP)

SEOUL, March 2 -- South Korea on Friday added pressure on North Korea to comply with an international disarmament agreement, refusing the impoverished nation's demand to restore full aid shipments until after its main nuclear reactor is shut down.

At the first high-level talks between the two Koreas since the North's underground nuclear test in October, the communist nation "agreed to make joint efforts for a smooth implementation" of its pledge last month to take initial steps toward dismantling its atomic program, according to a final statement.

The North and South also agreed to resume family reunions of relatives split by their border and planned test runs of railway lines between the countries.

North Korea and the International Atomic Energy Agency have agreed on March 13 as the starting date for a two-day visit by the agency's chief, Mohamed ElBaradei, U.N. officials said Friday. The officials asked for anonymity because they were not authorized to reveal specifics of the trip, which is expected to help alleviate some misgivings that the unpredictable regime might renege on its agreement to shut down its nuclear facilities.

This week's meetings in Pyongyang were part of the historic reconciliation launched between the Koreas since their leaders met in their first and only summit in 2000. The countries remain technically at war because the cease-fire that ended the 1950-53 Korean War has never been replaced by a peace treaty.

But attempts to bring the countries together have been complicated since 2002, when Washington accused North Korea of secret uranium enrichment efforts that the Bush administration said violated an earlier disarmament deal.

The situation deteriorated further last July when North Korea test-launched a series of missiles, prompting South Korea, one of the North's main sources of aid such as rice and fertilizer, to put the shipments on hold.

Relations worsened after North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear test. But a breakthrough came last month after a revival of six-nation nuclear negotiations -- including China, Japan, Russia, the United States and the two Koreas -- in which the North pledged to make moves toward abandoning its nuclear program.

Koreas Agree To Resume Reunions (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

South Korea and North Korea wrapped up high-level talks, agreeing to resume reunions of families separated by the Korean War and to test-run a cross-border train in the first half of this year. But the South said it would make a final decision on resuming humanitarian aid to the North only after Pyongyang began complying with the nuclear accord reached in the six-party talks last month and shutting down its main nuclear reactor. The North had pressed for an immediate resumption of aid during the ministerial talks, which resumed after a seven-month hiatus.

Pakistan Test-fires Short-range Missile (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0140259

Pakistan on Saturday successfully test-fired a short-range missile capable of carrying a nuclear warhead, the military said, two weeks ahead of peace talks with archrival neighboring India.

The launch of the Haft-II Abdali missile, which has a range of 120 miles, was conducted from an unspecified location inside Pakistan, the military said.

The Abdali is considered capable of being fitted with a nuclear warhead.

Pakistan and India have fought three wars since gaining independence from Britain in 1947. The two South Asian nuclear-armed nations often carry out missile tests.

India became a declared atomic power in 1974, while Pakistan carried out underground nuclear tests in 1998.

Relations between Pakistan and India have improved, however, since they began a peace process in 2004 to resolve all their issues, including Kashmir.

They will hold the fourth round of peace talks in Islamabad March 13-14.

Qaddafi Heralds A Changing Libya, But Within Limits (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

SEBHA, Libya, March 2 — Col. Muammar el-Qaddafi had just spent two hours on Friday arguing that Libya's form of government was the truest democracy, when the call went out to a small group of foreign correspondents for questions.

This correspondent asked how democracy was compatible with a system that puts so much power in one man's hands.

Colonel Qaddafi's aides looked alarmed. The question was not translated and the event was over.

After decades of international isolation, Libya may be changing. But there are very clear limits.

A slightly newer and perhaps mellower version of Colonel Qaddafi was on display on Friday for the correspondents, as part of the celebration of the 30th anniversary of the system of government he instituted.

The man who once banned everything from Western music to teaching English in schools, who was condemned by Washington for support of terrorism, spoke of opening Libya to the world. "Undoubtedly Libya is part of this changing world dominated by globalization," he said during the discussion, itself a rarity. "Libya is riding this wave, taking this and that. Libya cannot row against the current."

Those are revolutionary words for a man who seized power in a coup 37 years ago. Seven years later, he announced the Declaration of the People's Authority, the foundation for a system that was designed to have every Libyan adult involved in governance of the nation through committee meetings.

Colonel Qaddafi is the same eccentric figure as always, dressed in elaborate Libyan robes jazzed up with striking colors and a modern flair. He still offers unusual ideas, like when he said all the nations of the world would someday meld into seven or eight blocs, and that all formal governments, parliaments, ministries and militaries would be dissolved. Only then, he said, would there be world peace.

Or when asked about women's rights. He said that women and men should have the same rights, but that women should not be made to do men's work because they are biologically different.

"If you say they are equal in rights and responsibilities, that's unfair for both," he said. "Do women have to be train drivers? Why do we let women have jobs that turn them into men? A pregnant woman or a breast-feeding woman, how can she drive the train or work in a factory? Unless we want to change them into men, they have different biological composition that doesn't allow them to take responsibilities of men."

In his 60s, Colonel Qaddafi comes across as a man thinking about his legacy, and how to retool a system of governance that has failed to adequately administer the state. Though it is the richest in North Africa because of its oil reserves, its schools, hospitals and infrastructure are in serious disrepair, according to consultants brought in to study the country and draft a plan for change.

So Colonel Qaddafi has begun to take steps that by all accounts were unthinkable just a few years ago. The discussion with him here, led by the television interviewer David Frost and including Western academics, was one such event. Colonel Qaddafi has rarely agreed to sit with a group of Western journalists.

He maintained a quiet, almost distant composure through much of the discussion. Occasionally he picked up a pen and jotted down notes, but he mostly spoke in a low voice. What has not changed, and what he made clear, is the core of what he believes.

The problem in Libya, he said, is not with his ideas, but with their implementation. He said it took many years for people to learn the duties and responsibilities of self-rule.

In his philosophy, people should rule themselves, not select, or elect, the people to rule them. He said he modeled his ideas after the way ancient Athens was governed, with collective meetings and unanimous participation. In the past, Colonel Qaddafi has described his role as a guide, a steady hand leading his people while they learn the duties of his version of self-rule. The word dictator, strongman, or even president is never used. He is called Brother Leader.

During the discussion his role in building Libya's so-called democracy never came up. But the panelists did tell him that unlike ancient Athens, with just 20,000 citizens, ruling a country the size of Libya, with five million residents, would not work according to his vision.

Sir Anthony Giddens, a British sociologist, told him that Libya would be better off combining bits of representative democracy with individual democracy. But that was not an idea he seemed willing to accept.

The Libyan advocates of change and the outside consultants are careful to focus on the small signs of change — like the panel discussion itself. Until the event started, organizers said they were afraid it would be canceled by Colonel Qaddafi's team.

But it went off and therein was evidence, they said, of change.

"He actually engaged in a dialogue," one of the participants said after the event was over.

'No Reward' For Non-nuclear Libya (BBC)

BBC.com, March 2, 2007

Libyan leader Muammar Gaddafi has said his country has not been given adequate compensation for its decision to renounce nuclear weapons in 2003.

Speaking to the BBC, Colonel Gaddafi said the failure by the West to reward Libya meant Iran and North Korea were reluctant to follow Tripoli's lead.

He insisted there would be no return to the confrontation of the past, however.

Sanctions were lifted after Libya ended its nuclear weapons programme, and the US and UK have resumed diplomatic ties.

Libya was also removed from the US list of state sponsors of terror, a major step towards international rehabilitation.

Investment promise

However, Col Gaddafi says the West has not properly compensated his country because it has failed to transform its nuclear weapons programme into nuclear power.

Gaddafi: Libya 'let down' Speaking to BBC diplomatic correspondent James Robbins, Col Gaddafi said this meant the West had lost bargaining power with countries like Iran and North Korea.

"This should be a model to be followed, but Libya is disappointed because the promises given by America and Britain were not fulfilled," he said.

"And therefore those countries said 'we are not going to follow Libya's example because Libya abolished its programme without any compensation'."

Mr Gaddafi said that the US and Britain had a duty to help Libya develop civilian nuclear power plants.

"They said if you abolish your war programme we will help you to develop your nuclear abilities into peaceful ones. This has not happened."

Our correspondent says the Libyan leader may have been bargaining for foreign investment, but a return to hostility does not seem to be on the cards.

'International dictatorship'

Col Gaddafi spoke to the BBC as celebrations were taking place to mark the 30th anniversary of his declaration of Libya's unique system of "popular rule".

DOJ_NMG_0140261

He also held a rare public debate with Western scholars, in which he criticised the control that nations with military and economic power held over poorer countries.

It was a pragmatic desire to avoid being destroyed by the "international dictatorship" of such powers that had persuaded Libya to improve its relations with the world, he added.

Col Gaddafi's remarks come as six major powers - the US, Russia, China, the UK, France and Germany - discuss possible further sanctions against Iran over its refusal to halt its nuclear programme.

US officials have said ambassadors to the UN could begin drafting a new resolution on Iran next week.

Meanwhile, North Korea last month agreed at six-party talks to take the first steps towards nuclear disarmament, in return for economic and fuel aid.

Pressure to find a solution to the nuclear issue increased after Pyongyang conducted its first atomic test in October.

Sudan President Commits To Peacekeepers (AP)

By Alexandra Olson, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 3, 2007

Sudan's president is sending a letter to Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon expressing his commitment to the deployment of several thousand U.N. peacekeepers to help end the violence in Darfur, Sudan's U.N. envoy said Friday.

The deployment would be the second step of a three-stage U.N. plan that would culminate in a 22,000-strong joint UN-African Union peacekeeping mission.

Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir has given conflicting signals about his commitment to the plan, and Ban asked him earlier this year to state his acceptance of the second phase in writing.

Al-Bashir's letter expresses his commitment but also raises "issues of operational, technical and legal aspects" of the proposal, Sudanese Ambassador Abdalmahmood Abdalhaleem told The Associated Press. He declined to elaborate.

Sudan agreed to the initiative in November. Al-Bashir reiterated his commitment in a Dec. 23 letter to former U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan. But last month, al-Bashir said U.N. troops were not required in Darfur because the 7,000-member AU force on the ground could maintain order. The Sudanese president has insisted the AU force needs only technical and financial support from the U.N.

Abdalhaleem said Ban would be receiving the letter "at any moment." Ban's office said the secretary-general did not have the letter but was told al-Bashir had written it.

"Sudan of course is committed to the support by the U.N. to AMIS," Abdalhaleem said, referring to the AU force by its acronym.

On Friday, the U.S. State Department called on both Sudan and the United Nations to speed up the deployment of the full joint AU-UN force.

Spokesman Sean McCormack issued the appeal as U.S presidential envoy Andrew Natsios arrived in Sudan's capital, Khartoum, for a 10-day visit that will include stops in the western Darfur region and southern Sudan.

"We are pushing on the Sudanese — we as well as others — to make sure that those forces are able to deploy in the areas that they need to deploy to and push on the Sudanese to do everything that they can to stop the violence," McCormack said.

McCormack said the U.S. administration is not satisfied with the yearlong U.N. time frame for the deployment and that not enough countries are pledging troops for the mission.

"The timeline needs to be reduced," McCormack said. "This is too critical a humanitarian issue."

The first phase — a "light support" package adding some equipment, military officers and U.N. police to the AU operation — is nearly almost complete. The second phase is a "heavy support" package that includes the deployment of more than 3,000 U.N. military, police and civilian personnel.

Darfur's conflict erupted in 2003 when ethnic African rebels took up arms against the Arab-dominated central government, accusing it of neglect. More than 200,000 people have died and 2.5 million have fled their homes. The government is accused of unleashing militias known as the janjaweed, which are blamed for the bulk of the conflict's atrocities.

In a report Wednesday, Ban called on al-Bashir to "uphold his commitment" to the U.N.-AU peacekeeping plan.

He also urged countries to provide "urgent contributions of human resources and equipment" for the joint force and said the second phase would cost $287.9 million.

On Friday, European Union defense ministers offered support the joint mission. However, the EU has provided most of the financing for the AU force now in Darfur — some $530 million since 2004 — and the bloc's special peace support fund for Africa has run dry.

EU foreign ministers are expected to seek extra funding Monday from the EU aid budget and from the coffers of its 27 member governments.

Darfur Oil Seen As Curse Now, Blessing Later (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

While exploration may bring needed investment in Sudan, some say it only exacerbates the fighting

The Sudanese government is quietly escalating oil exploration inside the Darfur region, a step that has led to protests from rebel leaders in a volatile area where more than 200,000 people have been killed during three years of fighting.

Political and humanitarian experts say oil in Darfur could deliver much-needed development and investment to the region but that attempts to search for oil now may intensify the conflict by raising the stakes in an already war-torn area. The government has recently awarded three new oil concessions in the region.

Rebel leaders say oil exploration in Darfur should be postponed until a peace deal is signed by all parties and stability returns.

"We are still fighting for our lives and our country," said rebel commander Jar Neby, who represents a faction of the Sudan Liberation Army. "We need water right now, not oil. We can talk about these issues after peace comes."

Some political analysts believe that untapped oil reserves might have been an underlying factor in the Darfur conflict all along, explaining why a seemingly barren wasteland of western Sudan would spark such a bitter tug of war between government forces and rebels, eventually drawing the intervention of international players such as the United States, Libya and the United Nations.

"When you don't find a reasonable explanation, this is what you have to conclude," said Eltayeb Hag Ateya, head of the Peace Studies Institute at Khartoum University. "I believe there must be something else — oil or some natural resource — about Darfur."

Salih Osman, a human rights attorney from Darfur, said government suspicions about oil in Darfur explain why regime officials reacted so strongly to rebel attacks in the region, starting in 2003. "I fear this will only make matters worse," he said, referring to the newly expanded exploration.

The government is accused of arming Arab militias known as janjaweed to attack and destroy scores of Darfur villages over the last three years. Government officials deny supporting the janjaweed and blame rebels for the violence.

A team of Middle Eastern oil companies, including Saudi Arabia-based Al Qahtani Sons Group and Ansan Wikfs, based in Yemen, agreed in November to spend $43 million for drilling rights to 125,000 square miles. The largely uninhabited area, known as Block 12a, is north of where much of Darfur's fighting is occurring.

The government's decision to offer new concessions in Darfur is part of an aggressive search for oil in the northern part of the country.

Since discovering oil in the 1970s, Sudan has become one of Africa's biggest producers. But most of the current production — worth an estimated $6 billion a year — is in the south, and a 2005 peace agreement with former southern rebels gives Sudanese there the right to break away from the rest of the country in 2011, taking much of the oil with them.

DOJ_NMG_0140263

"There's a real scramble to find oil in the north," said a government oil official, who, like several others interviewed for this report, requested that his name be withheld because of the government's sensitivity about speaking publicly. "The likelihood that there is oil in Darfur is quite high."

The government awarded two smaller concessions east of Nyala, the capital of South Darfur state, to a Yemen-led joint venture. But attempts to find an investor for a concession encompassing much of the rest of North Darfur state have been complicated by the region's instability, officials said.

Due in part to U.S. investment sanctions imposed on Sudan in the 1990s, China National Petroleum Corp. is Sudan's biggest oil partner and purchases two-thirds of its oil. One of China's oil-producing concessions straddles Darfur, but officials said current production is occurring in the state of Western Kordofan, not in Darfur itself. Officials at China National declined to comment.

An oil industry consultant who works with several of Sudan's major oil companies, and who also spoke on condition of anonymity, said he believed that efforts to look for oil in Darfur are aggravating the conflict.

"The main reason behind Darfur is oil," he said. "This fighting in Darfur had been going on for generations. There is no other reason for this area to have blown like this."

Others are hopeful that oil might help resolve the region's crisis by bringing all sides together. The discovery of oil in southern Sudan eventually helped end the two-decade civil war when both sides realized that neither would be able to profit from the oil if fighting continued.

"They will see that it's better to share in the oil than to leave it for someone else," said Salah Wahbi, president of Advanced Petroleum Co., a Sudanese joint venture that has invested more than $30 million to explore in a southern Darfur oil concession. "Oil will bring a better life and will bring a better agreement."

Under a fragile peace accord signed by the government and one rebel group in May, Darfurians have the right to share in whatever oil wealth is discovered.

The increased exploration has not gone unnoticed by Darfur rebels. In late November, two rebel groups attacked a Chinese oil facility in Abu Gabra, located between the states of South Darfur and Western Kordofan, according to a United Nations report. Both rebels and government troops claimed victory in the clash.

U.S. officials have downplayed speculation about oil in Darfur. Andrew S. Natsios, the Bush administration's special envoy for Darfur, dismissed criticism by some Sudanese that the U.S. interests in Darfur might be linked to oil.

"We're unaware of any significant amount of oil in Darfur," Natsios told reporters recently. "It's a small amount down in the southeast corner."

Oil companies, however, have been expanding their exploration, despite security concerns that make drilling in Darfur dangerous. Wahbi, whose joint venture was the first to drill inside Darfur, said some parts of his territory, known as Block C, remain a no-go zone because of the fighting. The company recently got a government extension to conduct exploratory drilling because it has been unable to enter some areas.

"Our workers are foreign contractors, and we don't want to put them at risk," Wahbi said.

Before drilling, his company meets with local tribal leaders to explain their work, he said. To appease concerns, the company has built six water wells for local communities affected by the drilling and treated hundreds in the company's mobile health clinic.

The company started drilling in late 2004 and accelerated it in 2005 and 2006. So far, workers have hit only dry wells, but three wells recently showed evidence of oil in the past. Company engineers are now chasing the suspected path of the crude.

"Every day we are getting more information," Wahbi said. "We are getting closer." He noted that his concession is adjacent to some of Sudan's top-producing oil regions, controlled by China National and others.

Advanced Petroleum is unique among Sudan's oil ventures because it is the only concession that is owned entirely by Sudanese investors, including private companies and the state government in Khartoum. Previously, the joint venture included Swiss-based Cliveden Group, but the company sold its stake a year ago because of U.S. pressure over Darfur, Wahbi said.

Morocco To Present Sahara Autonomy Plan (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0140264

By John Thorne, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 3, 2007

Morocco will present an autonomy plan for Western Sahara to the United Nations next month in hopes of ending a three-decade conflict that has stranded 160,000 refugees in the Sahara, a top Moroccan official said Friday.

The plan would give the disputed region a parliament, a chief of state, Cabinet ministries and a judiciary that would oversee day-to-day life, said Khalihenna Ould Errachid, King Mohamed VI's chief adviser on the territory.

Morocco, which took control of Western Sahara in the 1970s after Spain pulled out, says autonomy is the only way to end a conflict with the Polisario Front, an Algerian-backed independence movement. It first proposed autonomy in 2000.

The Polisario Front, though, insists on holding a referendum on independence. Morocco says a vote would be unworkable.

The stalled conflict has left refugees in bleak camps in the Algerian Sahara, poisoned relations between Morocco and Algeria, and inflicts heavy costs on Morocco, already struggling with widespread poverty and unemployment.

Last fall, key members of the U.N. Security Council made clear they wanted real progress on Western Sahara before the U.N. mission's current mandate runs out on April 30. The autonomy plan is expected to be presented at the U.N. in April.

"We can stay at an impasse, or seek a middle way that leaves neither winners nor losers — and that's autonomy," Ould Errachid said Wednesday in the first of two interviews this week.

A Western Sahara parliament could create laws — as long as they do not violate Morocco's national law, while regional courts would fall under the Moroccan legal system, he said.

The regional government would oversee areas like education, tourism and social services. Morocco would retain control of foreign relations, defense, finance and border control, he said.

Western Sahara would also keep Morocco's flag, currency and stamps. King Mohamed VI would continue to be recognized as the highest religious authority in the land.

Morocco currently subsidizes life for Western Sahara's 50,000 to 90,000 Saharawis and 200,000 Moroccan settlers. Under autonomy, the territory will be expected to pay its own way, Ould Errachid said.

Western Sahara boasts phosphates, fisheries and possible offshore oil, but the territory's disputed status has prevented their full exploitation. Last year, the European Union signed a fishing deal with Morocco allowing European fisherman to fish Western Sahara's waters.

Morocco and Mauritania split Western Sahara after its Spanish colonizers ceded them the territory in 1975. Full-scale war with the Polisario Front broke out in 1976, and Morocco took over most of Western Sahara after Mauritania pulled out in 1979.

The U.N. has said it upholds the principle of self-determination and that any solution to Western Sahara must be accepted by both Morocco and Polisario.

The U.N. brokered a cease-fire in 1991 and installed a mission to pave the way for an independence referendum. Morocco refused a 2003 U.N. peace plan, accepted by Polisario, that envisaged temporary autonomy followed by a referendum in which both Saharawis and Moroccan settlers would vote.

Will Freedom Bloom In The Desert? (NYT)

Rome

A YEAR ago, unusually heavy rain storms destroyed half of the camps in Algeria where some 90,000 refugees from the disputed territory of the Western Sahara have been eking out a miserable existence for more than 30 years.

I have been involved in North African affairs for 40 years, and for most of that time the problem of the Western Sahara has envenomed relations among its neighbors and immiserated the Saharan population.

Thankfully, Morocco's young king, Mohammed VI, has devised a proposal for granting autonomous status to this region, and it behooves all members of the United Nations Security Council to support it. Here is a rare instance, in the post-9/11 world, in which a little encouragement from the United States and other nations could pay large dividends, fostering not only a final resolution for the region's refugees but also creating a stable North African peace for the first time in decades — a peace that would serve as a bulwark against Islamic extremism.

The Western Sahara, a Colorado-sized desert land on the Atlantic bordered by Algeria, Mauritania and Morocco, has deep roots in Moroccan history. It is here that the 11th-century Moroccans who founded the Andalusian empire, which stretched from Mauritania deep into Spain, originated.

Spain colonized the territory in 1884, then abandoned it in 1976. Around that time, thousands of unarmed Moroccans streamed into the Western Sahara and effectively reclaimed it for their homeland.

But neighboring Algeria helped create and then lent armed support to the Polisario Front, a guerrilla group that resisted Moroccan rule. The group's putative aim is independence for the Western Sahara, but it is worth noting that Algeria would gain a great deal by dominating an area with phosphate reserves and an Atlantic coastline.

For many years there was fierce fighting, from which tens of thousands of families fled, and eventually came under the care of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. Though the violence concluded with a United Nations-brokered cease-fire in 1991, the Western Sahara's inhabitants remain caught in the unresolved conflict. Almost a quarter of the 400,000 Saharans, or Sahrawis, are living under deplorable conditions in Algeria, generally unable to leave the refugee camps, communicate with the outside world or maintain their traditional nomadic way of life.

While Morocco exercises control over the greater part of the Western Sahara and has an "open door" policy toward the refugees, the Polisario has made it virtually impossible for those Sahrawis living in the camps in southern Algeria to return. Holding on to the refugees is their strategy for "governing" these people, who exist solely on international assistance. Particularly troubling is the fact that the younger ones have never known life outside these bleak camps.

Enter Mohammed VI. Since assuming the throne seven years ago, the Moroccan king has brought about vital domestic reforms, including elevating and protecting the status of women, as well as establishing an independent commission to face up to Morocco's human rights record. In an effort to advance the Western Sahara issue, the king studied contemporary models of territorial conflict resolution to see which solutions proved viable and durable in similar situations around the world. He created an advisory council to gather the views of both Moroccans and the Sahrawi.

The result? After a year-long national discussion, Morocco is to propose, at the United Nations in April, a plan to establish the Western Sahara as an autonomous region under Moroccan sovereignty. Autonomy would provide effective self-determination for the Sahrawis, allowing for local decision-making and control over economic, social, linguistic and cultural issues. Successful autonomy regions like this exist elsewhere. The Trentino-Alto Adige region in Italy and the autonomous region of Madeira in Portugal are examples, as are Catalonia and the Basque Provinces in Spain. The creation of these quasi-states has unlocked longstanding disputes once thought resolvable only by force.

Mohammed VI is seeking a solution to the Western Sahara dispute based on common ground rather than conflict. His act of leadership is in everyone's interest. It is no secret that the young people in these horrible camps are prey for recruitment by Al Qaeda and local terrorist groups. Indeed, Algeria's most murderous terrorist group recently renamed itself Al Qaeda of the Islamic Maghreb, signaling its wider designs on the region.

This is why it is vital that the Security Council accept Morocco's proposal for an autonomous region and not be pushed into a debate for full Western Saharan independence. A weak independent state would likely morph into a terrorist-controlled one.

This is also why the United States must be forthright in its support for the Moroccan proposal. We would be aiding a modernizing, moderate Islamic country, and a strategic ally. More urgently and no less important, we would be helping the Western Sahara's people to regain their lost liberties and their right to peaceful existence.

8 Sentenced In Morocco For Plotting Terror Attacks (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

PARIS, March 2 — A Moroccan court on Friday sentenced eight Islamists to prison terms of up to 15 years for plotting terrorist attacks in France, Italy and Morocco, the government news agency in Morocco reported.

DOJ_NMG_0140266

The eight included a Tunisian man, Muhammad Benhedi Msahel, who Moroccan prosecutors said was the leader of an Islamist cell in Milan with ties to North Africa's largest terrorist organization, the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat.

Counterterrorism officials point to Mr. Msahel as evidence that the Salafist Group is organizing militants across North Afric a to bring the remnants of Al Qaeda into a new international force for jihad. In January, the group changed its name to Al Qaeda of the Islamic Maghreb.

European counterterrorism officials in particular are worried about the group because it is within easy striking distance of the Continent. Last year its leader, Abdelmalek Droukdel, singled out France as a target for attacks. United States officials are concerned because American interests have also been designated as targets.

Mr. Msahel and his colleagues were arrested in March last year after the arrest in Morocco in late 2005 of Anour Majrar, who told interrogators that he had visited the Salafist Group's leaders in Algeria with Mr. Msahel and an Algerian man, Amir Laaraj, who is still at large.

Moroccan prosecutors charged Mr. Msahel and Mr. Majrar with being part of a terrorist network that was planning attacks on the Paris Metro, Orly Airport and the headquarters of France's domestic intelligence agency, as well as Milan's police headquarters and the Basilica of San Petronio in Bologna, whose 15th-century fresco depicts the Prophet Muhammad in hell.

More than a dozen people have been arrested in Algeria, France and Italy in connection with the case. Mr. Majrar was sentenced in February to seven years in prison. The people arrested in Algeria, Italy and France have yet to be tried.

Venezuela And Iran Strengthen Ties With Caracas-to-Tehran Flight (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela, March 2 — Iran is already Venezuela's closest ally outside Latin America, with ventures to produce oil and build cars and tractors together. Now, travelers between the countries can also take a weekly flight between Caracas and Tehran.

The flight, which was inaugurated here on Friday and includes a stop in Damascus, Syria, is operated in a code-share agreement by the Venezuelan state-controlled airline Conviasa and Iran's national carrier, Iran Air.

Officials at Conviasa said that the company would use a Boeing 747 on the route and that soon it would also make available a European-made Airbus 340.

Under President Hugo Chávez, Venezuela has tightened relations with Iran and expressed explicit support for its uranium enrichment program.

Mr. Chávez has also reached out to Syria, making plans to build a $1.5 billion oil refining complex there. He sees relations with Iran and Syria, both under United States sanctions, as a centerpiece of a foreign policy aimed at countering American influence around the world.

Mr. Chávez "is much loved in our country, and our people want to come here to get to know this land," Abdullah Zifan, Iran's ambassador to Venezuela, said when plans for the flight were announced last month.

Venezuela is considering extending its economic cooperation agreements to the military sphere. It is discussing a venture with Iran to produce remotely piloted aircraft that could be used for surveillance along the border with Colombia.

Iranian officials are already a staple of state television shows here, invited to discuss the country's array of agreements in Venezuela, including one to produce Peugeot-inspired Semand sedans at a plant that is expected to start commercial output near Caracas this month.

For Conviasa, the Tehran route will raise its international profile. The airline said in a statement that it would "offer excellent service at solidarity prices," although no one at Conviasa could immediately say what a ticket to Tehran would cost.

Port-au-Prince Prison Reflects Overwhelming Problems Facing Country's Children

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti -- In a small, walled courtyard ringed by coiled razor wire, a scrappy little boy punched and kicked at the humid air.

Mackenzy Sonson strutted one moment, cowered the next. Acted like a big man, then slipped into baby talk.

"I'm not tough," he said on a recent afternoon. Then he smacked a kid twice his size.

Mackenzy, better known as "Little Baron," lives in Cell C-4, back wall, bottom bunk, at Fort Dimanche, Port-au-Prince's children's prison. Cellmates dubbed him Baron because his dark black skin reminds them of Baron Samedi, the voodoo spirit who is believed to guard passage to the underworld. The "little" is obvious -- he says he's 8 years old.

This place where Little Baron is growing up, where he discovered Donald Duck cartoons and is learning to read, is a gallery of Haiti's woes. The boys warehoused at Fort Dimanche are the products of poverty, child abandonment, rampant homelessness and an educational system that has failed to enroll 1 million school-age children. Their plight reflects a country overwhelmed by the problems of its young -- more than 200,000 Haitian children have lost one or both parents to AIDS and 300,000 work as unpaid domestic servants in a system of bonded servitude, according to the U.N. Children's Fund.

Hardly any of the 120 boys at Fort Dimanche know when -- or if -- they will be released. Some were undoubtedly recruited to be child soldiers in gangs that lured them with food and shelter in return for help in kidnappings and robberies. Others are imprisoned here for years for minor crimes or are innocents nabbed in neighborhood sweeps by a notoriously corrupt police force, children's advocates say.

"This is where you see the total failure of the justice system," said Maryse Penette-Kedar, head of PRODEV, a foundation that is trying to improve conditions in the children's jail. "It's incompetence. It's total lack of management. People can't be in jail forever."

Haiti's dysfunctional criminal justice system offers no formal process for freeing child inmates, Penette-Kedar said. Those who have been formally charged are often accused of crimes as vague as "associating with bad people."

Some of the inmates of this hillside prison were as young as 6 when they arrived, although determining their true ages is an inexact science. The street kids who show up at the prison in Haiti generally come without birth certificates or parents; some don't even know their birthdays.

Penette-Kedar's organization -- backed in part by money from pop star Wyclef Jean's charitable foundation, Yele Haiti -- has begun a unique transformation of Fort Dimanche, hoping to make it Haiti's first child rehabilitation center. Young inmates who were once kept in lockdown 23 hours a day now get regular exercise and attend classes inside the prison.

Fort Dimanche, which means "Sunday Fort," sits on a craggy hillside in Delmas 33, a neighborhood of tightly packed cinder-block homes. The one-story children's wing, housing inmates up to age 17, is just steps away from a larger building where adult offenders are kept. There is always a line of visitors for the adult prison, but few come to see the children, most of whom are abandoned or orphaned.

The prison, for all its deprivations, can be a refuge from a hostile environment. Children have asked not to be released, Penette-Kedar said. A few parents have begged officials to imprison their children, even when they have not been accused of a crime, because they believe Fort Dimanche is safer than the streets. Several children were murdered by gang members shortly after being released because of suspicions that they gained their freedom by becoming informants.

But releases are few at Fort Dimanche, and a relentless stream of youngsters flows into the prison, the loud clang of metal gates signaling the beginning of an ordeal with no foreseeable end.

Little Baron's path to Fort Dimanche began on Port-au-Prince's airport road, where street children live amid the stench of rotting mountains of garbage. Like countless Haitian children, he was pushed into the streets by parents who couldn't afford to raise him, he says. By age 5, he was sleeping in the rusted carcasses of burned cars and picking through garbage heaps for food.

With no government social services to aid him, Little Baron gravitated toward "the big guys," his name for the young thugs who dominate the slums where he foraged. He became a kind of gofer, running errands that he won't talk about.

"I did favors," he said cautiously during a break between classes. "I did what I had to do to eat."

DOJ_NMG_0140268

One of those favors -- he won't say which -- landed him a year ago at Fort Dimanche and Cell C-4. He shares the approximately 20-by-12-foot cell with 28 other boys, 13 of whom sleep on the concrete floor because there are not enough bunks. The cell has its own hierarchy -- one of the oldest boys at the prison, a lanky 16-year-old, decides who sleeps on the floor.

"Some of these big guys are rapists and kidnappers," Little Baron whispered. "They boss us around."

When the cell door latched shut one recent afternoon, the noise inside was deafening, and the nearby latrine cast a foul odor into the crowded space. Little Baron took a flying leap into his bunk, trailed by a skinny kid who caught up with him and pounded him in the ribs.

In the next bunk, 11-year-old Ricardo Exgentis broke into a rap song he'd written during an arts class.

"Life is not easy," Ricardo rapped in sing-songy Creole. "Separation. We don't know our brother, our sister. We living like dogs. That's bad for Haiti."

Ricardo, who was arrested for banditry and sent here more than two years ago, took his first shower at Fort Dimanche. Living on the streets, he washed only when he could afford a bucket of cold water. In prison, Penette-Kedar's group has taught him how to bathe properly and brush his teeth.

But the shower still feels new and strange to Ricardo. He says he feels uncomfortable being naked among all those boys and sometimes flees without rinsing off the soap.

Talking about prison life made him angry. Rapping offered an escape.

"Give me a chance, that way I'll be able to tell the truth," he sang. "I'm rapping for all the kids in prison. I'm rapping for the mothers that's trying to make something out of nothing."

Ricardo's rapping was drowned out by the wall-mounted television clicking on. Three boys climbed onto an upper bunk and leaned forward, entranced by the explosions and the rat-a-tat-tat of machine guns in an action movie featuring Asian film star Chow Yun-Fat.

Pierre Sonson, a pensive 10-year-old who is not related to Little Baron, raved about Chow's clothes. He and the other inmates wear hand-me-downs, some with unlikely provenances. The boy next to him was decked out in a "Girls Softball" T-shirt from Sonoma, Calif., wine country.

"They look clean, they look like they smell good," Pierre said of the actors. "I'd like to smell good."

When the movie ended, Pierre and Jenson Germain, 11, talked excitedly about an upcoming holiday.

"There will be bands," Jenson said, his voice rising.

They smiled at the thought, but they were soon frowning. A tall boy with a knife scar on his face had butted roughly into the conversation. "You're not going to be released for the party," he said. "Face it, you're not going to have any fun."

Jenson, who has been imprisoned for nearly two years, gulped back what might have been a sign of weakness -- a tear. "I don't cry," he said a few minutes later.

Little Baron, tugging at his waistband, sidled up next to Jenson. The prison has no pants small enough for him, so he strings a shoelace through two belt loops and pulls it tight. Little Baron thrust his right foot into the air, imitating a karate kick he saw on television. His pants slipped to his knees. He and Jenson fell onto a bunk laughing.

Outside, a woman walked into the courtyard. This was a rare sight -- a mother visiting her son.

Yola Aeme settled onto a bench and stared wordlessly at her 16-year-old son, Antoine Menchy, who has spent a year and a half here. Aeme, 38, still seethes about the day her son was arrested. She was frantic when he didn't come home. No one had told her about the arrest.

"There's nobody I can see or talk to, no lawyer or anybody," Aeme said dejectedly. "I have no hope that they'll release him."

Antoine bunks next to a wisecracking 16-year-old with delicate, curled eyelashes named Rikensen Louis. Rikensen spends great chunks of his free time hunched over a pad of paper composing letters that he tries, always unsuccessfully, to persuade prison guards to relay to a judge.

"How you doing, Majesty?" Rikensen wrote recently. "I already spent 10 months in prison without knowing why would you think of me mister?"

Rikensen, who says he was imprisoned for stealing a radiator, stuffs his letters into a purple shirt. He always writes exactly the same words. Over and over. He's lost count of how many letters he has written.

DOJ_NMG_0140269

When he gets mad, he throws out all the letters and vows to stop writing. But weeks pass with no sign of hope, he said, and soon he finds himself writing those same words all over again.

Chechnya Legislature Confirms Putin Pick (AP)

By Musa Sadulayev, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 3, 2007

Chechnya's parliament approved a widely feared former security chief as president of the war-battered Russian republic in a nearly unanimous vote Friday, a day after President Vladimir Putin nominated him.

The confirmation of Ramzan Kadyrov, which had been seen as a foregone conclusion, cements his rise to power. His nomination won 56 votes in the 58-member, two-chamber legislature, with two ballots ruled invalid.

Human rights groups allege that security forces under Kadyrov's control abduct and torture civilians suspected of ties to Chechnya's separatist rebels. Some observers suggest he was tied to last year's murder of Anna Politkovskaya, a journalist who had reported extensively on Chechnya's wars and sufferings. Kadyrov has denied any involvement.

Kadyrov also is credited with a reconstruction boom that he administered as the region's prime minister, under which the capital, Grozny, is being transformed from a moonscape of rubble and shattered buildings in a region devastated by two separatist wars since the Soviet collapse.

Kadyrov has been at the heart of a Kremlin strategy to crush continued rebel resistance and establish order in the mostly Muslim region. He turned 30 in October, the minimum age for president, and had been expected to seek the job.

He became acting president after last week's dismissal of Alu Alkhanov, who had increasingly criticized Kadyrov.

Kadyrov is the son of Chechnya's first pro-Moscow president, Akhmad Kadyrov, who was assassinated in 2004. The elder Kadyrov became president in 2003 in a Kremlin-conducted aimed at undermining rebels by creating the image of Chechens being allowed a high degree of self-determination.

As prime minister, the younger Kadyrov led a largely federally funded campaign to rebuild the region. Two wars in the past dozen years between Russian forces and separatist rebels who increasingly voiced militant Islamic ideology left much of the republic in ruins and its people gripped by fear and resentment.

Major offensives died down early this decade, but small clashes continue and rebels attack Russian forces with booby-traps and remotely detonated explosives.

Construction and repairs have transformed the capital, Grozny, and the second-largest city, Gudermes. Buildings have been plastered with banners praising Kadyrov and his late father, part of a personality cult he claims to oppose.

But prominent Russian groups boycotted a human rights conference in Grozny this week, saying that attending would lend his government legitimacy. Council of Europe human rights commissioner Thomas Hammarberg, who was at the conference, said Friday that Chechnya continues to be plagued by allegations of torture and by officials' failure to respond to families seeking information about missing relatives.

Hammarberg declined to comment when asked for his opinion on Kadyrov as president and he did not point to Kadyrov's forces as responsible for abuses.

Of the detainees whom he interviewed in Chechnya that complained of torture, "several of them pointed at the activities of the federal police," he said in Moscow.

He recommended that Chechnya set up a "truth commission" similar to those in Latin American countries to try to bring those responsible for abuses to light.

Analysts say Putin has entrusted Kadyrov with power in part because he is seen as the only person who can keep large numbers of former rebels under control. Many former rebels now serve in the police and security forces.

But his growing clout is also seen as a risk for the Kremlin, particularly after Putin steps down at the end of his second term next year. Some see Kadyrov's loyalty to Russia as closely tied to his relationship with Putin.

Kadyrov has repeatedly praised Putin but has criticized the Russian government and the state-run oil company OAO Rosneft, calling for greater economic freedom for Chechnya and for a larger share of its oil revenues.

Analysts say that with the power to foment new turmoil in fragile Chechnya and create serious problems for Russia, he could take a more demanding stance if his relations with the Kremlin become clouded.

The first war between rebels and Moscow's forces began in December 1994 and ended 20 months later with a humiliating Russian withdrawal after rebels fought them to standstill. Three years of de-facto independence followed, during which Chechnya became notoriously lawless, plagued by kidnappings and increasingly influenced by militant Islam.

Fighting resumed in 1999 after Chechen insurgents invaded neighboring Dagestan, apparently aiming to set up an Islamic caliphate, and after some 300 people were killed in apartment bombings that Russian authorities blamed on the rebels.

Chechen rebels have been involved in most of the terrorist attacks that have plagued Russia for more than a decade.

Chechnya's Reins In Strongman's Hands (LAT)

By David Holley

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

The legislature in Grozny approves pro-Moscow Ramzan Kadyrov as president.

MOSCOW — A Kremlin-backed strongman who has spearheaded efforts to pacify war-battered Chechnya through a mix of repression and economic reconstruction won legislative approval Friday as the southern region's president.

Ramzan Kadyrov, the son of a former president of the republic of Chechnya who was assassinated in 2004, previously was prime minister. He has been the most powerful figure in the region since his father's death. However, he turned 30, the minimum age for the top post, only in October. Russian President Vladimir V. Putin nominated him for the position Thursday.

Kadyrov expressed his appreciation and loyalty to Putin in televised remarks Friday, declaring that "there is support and understanding from the supreme commander in chief, and it only remains to serve him hand and foot."

Kadyrov won parliamentary approval with 56 out of 58 votes, the Russian news agency RIA Novosti reported.

During the first Chechnya war, from 1994 to 1996, Kadyrov and his father, Akhmad Kadyrov, joined separatist rebels who won de facto self-rule for the republic. But the two men switched to the pro-Moscow side when Russian forces returned to Chechnya in 1999, launching the second Chechnya war.

Ramzan Kadyrov headed the presidential security force at the time of his father's death in a bombing in the Chechen capital of Grozny. He subsequently built up a powerful personal militia that was composed largely of other former rebels granted amnesty after switching sides.

Human rights organizations have frequently accused Kadyrov's militia of human rights abuses including kidnappings, torture and murder, allegations that he denies. Russian federal forces in Chechnya also have been accused of such abuses against civilians and suspected separatists.

In recent years, pro-Russia forces have killed several top separatist leaders. The strength of the insurgency has faded even as Moscow has granted ever-greater autonomy to the pro-Kremlin Chechen government.

Putin dismissed former Chechen President Alu Alkhanov last month, paving the way for Kadyrov. While Alkhanov and Kadyrov denied there was a power struggle, they had engaged in increasingly open disagreements in recent months.

Dmitry Kozak, Putin's envoy in southern Russia, alluded to those differences in televised comments Friday.

"With Kadyrov's appointment, all those contradictions that had undermined the efficiency of the government in Chechnya have disappeared," he said.

Alexei Malashenko, a Chechnya specialist at the Carnegie Moscow Center, said that despite questions about his commitment to human rights and democracy, Kadyrov has had some real achievements.

"Some called him simply a gangster, but Ramzan has managed to discharge three main obligations to the Chechen people," Malashenko said. "First, he established order in Chechnya, even though it is a totalitarian type of order. But before, it was not possible simply to walk around Grozny. Second, he promised amnesty to separatist fighters, and as a result most of them surrendered. Maybe 500 to 600 rebels remain, but they are not active right now. Third, Russian soldiers are not murdered anymore."

Speaking at a Moscow news conference Friday, Thomas Hammarberg, the European Union commissioner for human rights, praised the pace of reconstruction in Chechnya.

But Hammarberg said that Chechen and Russian authorities hadn't tried hard enough to provide information about people who disappeared during the fighting. About 2,600 people are officially counted as having disappeared, he said.

Hammarberg said that in his meetings with the Chechens, he stressed the issue of accounting for those who have disappeared and allegations that law enforcement officers torture suspects.

Courts in Chechnya place too much reliance on written confessions from defendants, and this creates an incentive for police to use beatings and electrical shocks to try to extract confessions, he said.

Prisoners he spoke with complained about their treatment immediately after arrest and during interrogation, the EU envoy said. "I'm convinced that much of what I heard has a real background, and that these kinds of illegal interrogation methods are used at a fairly wide scale."

Gangster President (WP)

Meet Ramzan Kadyrov, Vladimir Putin's favorite Chechen criminal.

THIS WEEK Vladimir Putin delivered another clear message about the kind of state Russia is becoming. He did so by nominating as the new president of the republic of Chechnya a man named Ramzan Kadyrov -- an unspeakably savage and corrupt warlord. Mr. Kadyrov has done Mr. Putin a great service: Using his own militia -- gang might be a better term -- he has imposed order in the name of the Kremlin on most of the rebellious republic, allowing the Russian president to declare victory in the war he started more than seven years ago. The Chechen's reward is to be installed as official head of the republic's government, where he can be expected to promote a cult of personality, employ state resources for his personal aggrandizement and murder his opponents with impunity.

Mr. Kadyrov has already been pursuing this agenda for some time. He and his "kadyrovtsy" are feared throughout the shattered republic: They are known for grisly acts of torture, extortion, kidnapping, rape and murder. The heads of slain rebels are displayed in some villages as a warning against crossing the new leader. Opponents outside Chechnya aren't safe, either. One, Movladi Baisarov, was gunned down in November in the center of Moscow while police looked on. Another, the independent journalist Anna Politkovskaya, was murdered outside her apartment in October; Mr. Kadyrov is one of several suspected sponsors of her slaying. Mr. Putin has taken no action to clear up either case.

In one sense Mr. Putin's sponsorship of Mr. Kadyrov is a measure of his desperation to find a way out of the war he started, which killed some 80,000 Chechens, most of them civilians, as well as unreported thousands of Russian soldiers. The new president is not a very reliable puppet; a former rebel himself, he once said that his "hero" was Shamil Basayev, the Chechen terrorist who staged the bloody attacks on a Moscow theater and a school in the town of Beslan. Mr. Kadyrov has expressed interest in introducing elements of Islamic sharia law in Chechnya, whose population is Muslim. His loyalty to the Russian state is nominal. Only 30 years old, he is likely to evolve into a self-sustaining despot whom Moscow could dislodge only by force.

By installing him, Mr. Putin is telling the world that Russia has become a place where the most sadistic criminals can be political leaders, where the murder of opponents is openly sanctioned and where the only qualification that matters is loyalty to Mr. Putin. Luckily, perhaps, for the Russian president, George W. Bush and the other leaders of the Group of Seven democracies, who continue to treat Mr. Putin as a strategic partner, are doing their best to ignore that message.

Don't Go Cold On Turkey (WSJ)

By Mark R. Parris

The Wall Street Journal, March 3, 2007

Once again, a resolution has been introduced in the House of Representatives asserting that the forcible deportation and massacre of Armenians by the Ottoman Empire in 1915 was "genocide." But this time around the resolution, sponsored by Reps. Frank Pallone, Adam Schiff, George Radanovich and Joe Knollenberg (and over 170 co-sponsors), appears likely to pass. The result will be a train wreck with an important, longstanding American ally: Turkey.

It may never be the right time for one nation to pass legislation on another's history or morality, but there could be no worse time than now. It's a particularly sensitive moment in Turkish politics: A new president will be picked by parliament in late April (coinciding with Congress's likely decision on a resolution) and elections for a new parliament will follow by November. Based on current polling, Turkey by year's end could for the first time have a president, government, parliament and most municipalities under the control of a party -- Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan's ruling AK Party -- inclined to loosen the strict barriers set up by Ataturk between religion and state. One does not have to share secular fears of AKP's alleged "secret agenda" to Islamicize Turkish society to appreciate the strains this would generate in Turkish political life over the weeks and months ahead. Nor does it take much imagination to realize that, in such circumstances, Turkish politicians will compete with one another, should a resolution be passed, to show they cannot be pushed around by the U.S. Congress.

Turkish domestic politics isn't the only issue, however. This year will highlight the country's pivotal geography and relevance to U.S. strategic goals. As we struggle to find our footing in Iraq, for example, Turkey can either help or make our task much harder. Our forces in Iraq rely heavily on Turkey's Incirlik airbase for resupply. Turkish military intervention in the north, either to pre-empt cross-border terrorism by Turkish Kurdish PKK terrorists, or to stop Kirkuk from becoming part of the Kurdish federation, would complicate Gen. David Petraeus's already daunting assignment.

Then there is Iran. Will Turkey align itself with Washington and the West in efforts to ratchet up pressure against the Islamic Republic -- a major trading partner and ally against the PKK? Or will the Turks join Russia and others favoring a less-confrontational approach? And as the U.S. tries to forge a new alignment in the Middle East to roll back Iranian influence and restart Israeli-Palestinian talks, a Turkey that has both bulked up its influence in the Muslim world (particularly among Sunni Arabs) and kept its close relationship with Israel, will be an asset.

Turkey has quietly emerged as the prize in a new great game over who will develop and bring to world markets the vast oil and gas resources of former Soviet Central Asia. Experts know that Turkey will in the years ahead become one of the world's major energy hubs, supplied by new pipelines that will crisscross Anatolia. The question is whether this will happen according to Moscow's or Washington's vision of where those pipelines should run, and whose product should fill them. Ankara will likely make some of the key decisions this year.

Turkey goes into this defining year with its anchors to the West drifting or under strain. NATO, for decades the bedrock of Turkey's Western identity, particularly for its influential military, has lost luster as its mission has blurred. The European Union's ambivalence toward Turkey since formally beginning the accession process in October 2006 has soured many Turks on the project. Despite laudable garden-tending by senior officials on both sides, U.S.-Turkish relations haven't recovered the depth or breadth they had in the '90s; polls show anti-Americanism remains high in the Turkish "street." The winners have been Turkey's ultranationalists, whose vision of a Turkey that "goes it alone" and increasingly resorts to violence is chilling.

Some will interpret this analysis as realpolitik that simply postpones the moment when Turkey must deal with its pre-Republican history. That ignores the reality that Turks in growing numbers -- among them Nobel laureate Orhan Pamuk -- are speaking out in favor of a more candid debate on the events of 1915. Most fear their voices will be drowned out by the tsunami of nationalist outrage that a resolution will generate.

In the past, U.S. congressional leaders have repeatedly bowed to the findings of administrations of both parties that a genocide resolution would adversely affect vital American security interests. Given the equities America now has at stake in and around Turkey, those findings remain as valid as ever.

The U.S. has a lot of hard work to do in Turkey's neighborhood. In some cases, American lives will literally be at stake. Whatever the challenge we face in this troubled region, our success will be far more certain if we can work with Turkey, rather than having to work around it. The responsible choice for Congress's current leadership is to join their predecessors in concluding that passage of an Armenian genocide resolution does not serve American interests.

Mr. Parris, who was U.S. ambassador to Turkey from 1997 to 2000, is a visiting fellow at the Brookings Institution.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Growing Calls In Australia For Terror Suspect's Return (NYT)

By Raymond Bonner

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

SYDNEY, Australia, Saturday, March 3 — The decision by the United States military to charge an Australian citizen, David Hicks, with one terrorism-related offense comes as Prime Minister John Howard is under mounting pressure, even from conservatives in his own party, to have Mr. Hicks charged, tried and brought home.

Mr. Hicks is the first detainee from the American base at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, to be charged under the Military Commissions Act of 2006. But the single charge, of providing "material support for terrorism," after Mr. Hicks has been held for five years in Guantánamo, has been met with skepticism, disbelief and some anger here, from conservatives and liberals alike.

The charge, which was announced by the Pentagon in Washington on Thursday, represents a substantial reduction in the case the Bush administration has claimed it has against Mr. Hicks, a high-school dropout who was captured in Afghanistan after the American invasion in 2001.

Only two weeks ago, the American ambassador to Australia, Robert D. McCallum Jr., described the Guantánamo detainees as "ruthless fanatics who would kill Australians and Americans without blinking an eye."

Mr. Hicks was initially charged with conspiracy to commit murder and engage in acts of terrorism, attempted murder and aiding the enemy. That was later reduced to attempted murder and "providing material support for terrorism."

Now all those charges, except material support, have been dropped, and there is a question if even that will stick. Mr. Hicks's lawyers argue that material support was not made a crime until 2006, five years after Mr. Hicks trained with Al Qaeda.

The relatively minor, single charge after such a long detention "means they've botched it," said Barnaby Joyce, a federal senator for Australia's conservative National Party, which is part of the governing coalition. "They've completely abused the process of justice."

Mr. Joyce is one of an increasing number of conservative politicians and others who have joined the Bring David Hicks Home movement, which has gained considerable momentum here in the last few months.

In fact, the case has generated such political outrage that members of Mr. Howard's own center-right Liberal Party acknowledge that it is hurting the prime minister in his bid for re-election this year.

For nearly five years, Mr. Howard, one of President Bush's most stalwart supporters, was generally content to allow Mr. Hicks to remain in Guantánamo. But in recent weeks, he has been forced to take account of the strong shift in public opinion around the case, which has become a major irritant in American-Australian relations.

Last month, Mr. Howard raised the Hicks case directly with President Bush in a telephone call, and again with Vice President Dick Cheney when he was here last week.

Whether the charge finally leveled against Mr. Hicks was "the result of my representations to President Bush and Vice President Cheney, I don't know," Mr. Howard told Australian journalists on Friday, as reported by the BBC.

It is an issue that Mr. Hicks's lawyers are expected to explore, for if there was any influence of this kind on the bringing of the charge, it could result in the case being dismissed.

Mr. Hicks's lawyers are in any case certain to challenge the charge on the grounds that there was no such crime when Mr. Hicks was training with Al Qaeda in Afghanistan in 2001. The United States Constitution prohibits ex post facto laws, but in light of recent laws passed by Congress and various court rulings, it is not certain that Mr. Hicks will be afforded that protection.

The next probable step is that the United States government will try to get Mr. Hicks to plead guilty to this single charge, in exchange for a sentence of time served. That would have him back in Australia soon. Australian officials said this would be acceptable.

The groundswell of support for Mr. Hicks here does not arise because Australians believe that he is innocent, but rather because many here believe he has been denied justice by having been held so long without a regular trial.

"He may well be a rat bag, but even rat bags deserve their day in court," is how Senator Joyce put it.

DOJ_NMG_0140276

"It is about due process of law, the principles we are fighting for in Iraq," he added in an interview. "In fighting the barbarians, we are starting to imitate the barbarians."

According to American and Australian officials, Mr. Hicks trained with Al Qaeda in Afghanistan, but officials have said he did not fire any shots during the war.

Described by one Australian police official as a "lost soul," Mr. Hicks was a kangaroo skinner in the Australian outback, went to Japan to train horses, and joined the Kosovo Liberation Army, which had the support of NATO in the war against Slobodan Milosevic.

Back in Australia, he tried unsuccessfully to enlist in the army. He joined an evangelical church, but eventually converted to Islam and went to Pakistan. There, he first joined up with Lashkar-e-Taiba, which was not declared a terrorist organization by the United States or Australia until the last week of 2001.

He was picked up by Afghan irregulars and turned over to the American troops for a ransom of several thousand dollars, according to his father, Terry Hicks, a printer by trade.

Mr. Hicks, an online organization, GetUp!, and his son's military lawyer, Maj. Michael Mori, have campaigned with increasing success to bring the case to light.

Often guided by liberal organizations like the Center for Constitutional Rights in New York, which has represented several Guantánamo detainees, Mr. Hicks kept his son's case alive with stunts, such as standing in a make-shift cage in the center of New York.

GetUp!, which is patterned after MoveOn.org, a liberal online organization in the United States, a few months ago hung a huge sign — "Bring David Hicks Home" — on the side of an office building at the entrance to the famed Sydney Harbor Bridge, which is passed every day by thousands of motorists commuting to work.

To the surprise of the organization, within 72 hours, it collected 150,000 Australian dollars, about $118,000, for the cause. Altogether, it has raised at least $196,500, said Brett Simpson, the organization's executive director.

Major Mori has made seven trips here, always in his tightly pressed Marine Corps uniform. Initially, Australians were skeptical that a military man would put up a vigorous defense. Since then, he has become something of a folk hero here, drawing large crowds around the country.

Some American Embassy officials sought unsuccessfully to have the Pentagon bar Major Mori from coming to Australia, said an American official who was granted anonymity in order to reveal information that has not been made public.

The combined public relations strategy has recently gained traction. For nearly five years, the opposition center-left Labor Party stayed far away from the Hicks case, as did the Australian news media. In the first nine months of 2006, there were 63 mentions of David Hicks in The Australian, according to the paper's researchers; in the last five months, there have been 255.

The list of public leaders calling for David Hicks to be given an expeditious and fair trial has grown steadily longer and includes those from the Labor Party.

In January the director of military prosecutions in the Australian Army, Brig. Gen. Lyn McDade, called Mr. Hicks's detention "abominable."

"I don't care what he's done or alleged to have done," General McDade, a former prosecutor, told The Sydney Morning Herald. "I think he's entitled to a trial, and a fair one."

Appellate Judges Uphold Dismissal Of CIA Lawsuit (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

A federal appeals court yesterday upheld the dismissal of the case of a German citizen who says he was wrongfully imprisoned by the CIA. Khaled al-Masri had sued former CIA director George J. Tenet and 10 unnamed CIA officials in U.S. District Court in Alexandria. Sources have said that Masri was held by the CIA for five months in Afghanistan because of mistaken identity.

U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III last year sided with the Justice Department, which invoked a state-secrets privilege to argue for dismissing the lawsuit. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit upheld Ellis's decision.

I Am Not A State Secret (LAT)

By Khaled El-masri, Khaled El-masri, A German Citizen Born In Lebanon, Was A Car Salesman Before He Was Detained In Dece

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

Having just lost in court, a CIA kidnap victim asks why the U.S. won't admit its error.

ON NEW YEAR'S EVE in 2003, I was seized at the border of Serbia and Macedonia by Macedonian police who mistakenly believed that I was traveling on a false German passport. I was detained incommunicado for more than three weeks. Then I was handed over to the American Central Intelligence Agency and was stripped, severely beaten, shackled, dressed in a diaper, injected with drugs, chained to the floor of a plane and flown to Afghanistan, where I was imprisoned in a foul dungeon for more than four months.

Long after the American government realized that I was an entirely innocent man, I was blindfolded, put back on a plane, flown to Europe and left on a hilltop in Albania — without any explanation or apology for the nightmare that I had endured.

My story is well known. It has been described in literally hundreds of newspaper articles and television news programs — many of them relying on sources within the U.S. government. It has been the subject of numerous investigations and reports by intergovernmental bodies, including the European Parliament. Most recently, prosecutors in my own country of Germany are pursuing indictments against 13 CIA agents and contractors for their role in my kidnapping, abuse and detention. Although I never could have imagined it, and certainly never wished it, I have become the public face of the CIA's "extraordinary rendition" program.

Why, then, does the American government insist that my ordeal is a state secret? This is something beyond my comprehension. In December 2005, with the help of the American Civil Liberties Union, I sued former CIA Director George Tenet along with other CIA agents and contractors for their roles in my kidnapping, mistreatment and arbitrary detention. Above all, what I want from the lawsuit is a public acknowledgment from the U.S. government that I was innocent, a mistaken victim of its rendition program, and an apology for what I was forced to endure. Without this vindication, it has been impossible for me to return to a normal life.

The U.S. government does not deny that I was wrongfully kidnapped. Instead, it has argued in court that my case must be dismissed because any litigation of my claims will expose state secrets and jeopardize American security, even though President Bush has told the world about the CIA's detention program, and even though my allegations have been corroborated by eyewitnesses and other evidence. To my amazement and dismay, last May, a federal district court judge agreed with the government and threw out my case. And then Friday, the U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals upheld that decision. It seems that the only place in the world where my case cannot be discussed is in a U.S. courtroom.

I did not bring this lawsuit to harm America. I brought the lawsuit because I want to know why America harmed me. I don't understand why the strongest nation on Earth believes that acknowledging a mistake will threaten its security. Isn't it more likely that showing the world that America cannot give justice to an innocent victim of its anti-terror policies will cause harm to America's image and security around the world?

IN NOVEMBER, I traveled to America for the first time to hear my lawyers argue my case before the appeals court in Richmond, Va. and to meet with members of Congress and their staff on Capitol Hill. (It's obvious that the U.S. government does not consider me a security threat, or I would not have been allowed to enter the country, much less be in the same room with federal judges and members of Congress.)

Although I did not understand all of the arguments made by the lawyers, I was impressed by the dignity of the proceedings and by the respect for the rule of law that I have always associated with America. I'm deeply disappointed to find that this same legal system denies me the chance to fully present my case.

If I were being treated fairly by the American legal system, perhaps we would not have reached the point where German prosecutors are bringing criminal charges against American citizens.

During my visit in November, many Americans offered me their personal apologies for the brutality that had been perpetrated against me in their name. I saw in their faces the true America, an America that is not held captive by fear of unknown enemies and that understands the strength and power of justice. That is the America that, I hope, one day will see me as a human being — not a state secret.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush To Visit Tornado-damaged Areas (AP)

AP, March 3, 2007

WHITE HOUSE (AP) -- President Bush heads to Alabama today to visit areas damaged by this week's vicious storms and deadly tornadoes.

Among his stops will be the the high school where eight students were killed Thursday when a twister demolished their school.

DOJ_NMG_0140278

The president told reporters at the White House yesterday he's making the trip "with a heavy heart." He said he knows "full well" that he'll see people whose lives have been "turned upside down." The president's asking Americans to pray for the victims and their families.

At least 20 people were killed in the storms that ripped through Alabama, Georgia and Missouri. Federal emergency teams were sent to damaged areas immediately after the storm. The administration is hoping to draw a pointed contrast to it's sluggish response after Hurricane Katrina.

Bush Reaches Out To Tornado-Struck Areas (AP)

AP, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON - President Bush offered condolences to victims of violent storms and tornadoes that roared through several Southern states and said he would visit stricken areas on Saturday "with a heavy heart."

Bush told reporters at the White House Friday that he had spoken to Alabama Gov. Bob Riley on Thursday afternoon and Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue on Friday morning.

He said he told the governors he wanted to express "my personal condolences as well as the condolences of the nation for those who lost their lives in the recent tragedies in those two states."

Bush will visit areas hit by a violent storm system that spawned tornadoes that struck an Alabama high school, killing eight students.

The White House said Bush would make two stops on Saturday, but his destinations were still being worked out with governors in the affected states.

"I go down with a heavy heart," the president said. "I go down knowing full well that I'll be seeing people whose lives were turned upside down by the tornadoes. I'll do my very best to comfort them."

The burst of tornadoes was part of a line of thunderstorms and snowstorms that stretched from Minnesota to the Gulf Coast. Authorities blamed tornadoes for the deaths of a 7-year-old girl in Missouri, 10 people in Alabama and nine in Georgia, and twisters also damaged homes in Kansas.

"I ask our nation, for those who are prayerful, to give a prayer for the victims of the storms," Bush said.

He spoke on the South Lawn of the White House as he prepared to board his helicopter as part of an unrelated trip to Indiana and Kentucky.

Aaron Walker, a spokesman for the Federal Emergency Management Agency said that the Georgia governor was working on a disaster-aid request on Friday.

Some 14 FEMA preliminary disaster assessment teams are already at work in Alabama, he said.

New Orleans Files Claim Against Corps For Billions (NYT)

By Leslie Eaton

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

The City of New Orleans filed a $77 billion damage claim against the federal government on Thursday, joining thousands of residents who have flocked to the Army Corps of Engineers seeking compensation for their losses after Hurricane Katrina in 2005.

The corps, which built and helped maintain much of the levee system that failed, has not tallied the number of claims or the total amount of money sought. It received 30,500 forms by late last month, a spokeswoman for the agency, Kathy Gibbs, said.

The filings that arrived last week “pretty much filled an 8-by-10 room, floor to ceiling,” Ms. Gibbs said.

The forms run two pages, with some including additional paperwork, she said.

The claims were in part prompted by a ruling last month by a federal judge that raised the possibility that suits against the corps could proceed. Normally, federal law does not allow suits for damages resulting from the failures of flood-control projects.

But on Feb. 2, Judge Stanwood R. Duval Jr. of Federal District Court in New Orleans ruled that at least one flooding source, the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet, might be considered a navigation channel and not a flood-control project.

Critics of the corps faulted the outlet, known as Mr. Go, for much of the flooding in eastern New Orleans. The corps has disputed that, but last year it announced a plan to close the channel to navigation.

Similar suits are under way on other canals and channels that flooded. Lawyers representing people who have sued the corps for negligence had urged residents to file claims by March 1 to preserve their rights in case the judge found the corps liable for property damage and personal injuries under maritime law.

The city did not explain how it came up with the $77 billion figure, and it did not respond to a request for more information. The New Orleans Sewerage and Water Board filed a claim for $470 million, said Robert Jackson, a spokesman for the board.

New Orleans Files Katrina Claim (LAT)

By Ann M. Simmons

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

The city is seeking $77 billion from the Army Corps of Engineers.

NEW ORLEANS — With a $77-billion claim, the city of New Orleans led tens of thousands of homeowners and businesses seeking compensation from the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers for losses suffered when levees protecting the city ruptured under the storm surge of Hurricane Katrina.

Kathleen Gibbs, a spokeswoman in the corps' New Orleans district office, said that by Monday at least 34,500 claims had arrived by mail. And the bags and boxes filled with forms from residents who rushed to file before the Thursday midnight deadline could fill an 8-by-10-foot room.

"This is obviously a very significant and very emotional situation for many people," Gibbs said.

Many claimants argue that their properties survived the actual hurricane, but were flooded when the city's flood walls failed because of shoddy construction and corps negligence.

Lawyers said the number of claims could top 100,000. Forms were accepted at corps offices nationwide.

"It is important and necessary for people to let the Army Corps of Engineers and Congress know that they expect to receive compensation," said Joseph Bruno, a New Orleans lawyer who is leading a team of attorneys for hurricane victims. "The debate is simple: You broke it, you fix it."

Claims have run from thousands of dollars to the $77 billion that the city is pursuing.

New Orleans officials did not specify the damages to be covered, but in a statement, City Atty. Penya Moses-Fields said the claim was "prudent at this stage to file."

Entergy New Orleans, the city's electrical utility that went bankrupt after Katrina, is seeking $655 million in damages and losses, and New Orleans Sewerage and Water is trying to recoup about $460 million.

The corps has argued that the 1928 Flood Control Act gives it immunity from lawsuits. But last month, a U.S. District Court judge ruled that such protection is void in cases concerning navigational projects.

The claimants contend that the Mississippi River-Gulf Outlet and the 17th Street drainage canal, which caused much of the flooding, are navigation waterways.

Veda Manuel — whose home, along with her bicycle- and kayak-tour business in the city's Bayou St. John neighborhood, was destroyed by Katrina — said no amount of money could undo the trauma she and other residents have endured.

"The amount of chaos, uncertainty and disturbance … money will never compensate for that. But they must claim responsibility," said Manuel, 50, who is renovating her home using savings and help from friends. She would not disclose the size of her claim.

"Time stopped for us" the moment the levees broke, Manuel said. "I lost an entire year of my life."

WAR NEWS:

14 Iraqi Policemen Kidnapped, Killed (AP)

AP, March 2, 2007

BAGHDAD (AP) — The bodies of 14 policemen were found Friday northeast of Baghdad after an al-Qaeda-affilated Sunni group said it abducted members of a government security force in retaliation for the rape of a Sunni woman by members of the Shiite-dominated police.

Brig. Gen. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, an Interior Ministry spokesman, said the bodies were discovered Friday afternoon in Diyala province. The policemen were kidnapped Thursday on their way to their homes in Diyala for leave, he said.

Earlier Friday, the Islamic State of Iraq said in a Web statement that it seized 18 Interior Ministry employees in Diyala in retaliation for "the crimes carried out ... against the Sunnis," including the alleged rape last month of a Sunni woman by policemen in Baghdad.

In a second statement, the group announced that its "court" had ordered the "execution" of the men and that a video depicting their deaths would be posted later, according to the SITE Institute, which monitors extremist websites.

Photos accompanied the claim, showing up to 18 blindfolded men, seven of them wearing Iraqi military uniforms. All had their hands tied behind their backs.

But Khalaf cast doubt on whether the 14 slain policemen were the same men shown on the website photos.

"We found the 14 policemen's bodies, but they are not those who are in the fabricated images on the website," he told The Associated Press. "The Diyala police told us that they don't know who those people shown on the website were."

DOJ_NMG_0140280

Nevertheless, he blamed al-Qaeda for the killings and said Iraqi authorities would "chase those who assassinated these unarmed people."

Also Friday, two U.S. soldiers and an interpreter were killed by a roadside bomb northwest of Baghdad as they were trying to clear a highway of explosives.

The military also announced that a U.S. Marine was killed two days before in combat in Anbar province, a Sunni insurgent area west of the capital.

The Islamic State of Iraq had threatened to kill the hostages within 24 hours if the Iraqi government did not hand over officers accused in the rape case, and release all Sunni women held in Iraqi prisons.

"This blessed operation is a response to crimes carried out by those infidels in their fight against the Sunnis," the statement said. "The latest of the crimes committed by these traitors was to rape our sister in religion."

A 20-year-old woman told Arab television stations that she was detained in a Sunni area of west Baghdad on Feb. 18, taken to a police garrison and assaulted by three officers. The woman gave a name which identified her as Sunni.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, announced an investigation Feb. 19 but cleared the officers the following day, stirring outrage among Sunni politicians.

Al-Maliki said the rape claim was fabricated to tarnish the reputation of the police and the ongoing security crackdown in Baghdad.

Friday's statement from the Islamic State of Iraq referred to the rape victim by her name, which identified her as Sunni.

However, officials of the Iraqi Islamic Party, the country's largest Sunni group, said the woman used a false name and that she is in fact a Shiite. The party's human rights office had been looking into the case.

Names of the officers involved in the case were not released, and it was unknown whether they were Sunni or Shiite.

In Baghdad, two car bombs killed at least 11 people in attacks Friday. The deadlier occurred at a used car lot near the Shiite militia stronghold of Sadr City, killing 10 people, wounding 17 and setting several cars ablaze, police said.

The other blast was near a police patrol in southwest Baghdad, killing a policeman and wounding two civilians, police reported.

The U.S. military also said Friday that eight suspected militants were killed a day earlier in a raid in Salman Pak, a town just southeast of Baghdad where Sunni and Shiite extremists have frequently clashed.

U.S. forces came under small-arms and mortar fire, and killed three armed men moving toward them, the statement said. Twenty minutes later, troops were fired on again and shot dead four suspects. Another man was killed in a vehicle nearby, the statement said.

Sniper rifles, AK-47s and rocket-propelled grenade launchers were removed from the scene, it added.

In Fallujah, 45 miles west of Baghdad, residents reported finding handbills warning local tribes to abandon checkpoints they had established to detain members of al-Qaeda. The handbills said al-Qaeda would retaliate if they checkpoints remain.

The warning followed reports by Iraqi police of clashes between al-Qaeda members and local residents opposed to the extremist group.

A roadside bomb exploded near an Iraqi army patrol 150 miles southeast of Baghdad, killing one soldier, police said.

Bodies Of 14 Iraqi Police Officers Found (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis,

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

One group said it had kidnapped security forces to avenge an alleged rape.

BAGHDAD — The bodies of 14 missing police officers were found near a school in Diyala province Friday after a group linked to Al Qaeda claimed to have kidnapped members of a government security force in retribution for the alleged rape of a Sunni Arab woman.

Police confirmed that the 14 men, members of a rapid-response unit, were found shot through the head with their hands tied behind their backs.

They disappeared Thursday on their way home on leave to the Shiite town of Khalis, police said. Because Sunni insurgents regularly target members of the Shiite-dominated security forces in the province, the men had taken pains to travel inconspicuously, wearing civilian clothes and riding in sedans.

It was unclear whether the officers were among the 18 blindfolded men pictured earlier on a website by a group calling itself the Islamic State in Iraq. Those men were standing and kneeling in rows with their hands tied behind their backs. Some were in civilian clothes, others in combat fatigues, and at least one wore the insignia of an Iraqi officer.

At least three Diyala officers, who said they were relatives and neighbors of the slain men, could not identify any of the people shown on the website, said Maj. Raul Marquez, a U.S. military spokesman in Baqubah, the capital of Diyala province.

"The quality of the photo was low, so it is very difficult to pull out details," Marquez said by e-mail.

A statement on the site claimed the men were seized in Diyala, but it did not specify when.

"This blessed operation is a response to the crimes committed by those infidels in their fight against the Sunnis," the statement said. "The latest crime committed by these treacherous institutions was to rape our sister Sabreen."

The group threatened to kill the men within 24 hours if the government did not hand over the responsible officers and release all Sunni women in Interior Ministry prisons.

A second statement said that the government had failed to respond to the group's demands and that its court had "ordered God's verdict applied."

Brig. Gen. Abdul Karim Khalaf, a spokesman for the Interior Ministry, said the government did not negotiate with hostage-takers. He cast doubt on the group's claims.

"We can't trust the Internet sites, and those pictures might not be authentic," he said. "Anyone can make a website and put any claim they want on it."

Last week, a 20-year-old woman who called herself Sabreen alleged in a television interview that she had been raped by three Shiite officers.

The woman's tearful claims sparked outrage. Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, who has promised an evenhanded effort to quell the nation's sectarian fighting, ordered an investigation. But within 24 hours, the Shiite premier had rejected the allegations, labeling the woman a liar and insurgent collaborator wanted by the authorities.

The government's handling of the case heightened sectarian tensions and deepened Sunnis' mistrust of the security forces, which authorities acknowledge have been infiltrated by Shiite militias. A second Sunni woman later emerged claiming that soldiers raped her during a raid of her home in the city of Tall Afar.

In a third statement posted Friday, the Islamic State of Iraq group declared it was launching an "honor revenge" campaign and threatened to kill 2,000 police and militiamen "for each sister that was violated."

The grisly find in Diyala province underscored fears that as U.S. and Iraqi forces focus their attention on Baghdad, violence could escalate elsewhere.

The troubled capital has seen an apparent dip in the execution-style killings that are the hallmark of Shiite death squads since thousands of extra troops started pouring into the streets last month. But the stream of bombings typically associated with Sunni insurgents has continued.

At least four bombs exploded in and around Baghdad on Friday, killing 13 Iraqis and injuring dozens. Two U.S. soldiers and an interpreter were also reported killed and another soldier injured in one of the blasts.

One of the bombs exploded in an area of used-car dealerships on the edge of Sadr City, a vast, mostly Shiite district of east Baghdad and a stronghold of the powerful Al Mahdi militia loyal to radical anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr. The blast killed 10 people and injured 17, police said.

U.S. and Iraqi officials, wary of previous confrontations with Al Mahdi militiamen, have avoided major operations in Sadr City, fueling Sunni distrust of the security clampdown that began Feb. 13. But they have said they are nearing agreement with community leaders on plans to establish a permanent presence in the district.

Brig. Gen. Joseph Anderson, chief of staff of Multinational Corps-Iraq, said he expected construction to begin on a joint U.S.-Iraqi security station in Sadr City in the next week.

"That will be the initial footprint, if you will, in Sadr City to begin further operations before increased patrols and those type of things occur, all within a month for sure," Anderson told journalists at the Pentagon by video link from Iraq.

A car bomb targeted a police patrol in a religiously mixed district of southwest Baghdad, killing one officer and injuring three, police said.

South of the capital, a roadside bomb killed two civilians and injured 10 in Sunni-dominated Latifiya, police said.

The two U.S. soldiers and interpreter who died were the victims of an explosive device detonated during a road-clearing patrol northwest of the capital, the military said. At least 3,166 U.S. personnel have been killed since the start of the Iraq war in 2003, according to the website icasualties.org, which tracks military casualties.

Police recovered at least five bodies in Baghdad, apparent victims of sectarian death squads. Another body was found shot execution-style in Iskandariya, south of the capital, police said.

Sunni Insurgents Ascendant In Iraq's Caldron Of Violence (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

14 Police Officers Found Shot to Death After Call for Retribution in Rape Case

BAGHDAD, March 2 -- In the photos, the 18 men were blindfolded, their hands tied behind their backs. They appeared Friday on the Web site of a Sunni insurgent group that said it had kidnapped the men to avenge the alleged rape of a Sunni woman by members of Iraq's Shiite-dominated police force.

The Islamic State of Iraq said on its site that it had demanded Thursday that the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki hand over the accused policemen and free all female prisoners within 24 hours.

On Friday, officials found the bodies of 14 policemen in Diyala province east of Baghdad. All had been shot in the head.

"The government did not give any importance to their blood," the Islamic State of Iraq said. A government official said he doubted the dead were the men in the photos.

More than two weeks into a new Baghdad security plan, Sunni insurgents are asserting responsibility for an increasing number of violent attacks against U.S. and Iraqi security forces and civilian targets, while Shiite militias are lowering their profile.

In recent months, al-Qaeda in Iraq and other Sunni groups have begun to use more sophisticated tactics, downing U.S. helicopters and staging large attacks that have claimed the lives of hundreds of Iraqi civilians.

Meanwhile, the Mahdi Army, the largest and most violent Shiite militia, headed by anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, has faded from neighborhoods it once visibly controlled. Sadr, whose forces have fiercely battled U.S. troops, appears to be cooperating with the security plan, although a statement attributed to him and released Sunday warned that the plan "will not be good if it is controlled and ruled by our enemies, the occupiers."

Mahdi Army militiamen "have certainly reduced their activities in the past couple of weeks," said Lt. Col. Scott Bleichwehl, a U.S. military spokesman. "What is their long-term intention? It is absolutely too early to tell."

The total number of attacks has fallen since mid-February, U.S. and Iraqi officials say. But the resurgence of Sunni militants may represent a change in the dynamics of violence in the capital.

After the February 2006 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra and the killing of al-Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in June, Shiite militias were blamed for many of the atrocities. U.S. officials viewed them as a bigger threat than Sunni insurgents. Dismantling the power of the Shiite militias became a primary goal of the current security plan.

Sunni insurgents say they have downed at least six U.S. helicopters since Jan. 20. Since the Feb. 14 launch of the security plan, the largest attacks, purportedly by al-Qaeda in Iraq or other Sunni insurgents, have targeted Shiite-controlled areas or U.S. troops.

They include two car bombings that killed at least 60 people in a crowded market in the mostly Shiite area of New Baghdad on Feb. 18. The next day, insurgents staged a brazen assault on an American military outpost, killing three U.S. soldiers and injuring 29 in the town of Tarmiyah, 19 miles north of Baghdad.

A suicide bomber detonated an explosives belt Feb. 25 at Baghdad's Mustansiriya University, where most students are Shiite, killing dozens.

In Sunni-dominated Anbar province, insurgents allied with al-Qaeda in Iraq have clashed with security forces and Sunni tribal groups that oppose them. One such battle occurred Wednesday.

And in a new tactic, insurgents recently have blown up trucks containing chlorine, killing seven and injuring dozens.

On Friday, a car bomb detonated in the Mahdi Army stronghold of Sadr City, killing 10 and injuring 17, the most serious attack in the area in several weeks.

U.S. officials say it is unclear whether Sunni insurgents are merely taking advantage of Sadr's decision to pull back his forces or whether they have embarked on a new strategy. Bleichwehl, the U.S. military spokesman, said an array of forces, including criminal elements, are fomenting the violence.

In Friday's Sadr City bombing, witnesses said the bomber drove the vehicle into a used-car market in the Habibiya neighborhood, parked and left. The car detonated just as potential customers gathered.

"We're tired from these ugly bombings," said Ali Abu Hisham, 34, who rushed to the scene when he heard the explosion. "We cannot stand anymore seeing bodies laying on the ground."

By then, in Diyala province, the bodies of the policemen had been found.

About 11 a.m. Thursday, the police officers had left their base in the provincial capital, Baqubah, about 35 miles north of Baghdad, and were returning to their homes near the town of Jdaidat al-Shat, near Baqubah, said 1st Lt. Fouad Ahmed of the Diyala police.

The insurgents, he said, forced the policemen to stop. "They got them out of their cars at gunpoint and took them to an unknown destination," Ahmed said.

Officials learned that the men had been kidnapped only after "the families started to report that their sons were missing," said Interior Ministry spokesman Abdul Kareem al-Kinani.

DOJ_NMG_0140283

He added that he doubted that the 18 men shown on the Web site were among the slain policemen. "As for the pictures posted on the Net, we do not recognize the men in these photos. They could be fake pictures."

On Friday, the posting of the Islamic State of Iraq appeared. Nine photos showing the 18 men were displayed. Some of the men wore camouflage uniforms, while others were in civilian clothes.

The group warned that "God's verdict will be executed on them" if Iraq's "infidel government" does not comply with its demands.

The allegations of rape, rarely aired publicly in the Middle East, surfaced last week when a Sunni Arab woman went on television and accused three policemen of assaulting her. Maliki dismissed the allegations, causing a political uproar that widened the sectarian divide.

Also Friday, a roadside bomb killed two U.S. soldiers and an Iraqi interpreter northwest of Baghdad.

US, Iraqis To Build First Post In Sadr City This Week: US Military (AFP)

AFP, March 3, 2007

US forces will gain their first foothold in Baghdad's Sadr City this week, a fortified joint security station from which to patrol the stronghold of radical Shiite cleric Moqtada Sadr, a senior US military official said Friday.

Talks with the mayor of Sadr City are underway and the US military will begin building the security station this week in the populous Shiite district in east Baghdad, said Brigadier General Joseph Anderson.

"That will be the initial foot print in Sadr City to begin further operations for foot patrols and those types of things to occur. All within a month for sure," said Anderson, chief of staff of the Multi-National Forces-Iraq. He spoke to reporters here via video link from Baghdad.

The entry of US forces into Sadr City will be a key test of a new strategy to flood Baghdad with US and Iraq forces to break a cycle of sectarian violence that has engulfed it in chaos.

Sadr City's mayor Sheikh Rahim al-Daraji is close to Moqtada Sadr, but Anderson said the talks have gone well.

"To the surprise of all of us the mayor has been very cooperative, and there is good dialogue going on the future operations and security of Sadr City, which if you'd asked us a month ago we probably wouldn't have thought that," he said.

Daraji said in a telephone interview with AFP earlier that agreement had been reached with US and Iraqi commanders on technical details of the Baghdad security plan, and that a joint security station would begin operating March 13.

He said the fortified stations would be located at the entrance to Sadr City.

But Daraji said there would be no cooperation with a special US-Iraqi unit that has been conducting arrests.

Anderson said levels of violence have subsided but there are still Shiite militia attacks, primarily with armor piercing explosives that the US has charged are coming into the country from Iran.

He estimated that attacks in Baghdad, which typically run from 85 to 90 a day, are down about 10 to 20 a day, he said.

The district's unofficial name honors Moqtada Sadr's father, a prominent Shia cleric, Grand Ayatollah Mohammed Sadiq al-Sadr, who was was assassinated in 1999 -- almost certainly on the orders of former dictator Saddam Hussein.

An Iraqi Tribal Chief Opposes The Jihadists, And Prays (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

BAGHDAD, March 2 — The sheik stared at the cake that the hotel workers had brought up to his room as a gift. Across the red gelatinlike surface was written, “God protect you from the enemies and keep you for the Iraqi people.”

God is indeed his guardian, said the sheik, Abdul Sattar Buzaigh al-Rishawi. So were the three burly Iraqi men standing outside the door of his suite here in the Mansour Hotel, and the five others by the elevators at the end of the hall. They had walkie-talkies, Kalashnikov rifles and camouflage vests stuffed with ammunition clips.

The sheik needs as much protection as loyalty and prayers can bring, not to mention money. He is the public face of the Sunni Arab tribes in lawless Anbar Province who have turned against the Sunni jihadists of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, many of whom belong to other, sometimes more militant Iraqi tribes.

“I swear to God, if we have good weapons, if we have good vehicles, if we have good support, I can fight Al Qaeda all the way to Afghanistan,” he said recently as he sat smoking in a dark jacket and brown robes while meeting with a sheik from another Sunni tribe in his hotel room.

Sheik Abdul Sattar, a wiry 35-year-old with a thin goatee who comes from the provincial capital, Ramadi, is the most outspoken Sunni tribal figure in the country who is fighting, at least for now, on the side of the Shiite-led Iraqi government and the American military.

DOJ_NMG_0140284

He has met three times with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki since announcing his campaign in September, and there is talk that the sheik has received large amounts of money from the Iraqi government or the Americans. His face has been shown in anti-insurgent commercials on the government-run Iraqiya television network.

But Sheik Abdul Sattar, as he is known to Iraqis and American commanders, complains that he does not get nearly enough financial or military support. "We don't have enough weapons, cars, uniforms," he said.

Part of the sheik's mission is rooted in the tribal law of revenge. His father was killed by Al Qaeda in 2004 for opposing its kind of fundamentalism. Two brothers were abducted and never heard from again, and a third brother was shot dead, he said. He has survived three car bombs outside the home he shares with his wife and five children.

Residents in parts of Anbar say the split in the Sunni insurgency is widening, with moderate tribal leaders and nationalist guerrillas pitted against fundamentalist warriors and rival tribes. That has led to a sharp increase in Sunni-on-Sunni violence across Anbar, especially in the past week, deepening the chaos of Iraq's civil war.

Al Qaeda remains a major force, and the relentless violence from all sides has turned the province into a failed region, according to a classified Marine intelligence assessment that was leaked to reporters last year.

As part of a broad review of options in Iraq, President Bush is looking at whether to give greater support to Sunni Arab tribal leaders who have grown disillusioned with the radical arm of the insurgency. It is a strategy long urged by officials in Sunni-dominated Saudi Arabia and now vigorously backed by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

The effort would have echoes of the American military's promotion of South Vietnamese "village militias" during the Vietnam War, which some American counterinsurgency experts say was a relative success.

Sheik Abdul Sattar and the Anbar Salvation Council, the group of 25 tribes that the sheik said he had helped pull together to fight Al Qaeda, would be central to any such move by the Americans.

The sheik said he and his allies, who also call themselves the Anbar Awakening, had recruited 6,000 fighters from the tribes into the Anbar police, helped appoint a new provincial police chief and formed a 2,500-member "emergency brigade" answering to him.

A United States Army civil affairs officer in Ramadi, Capt. Travis L. Patriquin, said in an e-mail message shortly before he was killed by a roadside bomb in Ramadi in December that the tribal fighters in the Iraqi police constituted "the first successful, large force of men we've had since the start of the war."

The captain wrote of Sheik Abdul Sattar, "He is the most effective local leader in Ramadi I believe the coalition has worked with since they arrived in Anbar in 2003."

Once the Anbar Salvation Council began its recruitment efforts, more than 300 people a month signed up to join the Iraqi police, up from just 30 in May, Captain Patriquin said. American commanders have armed the recruits with weapons, munitions and vehicles provided by the Iraqi Interior Ministry. The Americans have also taken the recruits to academies in Jordan or Baghdad for schooling and given them a week of specialized combat training at an American base in Ramadi.

The plan has risks. The Americans and governing Shiite parties could be building up a Sunni militia that will eventually turn against them, as one such group, the Falluja Brigade, did in 2004 after the Marines handed it control of Falluja.

Some moderate Sunni sheiks in Anbar have said that for purposes of survival, they might be forced to ally themselves with Al Qaeda if the American military and, in particular, the Shiite-led Iraqi government did not provide them with more money and weapons, given the powerful presence of Al Qaeda in the province.

Sheik Abdul Sattar speaks of the Iraqi government with ambivalence, praising its stated goals while criticizing its ties to Shiite militias and its ignorance of the power of the tribes.

"They're not cooperative, and they don't want security," he said. "This is true of all the political blocs."

He has been to Baghdad twice to ask senior Iraqi officials for financial backing and equipment. He has met with the prime minister and with Jawad al-Bolani, the interior minister. But he said Iraqi leaders here were reluctant to give him what he needed to fight Al Qaeda.

An adviser to the Iraqi cabinet on tribal affairs, Sheik Minahi Minshid Hussein al-Shammari, said the government had responded to Sheik Abdul Sattar's requests "within a limited capacity," because "this is what the government can give."

"The government extends a hand to anyone who wants to cooperate," he added.

The formation of the group in September shocked many Sunni Arabs. It was the most public stand anyone in Anbar had taken against Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, which was founded by the Jordanian militant Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. In November, Sheik Harith al-Dhari, the leader of the Muslim Scholars Association, a hard-line Sunni religious group that calls itself the "legitimate resistance," denounced the Anbar Salvation Council in a television interview, saying, "They don't represent the Anbar tribes, and they are a group of criminals and thugs."

DOJ_NMG_0140285

Sheik Abdul Sattar said his tribe, the Rishawi, which accounts for a tenth of the 400,000 residents of Ramadi, had always tried to make peace with the Americans in Anbar. That was one reason his father was killed while attending a funeral more than two years ago, he said. Al Qaeda had begun killing sheiks and clerics, even selling videos of the crimes.

"They became people who didn't distinguish between right and wrong, and that's when we believed these people were terrorists," he said.

Recent violence in Anbar has underscored the brutality of the fighting among the Sunnis there.

Two soccer players in Ramadi had been shot dead in front of teammates by masked gunmen who had accused them of having ties to the Anbar Salvation Council. On Thursday, a car bomb in Falluja killed at least seven people in a policeman's wedding party, while intense fighting broke out in Amariyat, a community to the south where residents say tribes aligned with Al Qaeda have been battling nationalist insurgent groups.

A car bomb next to a Ramadi mosque killed 15 people on Monday, and a truck bomb exploded in Habbaniya on Feb. 24, killing at least 31 people and wounding dozens, outside a Sunni mosque where the imam had been preaching resistance to Al Qaeda.

In their clashes with Al Qaeda, the sheik's tribal fighters have captured about 80 militants and put them into a "prison" in Ramadi, the sheik said.

Saudis and Syrians were among them, he said. The Saudis, under interrogation, said they had been recruited in their home country by being shown anti-American propaganda, including images of prisoner abuse at Abu Ghraib, the sheik said. Then they were shipped off to Syria to enter Iraq.

The sheik has little love for the Syrian government. One morning as he ate breakfast in his hotel room, a television program about the assassination of the Lebanese cabinet member Pierre Gemayel on Nov. 21 came on. "This is all Syria's doing," he said. "Syria is doing bad things."

Just as nefarious is Iran, with its ties to the Shiite militias, Sheik Abdul Sattar said.

"In my personal opinion, and in the opinion of most of the wise men of Anbar, if the American forces leave right now, there will be civil war and the area will fall into total chaos," he said. "If we complete the police and the army, if we make them strong enough, it'll be possible for the American forces to leave and go home, and they'll be friends of the Iraqis."

The evening call to prayer echoed through the streets of Baghdad as he ended the talk. Darkness had fallen. The sheik got up to show two foreign visitors from his room, warning them that no one could ensure their safety at that hour.

Four of his men were shot dead while driving through the capital the previous day, he said, and they surely would not be the last.

Women At War Are Fighting To Serve (DMN)

By Gretel C. Kovach

The Dallas Morning News, March 3, 2007

Female troops take on combat role despite doubters

Rachael Franklin was a headstrong high school student, bright and athletic, when her mother finally gave up and called the military recruiter.

Grounding her hadn't forced her daughter to follow orders. So Mom turned to the U.S. Army.

"She thought I'd be a secretary or something," Capt. Franklin recalled, amused. "She should have known better."

Military women fire off far more than typewritten memos these days. And the battlefields of Iraq and Afghanistan have been their proving ground. More women than ever are close to combat or have actual combat roles, and the government and military leaders continue to struggle with the question of where and how to set limits.

Capt. Franklin, 27, is an Apache pilot, one of three female attack helicopter pilots who deployed to Iraq this fall with the 1st Cavalry Division's 1st Battalion, 227th Aviation Regiment based at Fort Hood, Texas.

The last of the division's 19,000 troops arrived in Iraq in December, following the Air Combat Aviation Brigade overseas for a second yearlong deployment in Iraq. The troopers relieved another Fort Hood unit, the 4th Infantry Division.

Capt. Franklin spent almost a decade preparing to fly one of the most ferocious weapons in the Army arsenal.

Now, in one of the few direct combat roles open to women, her mission in the skies over Baghdad is to stalk hostile forces threatening U.S. troops – and destroy them.

During a break from grueling pre-deployment training, Capt. Franklin climbed into the cockpit of an AH-64D and explained why she chose the Apache.

Other helicopters fly faster and carry more troops. But Apache pilots can dive up close to a target and unleash the fury of Hellfire missiles, rockets and 30 mm cannons.

"If you're going to go to war, you might as well go with the biggest guns," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0140286

Though women are still barred from infantry and other ground combat units, this is the first war in which female U.S. troops have been authorized to shoot back. And they have – as helicopter gunners, military police, and even truck drivers forced to defend themselves on a battlefield with no clear frontlines.

Involved in all aspects

Lt. Col. Christopher Walach, the 1-227th's commanding officer, said female soldiers and leaders are integrated into every aspect of his battalion, from maintenance and support to administration and piloting of their fleet of Longbow Apache helicopters.

The women did "an absolutely outstanding job preparing themselves, their soldiers, and their equipment for combat," said Col. Walach, 40, of Las Vegas.

"But I look at all my aviators as aviators. We all receive the same training. We all perform at the same high level. It's immaterial, male or female," he said.

Today about 15 percent of the military is female. Advocates for women in the military say their contributions are vital as the armed forces struggle to keep pace with the demands of fighting two wars.

But the frontline service of these women has reignited another conflict – the battle on the home front between those who feel women soldiers should be entitled to the same opportunities as their male counterparts and those who believe the armed forces have already pushed them too far.

Congress debated legislation last year that would have barred women from ground combat support units. A compromise amendment signed into law this year required that the military get congressional approval before it makes changes that put women in new direct combat roles.

Retired Air Force Brig. Gen. Wilma Vaught said the Iraq War has forced the military to use female troops in new ways and has disproved some of the myths about how they would perform.

"It's the nature of the conflict and the size of the force we have deployed," said Gen. Vaught, president of the Women in Military Service for America Memorial Foundation. "We have to use everybody we've got."

Thrived in the military

Capt. Franklin, a tall, self-possessed young woman with freckles and eye shadow around her blue eyes, alternates between seriousness and giggles when she reflects on her career as a female attack helicopter pilot.

Her mother cried when she headed to basic training, rethinking her earlier enthusiasm. But Capt. Franklin thrived in the military.

She was selected for West Point and flight school, where she promptly chose the Apache.

"That was the most combat role I could do as a female. The most challenging, the most interesting," she said. "That's the main purpose of the Army, to fight. And being a female, you can't go infantry or armor, so you do the best you can."

Capt. Franklin said even some of her friends in the military are opposed to allowing women in ground combat units.

"Some of [their reasons] I agree with and some of them I think are bull," she said. "If you can handle the standards, you can handle it."

After what was generally seen as a positive performance by women in the Persian Gulf War, rules excluding women from jobs that directly exposed them to hostile fire or capture were rescinded. Women cannot serve in armor, Special Forces, field artillery or combat engineer units, but they can fly attack helicopters and attack aircraft that provide close air support for them.

Capt. Franklin's choice of aircraft carried a great responsibility, not just as a woman, but as a human being, she said – the responsibility to kill.

"You've got to take it seriously," she said. "Every single person who flies or even carries a weapon has to sit down and ask himself, 'Would I be willing to pull the trigger?'

"I decided I can."

More than 70 women service members have died in Iraq since the start of the war. Women have been captured. They have dragged wounded soldiers to safety. They have shot their way out of ambushes and earned the Silver Star for exceptional valor.

A greater loss?

Although many female troops insist that their lives are worth no more than the next man in uniform, the nation has grieved more deeply for the mothers, daughters, sisters and wives who became casualties of these wars.

And some women soldiers say the deaths of their female comrades have sometimes resulted in restrictions being placed on them.

Sgt. Tawana Varice, 35, of Natchitoches, La., a soft-spoken mother of two boys, joined the 1st Cavalry Division's 2nd Battalion, 5th Cavalry Regiment after the unit returned from Iraq. She was a truck driver, but was reassigned as a clerk.

A female truck driver had been killed in combat in Iraq, and the battalion commanders weren't eager to put another woman in harm's way, she said.

DOJ_NMG_0140287

Eventually, Sgt. Varice went back to driving a truck, and she is now one of several female drivers in the battalion. But it took awhile for her commanders to relent.

"They were kind of shook up," she remembered.

Effect on military moms

Also of concern is the impact of repeat deployments on families and military moms, who account for about 35 percent of the 346,000 female troops serving in the active duty and reserves.

Some say the focus on military mothers is overstated because fathers are equally concerned about long family separations.

Others say the reality is that mothers carry more responsibility for home life, which makes it harder for them to serve in the military during a time of war.

"I think we do have other things to think about," said Capt. Kennon Etheridge, 27, of Milledgeville, Ga., a 1st Cavalry Division preventive medicine officer with a young stepson. "I think guys, maybe they can leave their families easier. Girls, they have to make other arrangements."

Many female soldiers wait to marry or have children until they leave the military. Others do their best to juggle the demands of service and home.

Spc. Holly Jensen, 30, of Copperas Cove said her biggest concern before deploying with III Corps 7th Mobile Public Affairs Detachment was lining up enough home improvement projects to keep her husband too busy to miss her during the year in Iraq.

"He was in the military, so he understands," she said.

Capt. Franklin, the Apache pilot, said she was looking forward to her first tour of duty in Iraq.

She'd lost a couple of friends already in the war. A few more were injured by roadside bombs.

"Now it's my turn to go and contribute," she said, in the final days before the battalion left Texas.

And she doesn't care what anyone thinks about women going to war.

"I don't get in those battles," she said. "You know what? We're here and we're doing the job, just as well [as men] and with just as much pride. "

A Shared Stake In Iraq's Future (WP)

By Zalmay Khalilzad

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

How the Oil Agreement Points the Way Forward

Under the national hydrocarbon law approved this week by Iraq's Council of Ministers, oil will serve as a vehicle to unify Iraq and will give all Iraqis a shared stake in their country's future. This is a significant achievement for Iraqis' national reconciliation. It demonstrates that the leaders of Iraq's principal communities can pull together to peacefully resolve difficult issues of national importance.

Resolving concerns about control of oil is central to overcoming internal divisions in Iraq. The country has the third-largest oil reserves in the world, and more than 90 percent of federal income comes from oil revenue. The effective and equitable management of these resources is critical to economic growth as well as to developing a greater sense of shared purpose among Iraqi communities.

The goal of Iraq's leaders was to draft a law that ensured that all Iraqis could be confident they would receive their fair share of the benefits of developing the country's resources, that the revenue from oil and gas would enable a decentralization of power while maintaining national unity, and that Iraq would adopt the best international practices for the development and management of its mineral wealth. By these standards, the hydrocarbon law is a great success. It:

Â· Reaffirms that oil and gas resources are owned by all the people of Iraq and contains a firm commitment to revenue-sharing among regions and provinces on the basis of population.

Â· Establishes a predictable framework and processes for federal-regional cooperation that demonstrate the government's commitment to democracy and federalism.

Â· Creates a principal policymaking body for energy -- the Federal Council on Oil and Gas -- that will have representatives from all of Iraq's regions and oil-producing provinces.

Â· Ensures that all revenue from oil sales will go into a single national account and that provinces will receive direct shares of revenue, thereby significantly increasing local control of financial resources.

Â· Establishes international standards for transparency and mandates public disclosure of contracts and associated revenue and payments. This is essential to build confidence in the new political order and to counter corruption.

The law defines a role for the Oil Ministry that is primarily regulatory, which is the modern standard and which will also harness the market to achieve the optimal development of Iraq's resources. It provides the legal framework to enable international investment in Iraq's oil and gas sectors, a break from the statist and overcentralized practices of the past. It also requires best practices in environmental protection and field management and development, ensuring that the environment is not damaged and that hydrocarbon assets are not wasted by poor practices of the past.

While the draft law will need to be enacted by the Iraqi Council of Representatives when it returns from recess, the prospects for passage are excellent because all the major parliamentary blocs are represented in the cabinet. Companion legislation will be required in several areas, and Iraqi leaders hope to complete the entire package of hydrocarbon legislation by the end of May.

Arriving at this agreement was not easy. It has taken other countries years to complete such legislation. While negotiating this law presented special challenges for the federal government, the Kurdistan regional government and the leaders of key political blocs, the approval of the draft by the Council of Ministers sets a precedent for problem-solving and cooperation that is critical to the stabilization and development of Iraq.

This is the first time since 2003 that all major Iraqi communities have come together on a defining piece of legislation. A national reconciliation that stabilizes Iraq can be achieved if similar compromises are made on the future of de-Baathification and on amending the constitution. The agreement on the oil law should give us confidence that Iraqis are willing and able to take the steps needed for Iraq's success.

Arrest In Pakistan Spurs Hope Of Stronger Effort (WP)

By Griff Witte, Kamran Khan

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, March 3 -- The arrest of a senior Taliban leader in a Pakistani city long reputed to be a haven for the group kindled guarded hope among Western and Afghan security officials Friday that the government here plans to move more aggressively against insurgents taking refuge on its territory.

The arrest, confirmed by two senior Pakistani intelligence officials, marks the first time since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks that authorities here have acknowledged apprehending or killing a senior Taliban commander on Pakistani soil. It comes as Pakistan faces pressure from the Bush administration to step up its involvement in a counterinsurgency campaign that has foundered in the past year, with Taliban attacks in Afghanistan becoming more deadly and audacious.

Obaidullah Akhund, arrested hours after Vice President Cheney made a visit to Islamabad this week, is a former Taliban defense minister and is viewed in intelligence circles as one of the highest-ranking figures in the Islamic movement, which U.S.-led forces drove from power in Afghanistan in late 2001.

Col. Tom Collins, a spokesman for the international security force that patrols Afghanistan, said Friday its forces were not involved in any operation against Akhund but that his arrest by Pakistan would be "a very good development."

"He's what we would consider tier-one Taliban," Collins said.

Pakistani officials would not comment for the record Friday. While the arrest is likely to bolster Pakistan's counterterrorism bona fides, it is also potentially embarrassing: Akhund was caught in the southern Pakistani city of Quetta, where terrorism analysts believe much of the Taliban leadership resides, though Pakistan denies it.

Afghan officials have long asserted that Pakistan's government is either looking the other way as insurgents recruit and train on its soil or actively aiding the Taliban's cause. In recent months, U.S. officials have become sharply critical as well, saying Pakistan must crack down on border sanctuaries.

Cheney, traveling this week with the deputy director of the CIA, repeated that message here Monday to Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf. The next day, Cheney was in the largest U.S. air base in Afghanistan when a suicide bomber struck just outside the base's gate, killing 23 people.

A senior Pakistani intelligence official said Friday that the night Cheney left Pakistan for Afghanistan, Pakistani authorities arrested Akhund in Quetta. The arrest was reported Friday in the New York Times and in the Pakistani newspaper Dawn.

"It's pure coincidence and our good luck that we found . . . Obaidullah within 24 hours of Cheney's visit," said the official, who spoke from Quetta and on condition of anonymity. The official said the arrest begins a new thrust by Pakistani intelligence agencies to arrest about 100 prominent Taliban members.

A second senior intelligence official, in Islamabad, confirmed the initiative and said it was based on "massive intelligence-sharing that has been going on between us, Americans, NATO and Afghans."

Some analysts questioned whether Pakistan really would be more aggressive. In recent years, Pakistan has carried out raids on al-Qaeda targets to coincide with visits from Western officials. "The Pakistanis have done it again," said Marvin Weinbaum, scholar-in-residence at the Middle East Institute in Washington. "They've come up with a high-profile person at just the right time."

DOJ_NMG_0140289

A senior Afghan official said: "We hope that more of these arrests are made, and not just for show when Vice President Cheney comes to town."

Khan reported from Karachi, Pakistan.

Pakistan: Roadside Blast Wounds Judge (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

A bomb rigged to a bicycle exploded near a car carrying a judge to his court in central Multan, seriously wounding him and killing his driver, a policeman and a third man. The judge, Mian Bashir Bhatti, often hears cases against suspected militants and terrorists. Two weeks ago, a suicide bomber blew himself up in a packed courtroom in southwestern Quetta, killing 15 people, including a senior judge.

NATO Short On Troops In Afghanistan (WP/AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor,

The Washington Post/AP, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Signs of a new spring offensive by Taliban insurgents in Afghanistan have begun to emerge, but NATO commanders are still short more than 1,000 combat troops, despite repeated requests to allied nations, the top commander said Friday.

U.S. Gen. John Craddock told reporters that while the allies are winning more battles with insurgents, they are losing the counter-narcotics war, and more work and greater coordination is needed in the reconstruction effort.

Craddock said there has already been a slight increase in suicide attacks and roadside bombs _ the beginnings of an expected increase in violence as the weather improves. And he said he is still short by as much as two battalions, largely combat units, despite recent commitments for about 7,000 additional troops there, including more than 3,500 from the United States. A battalion is generally about 800 soldiers.

Craddock also said that 30 percent to 40 percent of the 25 provincial reconstruction teams working to rebuild the country do not have all the people they need, particularly State Department and agricultural experts. In those cases, he said the agencies either have no presence or not enough people on the teams, which number about 100 people.

The teams are small units of troops and civilian personnel placed around the country supporting local authorities and aid groups with security and assisting in setting up essential services for the provinces.

More agricultural experts are considered critical because officials are struggling to control a drug crop that dominates the country's economy and provides key financing for the insurgency. Opium production from poppies in Afghanistan last year rose 49 percent to 6,700 tons _ or enough to make about 670 tons of heroin, more than 90 percent of the world's supply.

Lt. Gen. Douglas Lute told the Senate Armed Services Committee on Thursday that there are typically one or two State Department specialists and an Agriculture Department specialist on the teams, because the economy is so reliant on agriculture. The rest of the team is largely military, including civil affairs and psychological operations officers. The U.S. is responsible for 12 of the 25 teams, which are assigned to provinces.

Craddock also agreed that Pakistan must do more to control its border, as Taliban and other insurgents continue to flow through the region into Afghanistan.

"NATO will not be able to prevail, ... will never control the border, without greater control of the border areas by Pakistan and greater coordination and cooperation between Pakistan and Afghanistan," said Craddock.

He said both countries need to put up more checkpoints and inspection stations along the border, and there needs to be more political cooperation between the two nations.

Craddock said the countries are making progress in efforts to cooperate more, and there is some expectation there will be increased political dialogue between the two governments this spring. And overall, he said, he is encouraged by the progress he is seeing.

While saying there will still be challenges particularly this spring, he said, "between the security aspect that's presently there and what NATO is capable of ... partnered with the reconstruction, we're seeing some progress and we're seeing increased capabilities."

Currently there are about 26,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan. Roughly 15,000 of them are serving in the NATO-led force, which now totals about 35,000. The other 11,000 are special operations forces or are training Afghan troops.

The Wider War (WSJ)

By Michael A. Ledeen

The Wall Street Journal, March 3, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0140290

The papers and airwaves are full of stories about an impending American assault on Iran. Some accounts claim we will target their nuclear facilities. Others speak of a far more ambitious attack designed to destroy the Islamic Republic's regime. Whatever the truth of these stories -- vigorously denied by the Bush administration -- we are clearly paying much more attention to Iran than we did in the past, and this is a good thing.

The terror war now extends to four continents -- running from Thailand and Indonesia to India and Pakistan, down the Horn of Africa to Somalia and Yemen and back up to Afghanistan, on to Iraq, Palestine/Israel, Lebanon, and thence to Europe and the United States. To restrict our national debate to Iraq and Afghanistan alone is to accept the failure of strategic vision that has plagued us from the war's earliest days.

We have decided to fight in one place at a time, secure that area, and then move on. That isn't good enough, because it gives our enemies the luxury of attacking us where, when and how they choose. Neither Iraq nor Afghanistan will ever have decent security so long as we only play defense; we have to attack our enemies when we wish, not respond to their initiatives, and their most important operational bases are outside Iraq and Afghanistan.

Our primary enemies are states, which provide the jihadis with much of the wherewithal for their operations: intelligence, weapons and other technology (including the advanced explosive devices Iran gives the terrorists in Iraq), false documents, safe havens and training facilities. (For a long time they needed money, too, but nowadays ransoms and drug profits have eased the burden on their state financiers.)

Until the fall of Saddam, there were four pre-eminent supporters of terrorist groups: Iraq, Iran, Syria and Saudi Arabia. Now there are three, and, as it has been all along, Iran is by far the most important. The Iranians created Hezbollah, probably the most lethal terrorist organization in the world, as well as Islamic Jihad. In all, they support no less than 30 terror groups, both Sunni and Shiite, including al Qaeda (several of whose leaders have been operating from Iran since the liberation of Afghanistan).

Syria works hand in mailed glove with the mullahs in Lebanon and Iraq. The Saudis provide money for terrorist groups and support a global network of radical Wahhabi mosques and schools that indoctrinate young Muslims in the ways of jihad.

Without the active support of those three countries, it would be a lot easier to defeat the terrorists on the battlefields. Without Syrian and Iranian support, Hezbollah would shrivel up and die. Ditto for Islamic Jihad, whose leader, the former Florida-based academic Ramadan Abdullah Shallah, recently met in Tehran with Iranian leaders, plus Hezbollah's operational chief, Imad Mughniyah, and Iraqi militia leader Moqtada al-Sadr.

Al Qaeda would be similarly weakened, and the many Palestinian terrorist organizations that keep their offices in Damascus would find it very difficult to relocate and maintain their effectiveness. All would be weakened by the loss of Saudi funding, and moderate Muslims everywhere, including in the U.S, would breathe a sigh of relief if the Wahhabi mosques were closed.

It doesn't require more boots on the ground or bombing raids. It requires a traditional American policy: support for democratic revolution against our tyrannical enemies.

Iran is the keystone of the terrorist edifice. Should there be free elections, no one wearing a turban would be elected to anything, and there is good reason to believe the country is ripe for a pro-Western democratic revolution.

The regime clearly has a cash-flow problem; its failure to meet scheduled payments has driven its friends, the Russians, to suspend construction of the Bushehr nuclear reactor. There are also demonstrations against it all over the country -- and no wonder, with more than 40% of the young population (two-thirds under 30 years of age) below the poverty line, widespread drug addiction, and thousands of women sold into sex slavery every year.

Nor is it surprising that some of the oppressed minorities have launched armed attacks against the Revolutionary Guards Corps and the fanatical Basij forces, the regime's prime instruments of oppression. There are open denunciations of President Ahmadinejad, of former President Rafsanjani and even of Supreme Leader Khamenei. All this is taking place against the background of the cancer-ridden Khamenei (who is expected to die in the near future), and a thinly veiled struggle for succession.

Pro-democracy organizations in Iran believe they can bring down the regime if they receive support from the U.S., of the same sort we gave to Solidarity in Poland, the Aquino forces in the Philippines, the Cedar revolutionaries in Lebanon, the Orange revolutionaries in the Ukraine, and so many others. They wish our leaders would openly endorse regime change, and they would like our radios and television to support freedom instead of apologizing for the mullahs.

We should call for Western trade unions to build a strike fund for Iranian workers, many of whom have not been paid for months, some for more than a year, and we should provide sympathetic Iranians with laptops, servers, cell and satellite phones and phone cards, so that they can communicate with one another.

Regime change in Iran does not require an invasion, or even the sort of bombing so many are now advocating in order to thwart the mullahs' program to build atomic bombs. The issue is the regime, not its instruments; thousands of Americans have already been killed and wounded by Iran's terror army. We should assault the mullahs with our most potent weapons, which are primarily political. The recent sanctions against Iran are welcome, but support for freedom is the key to regime change in Tehran.

The mullahs know their doom will come from their own people, which is why they have embarked on a new wave of mass repression, with a spate of public hangings in the Kurdish, Balouch and Ahwaz areas, a wave of arrests of pro-democracy leaders in Tehran and Isfahan (the most famous face of the Iranian resistance, Ahmad Batebi, reportedly suffered a stroke in the mullahs' torture chambers, and is now in a coma).

In Khuzestan -- the oil region in the south -- there are plans for a massive program of ethnic cleansing, moving more than a million Arabs to other regions. It brings back memories of Stalin's efforts to destroy Soviet "nationalities." All these actions bespeak a profound insecurity in Tehran, just waiting for the free world to exploit.

A free Iran would deliver a devastating global blow to the terrorists, and would no doubt change the calculus -- and perhaps the regime -- of Syria. Under those happy circumstances, we might muster the will to insist that the Saudis shut down the Wahhabi schools and mosques, which constitute an assembly line of fanatics all over the world.

It's an ambitious strategy, but we are an ambitious people. We are engaged in a global war, and while we have done well in many respects, we have thus far refused to recognize the real nature of the fight.

Mr. Ledeen is the freedom scholar at the American Enterprise Institute.

DOJ:

White House Backed U.S. Attorney Firings, Officials Say (WP)

By John Solomon, Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

The White House approved the firings of seven U.S. attorneys late last year after senior Justice Department officials identified the prosecutors they believed were not doing enough to carry out President Bush's policies on immigration, firearms and other issues, White House and Justice Department officials said yesterday.

The list of prosecutors was assembled last fall, based largely on complaints from members of Congress, law enforcement officials and career Justice Department lawyers, administration officials said.

One of the complaints came from Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.), who specifically raised concerns with the Justice Department last fall about the performance of then-U.S. Attorney David C. Iglesias of New Mexico, according to administration officials and Domenici's office.

Iglesias has alleged that two unnamed New Mexico lawmakers pressured him in October to speed up the indictments of Democrats before the elections. Domenici has declined to comment on that allegation.

Since the mass firings were carried out three months ago, Justice Department officials have consistently portrayed them as personnel decisions based on the prosecutors' "performance-related" problems. But, yesterday, officials acknowledged that the ousters were based primarily on the administration's unhappiness with the prosecutors' policy decisions and revealed the White House's role in the matter.

"At the end of the day, this was a decision to pick the prosecutors we felt would most effectively carry out the department's policies and priorities in the last two years," said Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse.

Officials portrayed the firings as part of a routine process, saying the White House did not play any role in identifying which U.S. attorneys should be removed or encourage the dismissals. The administration previously said that the White House counsel recommended a GOP replacement for one U.S. attorney, in Arkansas, but did not say that the White House approved the seven other firings.

"If any agency wants to make a change regarding a presidential appointee, they run that change by the White House counsel's office," said White House spokeswoman Dana Perino. "That is standard operating procedure, and that is what happened here. The White House did not object to the Justice Department decision."

The seven prosecutors were first identified by the Justice Department's senior leadership shortly before the November elections, officials said. The final decision was supported by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and his deputy, Paul J. McNulty, and cleared with the White House counsel's office, including deputy counsel William Kelly, they said.

The firings have sparked outrage from Democrats and some Republicans in Congress as details emerge about the unusual decision to remove so many at once on Dec. 7, in the middle of the administration's term. The issue escalated this week with the allegations from Iglesias, who has said he will name the two New Mexico lawmakers who called him if he is asked under oath.

DOJ_NMG_0140292

The House Judiciary Committee has issued subpoenas for Iglesias and three other fired prosecutors, who are set to testify in both the House and the Senate on Tuesday. Lawmakers plan to press for answers, including what triggered the creation of the list and who else was involved.

Most of the prosecutors have said they were given no reason for their dismissals and have responded angrily to the Justice Department's contention that they were fired because of their performance. At least five of the prosecutors, including Iglesias, were presiding over public corruption investigations when they were fired, but Justice Department officials have said that those probes played no role in the dismissals.

Domenici's office confirmed yesterday that it had raised concerns with the Justice Department about Iglesias's office, particularly on immigration.

"We had very legitimate concerns expressed to us by hundreds of New Mexicans -- in the media, in the legal communities and just regular citizens -- about the resources that were available to the U.S. attorney," said Steve Bell, Domenici's chief of staff.

Domenici and his aides have declined to comment on whether the lawmaker called Iglesias. Any communication by a senator or House member with a federal prosecutor regarding an ongoing criminal investigation is a violation of ethics rules.

The fired prosecutors in San Diego and Nevada are registered independents, while the rest are generally viewed as moderate Republicans, according to administration officials and many of the fired prosecutors.

In a recent briefing with lawmakers, McNulty said one factor in the decision to create the list of U.S. attorneys was the concern raised by various members of Congress and law enforcement officials that some U.S. attorneys were not following Bush administration policies or federal sentencing rules, administration officials said.

The Justice Department received several letters dating to 2005 and signed by more than a dozen California lawmakers, mostly Republicans, raising concerns about then-U.S. Attorney Carol S. Lam's approach to prosecuting immigration cases. Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California, a Democrat, also wrote Gonzales in June, saying that the "low prosecution rates have a demoralizing effect on the men and women patrolling our nation's borders."

On the job less than a year, McNulty consulted his predecessor as deputy attorney general, James B. Comey, about some of the prosecutors before approving the list, officials said. Comey, who did not return a telephone call seeking comment yesterday, praised Iglesias earlier this week as one of the department's best prosecutors.

The seven prosecutors outside Arkansas were informed about their ousters on Dec. 7, after the White House counsel's office signed off.

A few days before the firings, administration officials began the traditional process of calling lawmakers in the affected states to inform them about the decisions and to gather early input on possible successors, officials said.

Although the White House approved the firings, two administration officials said the counsel's office did not suggest replacements. But the officials said White House political affairs officials keep databases on potential job candidates that Justice Department officials could have accessed if they chose.

An administration official said White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten does not recall whether he was briefed about the firings before they occurred.

Privately, White House officials acknowledged that the administration mishandled the firings by not explaining more clearly to lawmakers that a large group was being terminated at once -- which is unusual -- and that the reason was the policy performance review.

Prosecutor Declined To Testify For Congress (AP)

AP, March 3, 2007

The former U.S. attorney for Nevada said he declined an invitation to testify voluntarily before a congressional panel investigating the removal of at least eight federal prosecutors around the nation.

But Daniel Bogden, who has said he was not given a reason for his removal this week, said he would appear if compelled by subpoena to appear before the House Judiciary Committee's subcommittee on commercial and administrative law.

Bogden did not immediately respond Friday to requests for comment. The 51-year-old prosecutor is one of several federal prosecutors removed in recent weeks by the Justice Department. His last day was Wednesday. No successor has been named.

On Thursday, Bogden told reporters that he remained unsure why he was removed.

Bogden told the Las Vegas Review-Journal that Michael Battle, director of the executive office for U.S. attorneys, did not provide a reason when he asked Bogden on Dec. 7 to step down from the post he had held since 2001.

Bogden said other Justice Department officials told him that the decision was reached at the highest levels of the department.

"I was given an explanation that seemed to me to be political in nature, that had nothing to do with any issues with my performance or issues with the performance of my office," Bogden said.

DOJ_NMG_0140293

He noted that Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty on Feb. 6 told the Senate Judiciary Committee and the dismissals of federal prosecutors were performance-related.

U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the president, but congressional Democrats have raised concerns that the Bush administration might be punishing prosecutors for being too effective at pursuing political corruption cases.

Democrats on a House Judiciary subcommittee voted Thursday to subpoena fired prosecutors Carol Lam of California, David Iglesias of New Mexico, H.E. "Bud" Cummins of Arkansas and John McKay of Washington.

Iglesias said this week that he believes he was dismissed because he resisted pressure by two members of Congress to rush indictments before 2006's election in an investigation of an alleged Democratic kickback scheme. He has refused to name the lawmakers who called him.

Rep. Heather Wilson Grilled By Reporters On Role In Firing (ALBTRIB)

Albuquerque Tribune, March 3, 2007

A brief news conference called today by Rep. Heather Wilson on veterans affairs devolved into a grilling over questions about former U.S. Attorney David Iglesias.

Wilson, after meeting with officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs, spoke to about four or five reporters about treatment of veterans from Iraq and Afghanistan.

After a couple of questions on that issue, the reporters turned their questioning to Iglesias - specifically, whether Wilson called him in the weeks before the Nov. 7 election to inquire about a high-profile corruption case being investigated by his office.

"I have said very little about that, and I won't make any additional comment at this time," the Albuquerque Republican told reporters gathered at the Veterans Administration Hospital.

She referred to Iglesias' ouster as she has before, as a personnel issue within the Department of Justice.

When asked how an alleged phone call to a U.S. attorney could be construed as a personnel matter, she replied that she "did not have any additional comment at this time."

Wilson offered the same response to a number of other questions on the same topic.

She would not comment on a report published Thursday identifying her and Sen. Pete Domenici as having called Iglesias in October.

Iglesias has said he felt he was being pressured inappropriately to hurry the case and unseal indictments before the election.

The Justice Department has given performance issues as the official reason for Iglesias' losing his job. He says he believes the firing was political.

Earlier, Wilson, the only female veteran serving in Congress, said she was reassured after meeting with VA officials about the quality of care for Iraq and Afghanistan veterans.

After being grilled about Iglesias, she asked if there were any additional questions about the VA. When there were none, she left.

Two news outlets - McClatchy News Service and KRQE News 13 - reported Thursday that Wilson and Domenici called Iglesias in mid-October regarding the pace of his prosecution of Democrats on corruption charges.

Iglesias has not said who called him, only that he considered it political pressure and that he will reveal the names when he testifies before two congressional committees Tuesday.

McClatchy based its report on two people who "feared possible political repercussions" if they were identified. It says Wilson called in the final weeks of her neck-and-neck campaign against Attorney General Patricia Madrid, whom Wilson had labeled as soft on corruption.

The sources said "Wilson was curt" after Iglesias didn't respond to her questions on possible indictments.

The FBI last fall confirmed it was investigating possible white-collar corruption involving the Metropolitan Court and other buildings in Albuquerque, and other sources said the investigation was focusing on former Democratic lawmakers, among others.

The U.S. Attorney's Office has refused to say anything about the investigation.

Domenici, for whom the federal courthouse Downtown is named, called Iglesias more than a week later, McClatchy reported, "and was more persistent than Wilson," its sources said. The story went on, "When Iglesias said an indictment wouldn't be handed down until at least December, the line went dead."

University of New Mexico political science professor Lonna Atkeson said Wilson or Domenici should speak up if they had inappropriate contact with Iglesias.

"If they did, they should come clean, because it's going to come out," Atkeson said.

The situation could prove more politically painful for Wilson than Domenici, she said.

"If it's true, it hurts Wilson more than Domenici because he wasn't running and it wasn't his direct political gain," she said.

Domenici "is so loved in New Mexico, it's hard to imagine this would be a major threat to his campaign two years out from an election."

Robert D. Novak: Another Hillary Defector (NOVAK)

Robert Novak, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON – Greg Craig, a Washington super-lawyer with close ties to the Clintons, is supporting Sen. Barack Obama for President.

Craig was a White House special counsel defending President Bill Clinton in the Senate impeachment trial. A partner in the Williams & Connolly law firm founded by the legendary Edward Bennett Williams, Craig served as an adviser to Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy.

In confirming to this column his Presidential preference, Craig called Obama unique and added: "I've never seen anyone who has made the impact on people and on me." He said he was impressed with Obama when he first met him at the home of investment banker Vernon Jordan, an intimate friend and supporter of the Clintons.

MCCAIN'S WHEREABOUTS

While the other Republican Presidential candidates were attending the annual Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC) in Washington beginning Thursday, Sen. John McCain was launching a nationwide fund-raising campaign.

McCain was at a Salt Lake City lunch Thursday and a Phoenix reception Friday. His money-raising schedule calls for subsequent stops in Grand Rapids, Mich., Detroit, New York City, Charlotte, N.C., Sacramento, Calif., La Jolla, Calif., Irvine, Calif., Riverside, Calif., Beverly Hills, Calif., San Francisco and Philadelphia.

A footnote: McCain's campaign staff did not mention these fund-raising commitments when it turned down CPAC's invitation. It said the senator's conservative record was known to everybody without him going to CPAC, but this decision was made only after heated debate within the McCain campaign.

PROBING GONZALES

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has indicated he is too busy to answer letters from Democratic congressional leaders about his firing seven U.S. attorneys involved in probes of public corruption, though a lower-level Justice Department official rejected their proposals.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, House Democratic Caucus chairman, had written Gonzales two letters suggesting that he name Carol Lam, fired as U.S. attorney in San Diego, as an outside counsel to continue her pursuit of the Duke Cunningham case. Asked by Melissa Charbonneau of the Christian Broadcasting Network about this column's report that Gonzales did not respond, Gonzales said: "I think that the American people lose if I spend all my time worrying about congressional requests for information, if I spend all my time responding to subpoenas."

Richard A. Hertling, the acting Justice Department lobbyist, responded Wednesday, 22 days after Emanuel's letter. He contended "the Justice Department would not ever seek the resignation of a U.S. attorney if doing so would jeopardize a public corruption case" and rejected naming Lam as a special prosecutor.

DODD'S BUCKS

The long shot Democratic Presidential campaign by Christopher J. Dodd, the new Banking Committee chairman, solicited banking industry executives and lobbyists — Democrats and Republicans alike — for a fund-raising reception Wednesday.

Melanie Wong, an experienced Democratic fund-raiser who identified herself as Dodd's "mid-Atlantic regional finance director," sent the invitations. They addressed lobbyists by their first names, even those she had never met and who had never contributed to Dodd.

The evening event was held at Washington's luxurious Madison Hotel to find individual fund-raisers. A "Team of 46" will consist of supporters who pledge to raise $46,000 for Dodd.

The non-profit Clinton Foundation denied conservative writer R. Emmett Tyrrell Jr. permission to use in his new book a photograph taken last year of the Clinton-baiting editor of the American Spectator with the former president at Clinton's 60th birthday party in Toronto.

In the prologue of "The Clinton Crackup," Tyrrell describes how he managed to get an invitation to the lavish celebration Sept. 9. According to Tyrrell, Clinton did not recognize him despite confrontation between them at the Jockey Club restaurant in Washington in 1995. The Washington Post described the President going "ballistic" against Tyrrell.

When Tyrrell asked permission to use the photograph in his new anti- Clinton book, Canadian photographer Anil Mungal responded on Feb. 2: "I regret to report that the Clinton Foundation has not granted permission to release the photo."

Strange Justice (WP)

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

The mass firing of U.S. attorneys has been poorly managed -- at best.

THE JUSTICE Department's firing of a group of U.S. attorneys is neither as sinister as critics suggest nor as benign as the department would have you believe, at least on the basis of the evidence revealed so far. But it is, both sides agree, highly unusual and warrants further inquiry. And it points to the need to fix a law that was changed for the worse not long ago.

U.S. attorneys head the local outposts of federal prosecutors' offices around the country. They are nominated by the president and serve at his pleasure. But it's uncommon for one to be replaced in the middle of an administration and apparently unprecedented for an entire group to be canned, as has happened with eight U.S. attorneys at last count.

The department and Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales have served themselves and the public poorly with their ham-handed, hide-the-ball handling of the dismissals. "I would never, ever make a change in a U.S. attorney position for political reasons," Mr. Gonzales assured the Senate Judiciary Committee -- only to have Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty acknowledge that the U.S. attorney in Little Rock, Bud Cummins, was ousted to make way for J. Timothy Griffin, a political ally of White House adviser Karl Rove. The revelation that all but one of the other U.S. attorneys had received positive to glowing performance reviews appeared to undercut the assertion that the prosecutors had been removed for "performance-related" reasons.

Meanwhile, the former U.S. attorney in New Mexico told McClatchy Newspapers that he believes he was sacked for failing, before the November election, to speed indictments in a probe of local Democrats; the prosecutor cited preelection phone calls from congressional Republicans as the basis for his suspicion. Justice said that had nothing to do with his dismissal, though it acknowledges that unspecified congressional concerns played a role.

Pending further investigation, the episode seems to reflect an unusual reaction to the normal tension between Justice headquarters and the would-be autonomous U.S. attorneys, in this case involving disagreements over how much to focus on immigration cases or when to seek the death penalty. Prosecutorial independence is important, but the president is entitled to have prosecutors who reflect his law-enforcement priorities and to replace those who balk at complying.

More troubling: Is the Bush administration seeking to circumvent the requirement that U.S. attorneys be confirmed by the Senate? The administration tucked into the renewal of the USA Patriot Act authority for the attorney general to name prosecutors who could serve indefinitely without confirmation. Justice viewed the previous law, under which unconfirmed replacements could serve for only 120 days, after which the district courts would name a successor, as an improper incursion of judicial authority into executive branch appointments. Yet the new arrangement presents the greater risk of the executive branch doing an end run around Senate confirmation. The best way to prevent that would be to return the law to its previous state.

No More Denials, Please (NYT)

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

It is time for the Justice Department to stop issuing rote denials that are becoming increasingly hard to believe about the suspicious firing of eight United States attorneys. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales should appoint an impartial investigator to get to the bottom of this unfolding scandal.

Just this week, David Iglesias, one of the eight fired United States attorneys, charged that he was dismissed for resisting pressure to begin a politically charged prosecution before the 2006 election. His allegation came shortly after performance evaluations came to light that throw considerable doubt on the Justice Department's claim that the United States attorneys were fired for poor performance.

United States attorneys, the highest federal prosecutors at the state level, must be insulated from politics. Their decisions about whether to indict can ruin lives, and change the outcome of elections. To ensure their independence, United States attorneys are almost never removed during the term of the president who appointed them.

The Bush administration ignored this tradition, and trampled on prosecutorial independence, by firing eight United States attorneys in rapid succession, including one, Carol Lam of San Diego, who had put a powerful Republican congressman in jail. Mr. Iglesias, who was the U.S. attorney in New Mexico, says two members of Congress called him last October and urged him to pursue corruption charges against a prominent Democrat before the November election. He did not. He was dismissed.

Most of the fired United States attorneys' performance evaluations praise them for the quality of their work, and for following the priorities set in Washington. These do not appear to be the evaluations of people who were fired for poor performance.

A House subcommittee has subpoenaed several of the fired United States attorneys to testify next week. The Senate is doing its own investigation. They should question the fired prosecutors, as well as top members of the Justice Department, to find out how these dismissals came about. They should also investigate Mr. Iglesias's allegations about the two members of Congress, who may have violated Congressional rules, and even criminal law.

Mr. Gonzales should also begin his own inquiry. Mr. Iglesias has raised a serious question about politicization of the Justice Department. That, and not public relations, should be the attorney general's primary concern.

Every Day Is 9/12 For AG (SACBEE)

By Dorothy Korber, Bee Staff Writer

The Sacramento Bee, March 3, 2007

Alberto Gonzales says his main concern is protecting the U.S. against another Sept. 11 attack; capital protesters decry policies.

For U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, every day is Sept. 12.

"My No. 1 priority is protecting our nation and our citizens from another attack," Gonzales said in a talk Friday at McGeorge School of Law in Oak Park. "That is what drives me."

While dozens of raucous protesters demonstrated outside, the nation's top cop spoke to a quieter audience of dignitaries and students who attended the invitation-only lecture at the school.

Gonzales' half-hour talk, read rapidly from notes, was a passionate defense of the Bush administration's anti-terrorism strategy on several fronts: domestic surveillance, the detention of foreign terror suspects at Guantánamo Bay, and the importance of the USA Patriot Act.

Gonzales, who was sworn in as attorney general two years ago, previously served as President Bush's White House counsel. He recalled being with the president on Sept. 11, 2001.

"I carry the memory and pain of that day -- the brutal murder of fathers and mothers, sons and daughters," he said. "Our enemies are smart. They are adaptable. And they are very, very patient. We must anticipate what our enemy is going to do next."

To that end, he said, the administration must have new tools and rethink some old rules. He quoted a British report that described parts of the Geneva Convention as out of date, and he spoke of clarifying and modernizing those international standards of wartime behavior.

"This is a new threat that requires a new way of thinking," he said.

At the end of his talk, Gonzales was asked how he thought history would judge him.

"I will let history write that story," he said. "I can't worry about my legacy. I can't spend the next two years fighting defensive battles. I have an obligation to take the majestic powers of the Department of Justice and do good for the American people."

Protesters outside the lecture hall -- primarily law students and some of their professors -- accused Gonzales of ignoring the Constitution in his pursuit of terrorism. They raised issues that have dogged Gonzales since his nomination, including his approval of an administration memo that condoned harsh treatment of suspected terrorists.

One sign read: "Protest Torture -- You May Be Next."

McGeorge professor John Sims, who teaches courses in constitutional law and international human rights, stood outside the lecture hall Friday, passing out a list of questions he thinks Gonzales should have been asked. All dealt with torture.

"I thought it would be more useful to stand out here and talk about questions he won't answer, rather than docilely listening and giving him polite applause," Sims said. "There are a lot of people in Sacramento and at McGeorge Law School who find the policies of the administration abhorrent and disgraceful. He has undermined the administration of justice in this country."

After Gonzales' talk, second-year McGeorge students Tina Poley and Matthew Christy both expressed disappointment that he spoke only of the war on terror and not about other duties of the attorney general.

"The entire thing was on the defensive about terrorism," said Poley, who had carried a protest sign before the lecture. "About treating every day like Sept. 12. Nothing at all about protecting civil rights or pursuing corruption."

Christy pointed out that Gonzales began the question/answer portion of the program by saying, "Bring it on!" -- an echo of President Bush's controversial challenge at the beginning of the Iraq war.

"You'd think he would have avoided that expression," said Christy, who wore a T-shirt proclaiming: "Give up war for Lent." Still, Christy was appreciative that Gonzales made the stop at McGeorge. "I'm glad he came here. It provides a forum for every one to discuss what's good and what's bad."

Later Friday, at the federal courthouse in downtown Sacramento, Gonzales touted the successes of Project Safe Childhood, an effort among local, state and federal authorities to aggressively investigate and prosecute cases of child exploitation.

DOJ_NMG_0140297

Last year alone, the Eastern District of California had the highest number of federal indictments -- 71 -- in the country on cases ranging from Internet crimes against children, from child pornography to youth trafficking. The inland district runs from Bakersfield to the Oregon border.

Gonzales described such crimes as "horrendous" and applauded the efforts of law enforcement to take action "for the children of this community." About the writer:

Gonzalez Appearance Unwelcome By Some Law Students (CBS13)

CBS 13 Sacramento, March 3, 2007

(CBS13) Protestors made a run for it over to McGeorge School of Law today to speak their mind on the war on terror. The target of their anger-- U.S. Attorney General, Alberto Gonzales who was invited to speak at McGeorge.

With a glance and a wave, It didn't take long for the attorney general to figure out he wasn't exactly being welcomed by some in a group of McGeorge students.

These protestors --many of them law students from McGeorge cut to the chase as they told us, in dramatic fashion, why they were here

Rights being violated, this group would argue, by the U.S. Attorney General's office:

As they carried signs targeting the man who hired Gonzales-- President Bush.

Protestors ripped the administration and the Attorney General on how they handle so called enemy combatants; the guys at Guantanamo. But that was not all.

The tactics for handling the media's coverage of the attorney general's speech was a bit puzzling today. At first, CBS13 was told we'd be allowed in. Then, they shut all media out.

Despite their opposition to his policies-- The protestors we spoke with say they were glad the attorney general took the time to come to their law school.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Authorities Investigate Big Lender (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj And Julie Creswell

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

Federal prosecutors and securities regulators are investigating stock sales and accounting errors at the New Century Financial Corporation, the biggest mortgage company that specializes in lending to people with weak, or subprime, credit, the company disclosed in a corporate filing yesterday.

The company also warned that a delay in filing its financials may put vital financing into jeopardy.

The troubles at New Century are the latest sign of the deterioration in subprime lending — until recently the fastest-growing segment of the mortgage business. The market has been struggling to contain the fallout from rising default rates and weakening home prices. Late last year, some smaller lenders started going out of business and last month several bigger companies, including New Century, started reporting problems.

Another large lender, the Fremont General Corporation, said yesterday that it planned to sell its subprime mortgage business after reaching an agreement with the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to restrict its activities in that area. As part of the agreement, Fremont will be able to continue taking deposits.

The investigations into New Century, which is based in Irvine, Calif., and wrote $33.9 billion in mortgages last year, started after the company said on Feb. 7 that it would restate earnings for three quarters, which sparked a huge sell-off in its shares. Yesterday, it said its problems had prevented it from filing its annual report, which was to be released Thursday. The board is conducting an investigation of the accounting problems.

The company's shares have fallen more than 53 percent since the start of the year — before the most recent announcement, which came after the stock market closed. Its shares were down $3.73, or 25 percent, to $10.92, in after-hours trading.

On Feb. 22, the company said the regulatory arm of the New York Stock Exchange contacted it about sales in the company's securities before that announcement. On Wednesday, it received notice from the United States attorney's office in Los Angeles that it was conducting a criminal investigation. Federal prosecutors are looking into trading in New Century securities and errors in how the company accounted for home loans that it was forced to buy back from Wall Street firms that buy its loans and package them into bonds. Also, the Securities and Exchange Commission has requested a meeting with its executives.

It is unclear what stock sales investigators are looking at, but data from securities filings compiled by Thompson Financial show that two of the company's top executives sold sizable blocks of shares in the second half of last year. Robert K. Cole, a former chairman and a founder of the company, sold stock worth $6.7 million in the third and fourth quarters after not selling significant numbers of shares for the previous three quarters. And Edward F. Gotschall, another founder and vice chairman, sold shares worth $14.7 million after not selling significant numbers of shares for the previous six months.

Earlier last spring, the executives, both of whom are still on the board, said they would be moving out of their leadership positions. They later disclosed plans to sell stock.

A spokeswoman for New Century said the executives and the company would not comment beyond the company's filing. A spokesman for federal prosecutors in Los Angeles also declined to comment.

New Century, which was formed in 1995, narrowly survived a shakeout in the subprime sector in the late 1990's when concerns about faulty accounting and Russia's default scared investors away from risky bonds tied to subprime mortgages. The credit crunch caused several of its rivals to disappear, but New Century pulled through because it received a large cash infusion from U.S. Bancorp in Minneapolis at the time.

With fewer competitors, the company was well positioned to grab market share during the housing boom that began earlier this decade with the help of low interest rates. Subprime loans, which are largely given to poor and minority borrowers, had rapid growth but as more lenders jumped in lending standards were loosened and default rates for loans made in 2006 have been high.

New Century now appears to be facing a credit crunch similar to the one it encountered in the late 1990s.

The company said the delay in filing its financial reports had put its access to billions of dollars in credit lines and other financings into jeopardy. The company will have to seek a second set of waivers from banks that provide it credit lines totaling $17.4 billion if it does not file financial reports by March 15.

Also, the company will have to seek waivers from lenders that have provided it with 11 financing arrangements, because it will not have at least $1 in net income for the six months that ended in December. It has gotten six waivers so far, but they are contingent upon the company getting similar leniency from the other five.

The company's fate will probably hinge largely on the providers of its capital, which include Wall Street's biggest banks, which also own a hefty chunk of the company. Morgan Stanley, Goldman Sachs, Barclays Capital and Deutsche Bank own about 16 percent of the company, according to securities filings. Citigroup recently bought a 5.1 percent stake in the company and Greenlight Capital, a prominent hedge fund, owns 6.3 percent. Its president and co-founder, David Einhorn, sits on the board of New Century.

Ethics Case Will Limit Attorney's Enron Role (HC)

By Kristen Hays, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, March 3, 2007

A plaintiffs' lawyer has hearing over unrelated work in capital

One of the lawyers who represents Enron shareholders in a $40 billion lawsuit bound for trial next month in Houston has informed the judge he is facing an ethics complaint from the Washington, D.C., Bar Counsel.

The lawyer, G. Paul Howes, told U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon in a letter Friday that he will address the matter at a hearing before a committee of the District of Columbia Board of Professional Responsibility on April 11, the week before jury selection is scheduled to begin in the Enron case.

He also said that because of the complaint, he will have a nonspeaking role in the Enron trial and will help the lead trial lawyer, Patrick Coughlin.

The allegations include that in 1993-94, during Howes' 11 years as a federal prosecutor in Washington before he went into private practice in 1995, he made improper voucher payments to witnesses when prosecuting two murder cases.

The Justice Department investigated the allegations and did not file criminal charges against Howes. But the agency said in a 1998 report that he had improperly distributed witness vouchers. The Justice Department forwarded its findings to the D.C. Bar Counsel, which filed the complaint last month.

Howes said in the letter that he has "always accepted responsibility for my conduct and that of the police officers who worked with me" on extensive investigations that began in 1988. He declined comment beyond the letter.

Coughlin said in a statement Friday that Howes had acknow- ledged to the D.C. Bar Counsel that he acted in an "over-zealous manner in an effort to put away drug kingpins who were terrorizing entire communities in Washington." He also voiced support for Howes and his place on the plaintiffs' team.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Jury Seeks Clarity On 'Reasonable Doubt' (WP)

By Amy Goldstein, Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

Jurors in the perjury trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby asked the presiding judge for help yesterday defining a core issue in their deliberations: how to set a standard for determining whether the vice president's former chief of staff is guilty beyond a "reasonable doubt."

At the end of its eighth day of deliberations, the foreman of the 11-member jury sent U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton a two-sentence note. "We would like clarification of the term 'reasonable doubt,' " the note said. "Specifically, is it necessary for the government to present evidence that it is not humanly possible for someone not to recall an event in order to find guilt beyond a reasonable doubt?"

The question, which Walton plans to address when jurors resume deliberating Monday, reflects the central role that human memory played in the month-long testimony in the trial. According to jury and evidence experts, the question -- which refers to what information Libby might have forgotten -- signifies that at least one juror is concerned how strictly to define reasonable doubt.

The concept of reasonable doubt is among the most controversial issues in jury deliberations, experts say, because it is a vague term that people interpret differently. Though the standard is meant to require a very high probability of guilt, research conducted with juries after trials has demonstrated those who worked together to reach a unanimous verdict nevertheless may have used different benchmarks of what constituted reasonable doubt.

Northwestern University law professor Ronald Allen, an authority on trial evidence and procedure, said the Libby jury is wise to seek clarity but added that it is unlikely that any judge can dispel the standard's ambiguity.

"Some people might say beyond reasonable doubt is 99 or 98 percent," Allen said. "Some might say any doubt at all [is unacceptable]. There is literally no test."

Libby, 56, is charged with five felony counts alleging that in 2003 he lied to FBI agents and a federal grand jury investigating a leak by the Bush administration of the identity of Valerie Plame, an undercover CIA officer. Plame is married to former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, a staunch early critic of President Bush's Iraq war policy.

Wilson was sent by the CIA to Africa in 2002 to assess reports that Iraq had been trying to buy uranium for a nuclear weapons program. Wilson concluded those reports were false. Shortly after the Iraq war began, he publicly lashed out at Bush and Vice President Cheney, accusing the administration of distorting his findings to justify the invasion.

Prosecutors allege that, in the spring and early summer of 2003, Libby aggressively sought out information about Wilson and Plame, then channeled word of her CIA job to journalists and the White House press secretary to imply that Wilson had been chosen for the mission to Niger out of nepotism.

The prosecution alleges that Libby deliberately lied to investigators to protect his job and spare the White House political embarrassment.

Defense attorneys contend their client simply misremembered his conversations about Wilson and Plame, because he was so busy with more important work. Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald sought to convince jurors that Libby could not plausibly have forgotten the conversations.

The question about reasonable doubt is the more significant of two notes the jury sent to the judge when they ended deliberations for the week at 2 p.m. yesterday. The other note concerns the count that alleges that Libby obstructed the leak probe.

Jurors asked the judge how much of Libby's grand jury testimony they should consider when deciding whether he is guilty on that count.

Libby Jury Leaves A Clue As It Heads Into Recess (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 2 — The jury deliberating the perjury and obstruction of justice case against I. Lewis Libby Jr. recessed for the weekend on Friday without reaching a verdict, but not before leaving an intriguing clue as to the state of deliberations.

The jurors sent a note with a question to Judge Reggie B. Walton, who is expected to respond on Monday when deliberations resume. In the note, the jurors asked for further explanation of the concept of reasonable doubt, suggesting possible uncertainty or even disagreement over the core standard by which they are to measure the evidence and testimony about Mr. Libby, the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney.

"We would like clarification of the term 'reasonable doubt,' " the note said. "Specifically, is it necessary for the government to present evidence that it is not humanly possible for someone not to recall an event in order to find guilt beyond a reasonable doubt?"

The question suggested that at least some of the jurors are wrestling with the imprecise and often vexing definition of reasonable doubt, as well as how to decide whether a false statement should be attributed to faulty memory or willful deception, the issue at the center of the case.

Prosecutors have contended that Mr. Libby lied to a grand jury and F.B.I. agents who were investigating the leak of the identity of a C.I.A. operative, Valerie Wilson, in the summer of 2003. As part of their case, prosecutors have contended that they have demonstrated beyond a reasonable doubt that Mr. Libby lied when he said he did not discuss Ms. Wilson's role at the C.I.A. with two reporters. Moreover, the prosecutors have said that Mr. Libby also lied in an effort to cover up his role in the leak by testifying that he learned of Ms. Wilson's identity in a conversation with Tim Russert of NBC News on July 10 or 11.

Mr. Russert testified that in that conversation with Mr. Libby, they did not discuss Ms. Wilson.

Mr. Libby's lawyers asserted in their closing arguments that any misstatements Mr. Libby might have made were the result of a faulty memory. They also pressed the idea that memory is inherently imperfect, and that all the prosecution's witnesses demonstrated their own memory problems, which, by itself, was a demonstration of reasonable doubt.

The concept of reasonable doubt has proved troubling even for the Supreme Court, whose members have argued vigorously as to its definition and how it should be explained to a jury. There is, however, wide agreement that it is a more stringent standard than the "preponderance of the evidence," the usual standard for a finding in noncriminal lawsuits.

The Supreme Court first made explicit the requirement in 1970 that, to convict someone of a crime, the jury must find that person is guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

But justices have, over the years, continued to disagree over whether various instructions given to juries by judges are acceptable. In 1992, the justices split in a ruling that upheld convictions in which judges had told juries that reasonable doubt was akin to moral certainty.

In his instructions to the Libby jury, Judge Walton said, "A reasonable doubt, as the name implies, is a doubt based on reason."

He also said that "if after careful, honest and impartial consideration of all the evidence, you cannot say that you are firmly convinced of the defendant's guilt, then you have a reasonable doubt."

He also noted, however, that "the government is not required to prove guilt beyond all doubt or to a mathematical certainty or to a scientific certainty."

Katrina Fraud Cases Flood Courts (NOTP)

By Bruce Alpert, Washington Bureau

New Orleans Times-Picayune, March 3, 2007

Louisiana leads in number of cases

WASHINGTON -- In her application for federal emergency help, Tina Marie Gilmore told officials how she watched hopelessly as her two daughters, ages 5 and 6, were swept through the rushing floodwaters after Hurricane Katrina and was so distraught several months later that she couldn't function -- couldn't drive a car or even be in the same room with children.

But after mailing her a check for $4,358, the Federal Emergency Management Agency learned that not only did the 34-year-old woman not live in New Orleans when Hurricane Katrina devastated the city, but she also didn't have any children. Even her last name was a fake. The government said it wasn't Gilmore, but Winston.

Last month, U.S. District Judge William Stiehl sentenced the Belleville, Ill., woman to four years in jail. "She took advantage of the taxpayers of this country under very tragic circumstances," Stiehl said.

Winston is one of about 600 people in 19 states and the District of Columbia who have been indicted for making fraudulent hurricane claims. Louisiana has the most cases, 140, followed by Mississippi, with 105, and California, 71.

One of the most prevalent schemes, according to the government, involved false claims for emergency $2,000 allocations from FEMA, money intended to pay emergency living expenses after Katrina forced hundreds of thousands of people from their homes.

But some of the scams were far more audacious.

According to the Justice Department, Lawanda Williams of Jackson, Ala., filed 28 separate claims for hurricane damage, listing addresses in Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi and Florida and various Social Security numbers, addresses, phone numbers and post office box numbers. She had collected $267,377.15 before a FEMA staffer in Biloxi, Miss., noticed discrepancies in the applications and saw one common thread: All seemed connected to Williams.

On Feb. 1, Magistrate Bert Milling Jr. sentenced Williams to 75 months in prison and ordered her to reimburse FEMA for every penny she received, money the Justice Department says was used to buy a double-wide mobile home, a 50-inch television set and several used cars.

Other Katrina-related fraud charges include officials with FEMA and the Army Corps of Engineers demanding bribes for Katrina contracts or assistance; the sponsor of a Florida charity promising to fly in supplies to hurricane-devastated communities but doing no such thing; and 72 people, including 22 Red Cross employees, who the government says conspired to collect fraudulent payments through an emergency call center in Bakersfield, Calif. Most of the 72 have pleaded guilty to fraud charges.

"I'm never sure what really motivates the criminal," said Alice Fisher, head of the Justice Department's criminal division and coordinator of the Katrina Fraud Task Force that has coordinated the investigations for about 35 federal agencies. "But it's sad that in such a terrible disaster we'd have so many people steal money that is supposed to help people rebuild their homes and rebuild their lives."

'Sense of entitlement'

U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said he isn't surprised that the Eastern District of Louisiana, which covers metropolitan New Orleans, is on the low end of fraud cases given that the devastation of the storm meant most of the area's residents suffered at least some damage during Katrina.

According to the Justice Department, the Eastern District had 18 cases, although Letten believes the actual number is in the 30s. Still, that's fewer cases than reported for the Eastern District of California, the Northern District of Alabama and middle district of Louisiana, which includes Baton Rouge.

Katrina isn't the first time that people have tried to take advantage of a disaster and the programs intended to help the victims. After the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, people were prosecuted for seeking government or charitable money by falsely claiming that they lost a close family member at the World Trade Center or the Pentagon.

Jeffrey Schaler, a psychologist and professor in the Department of Justice, Law and Society at American University, said it's not just major disasters that elicit fraudulent claims. Any time there's a major bus accident, he said, people come forward to falsely claim that they were passengers and suffered debilitating injuries.

Many share a common personality trait, according to Schaler.

"They have a sense of entitlement or what would be referred to in psychiatry as narcissism," he said. "They think somehow they are owed what other people have to work for."

Tracing the claims

And a disaster as big as Katrina might have seemed the perfect opportunity to make a fraudulent claim under the theory that the government had so many legitimate applications for help that it would be impossible to separate the good from the bad. That could help explain much of the $1.4 billion in fraudulent claims estimated by the Government Accountability Office. So far, the government has collected $18 million in restitution for false claims, some from people who settled to avoid prosecution.

Fisher said investigators have accepted a large number of guilty pleas, an indication that the fraud allegations are relatively easy to prove. "We have the person cashing the (government) check, and it's not that difficult to establish that a person didn't really live where he or she said they did," Fisher said.

Sometimes, those filing false applications provide obvious clues. For example, Winston, the Illinois woman who claimed to have seen her two children drown, raised eyebrows because she listed different ages for her daughters in her written documents.

Also assisting the investigations, according to Fisher, was the willingness of federal law enforcement agencies to work together and share documents, something that didn't happen before the 2001 terrorist attacks, according to the 9/11 Commission.

In many instances, applicants used information they gleaned from watching real-life tragedies on TV in the extensive coverage that followed Hurricane Katrina's assault on the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29, 2005.

Storm schemes

Here are some of the schemes outlined by federal investigators:

-- In Florida, Gary S. Kraser set up the Web site www.AirKatrina.com, which in one day took in $40,000 in donations to pay for relief flights to hurricane-damaged communities. Kaiser said he would bring in medical supplies and airlift children and others in need of medical help, but did no such thing, according to the indictment. He was sentenced to 21 months in jail. The day after Hurricane Katrina struck, Kraser wrote on his Web site: "I am shaking as I write this as I just arrived home and just now allowed my body and mind to accept what I saw tonight. I saw people on their roofs that had used axes more than likely to cut through the roof, waving at us, as we were Air Rescue." According to the government, Kraser wasn't a pilot and didn't have an airplane.

DOJ_NMG_0140302

-- In Washington, D.C., Jeffrey Alan Rothschild was sentenced to 102 months in prison after pleading guilty to collecting $100,000 from FEMA by submitting false claims on behalf of people he claimed were Katrina victims and cashing the checks himself. According to the government, Rothschild told investigators he would use New Orleans addresses on his applications that he either found on the Internet or made up. By the time the government caught up with him, he had collected 38 checks.

-- In Bakersfield, Calif., 72 people helped friends, relatives and others obtain Katrina emergency money for which they weren't entitled, according to a federal indictment. Among those indicted were Aminah Randle, Robert Johnson, Elizabeth Ray and Sheena Porter, who worked in a Red Cross call center.

-- In Missouri, Andrea Gholston admitted she had filed an application listing a fake New Orleans address and received $4,358 from FEMA, and then helped a friend fill out another fraudulent application, which netted more than $10,000.

-- In New Orleans, two FEMA employees, Andrew Rose and Loyd Holliman, both Colorado residents, solicited a bribe from a food contractor in exchange for inflating the number of people requiring meals at the Algiers base camp so the company could collect more federal fees. On Jan. 27, the two employees each took an envelope with $10,000 in cash, according to the Justice Department. They both got 21 months in prison and were fined $20,000.

-- In Mississippi, four people -- Devin Chuter, Allen Kitto, Clinton Miller and Lauren Robertson -- were accused of submitting false claims for debris-removal work.

Ex-defense Official Pleads Guilty To Theft (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 3, 2007

A former Defense Department official yesterday pleaded guilty in federal court to charges of embezzling more than $100,000 in funds destined for use by government intelligence agents, Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said.

John Taylor, who worked at the department as an intelligence contingency-funds officer, admitted in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia that he stole the money while assigned to the 500th Military Intelligence Brigade as part of the U.S. Army Intelligence and Security Command at Camp Zama, Japan.

In his Defense Department role, Mrs. Fisher said, Taylor was responsible for budgeting, disbursing and accounting for intelligence contingency funds for the official duties of government intelligence agents. She said he also was required to manage classified bank accounts and supervise agents engaged in classified intelligence-gathering activity.

As part of a plea agreement in the case, she said, Taylor admitted that from 2003 through January 2006, he used his official position to steal at least $106,000 in department funds designated for intelligence-related activities.

She said Taylor embezzled the money by withdrawing cash from a government bank account whose funds were intended for intelligence agents. To conceal his acts, she said, Taylor falsified Defense Department accounting vouchers and forms.

Theft or embezzlement from the government carries a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine. Sentencing was set for June 8.

The case was prosecuted by James A. Crowell IV and John P. Pearson of the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section and the FBI and the Criminal Investigation Division of the U.S. Army, in support of the Justice Department's National Procurement Fraud Task Force and the International Contract Corruption Initiative.

The National Procurement Fraud Initiative was announced by Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty in October and is designed to promote the early detection, identification, prevention and prosecution of procurement fraud associated with the increase in contracting activity for national security and other government programs.

As part of this initiative, Mr. McNulty has created the National Procurement Fraud Task Force, which is chaired by Mrs. Fisher.

Justice Department Takes Aim At Image-sharing Sites (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News.com, March 3, 2007

Feds try during a private meeting to convince sites that allow photos or videos to be uploaded to monitor users, News.com has learned.

The Bush administration has accelerated its Internet surveillance push by proposing that Web sites must keep records of who uploads photographs or videos in case police determine the content is illegal and choose to investigate, CNET News.com has learned.

DOJ_NMG_0140303

That proposal surfaced Wednesday in a private meeting during which U.S. Department of Justice officials, including Assistant Attorney General Rachel Brand, tried to convince industry representatives such as AOL and Comcast that data retention would be valuable in investigating terrorism, child pornography and other crimes. The discussions were described to News.com by several people who attended the meeting.

High ImpactWhat's new:

Officials from the U.S. Department of Justice held a private meeting to persuade Internet industry representatives to keep records of who uploads photographs or videos.Bottom line:

The meeting accelerates the Bush administration's effort to require Web sites to keep track of customers' actions on the Internet, a practice known as data retention.

More stories on this topic

A second purpose of the meeting in Washington, D.C., according to the sources, was to ask Internet service providers how much it would cost to record details on their subscribers for two years. At the very least, the companies would be required to keep logs for police of which customer is assigned a specific Internet address.

Only universities and libraries would be excluded, one participant said. "There's a PR concern with including the libraries, so we're not going to include them," the participant quoted the Justice Department as saying. "We know we're going to get a pushback, so we're not going to do that."

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has been lobbying Congress for mandatory data retention, calling it a "national problem that requires federal legislation." Gonzales has convened earlier private meetings to pressure industry representatives. And last month, Republicans introduced a mandatory data retention bill in the U.S. House of Representatives that would let the attorney general dictate what must be stored and for how long.

Supporters of the data retention proposal say it's necessary to help track criminals if police don't immediately discover illegal activity, such as child abuse. Industry representatives respond by saying major Internet providers have a strong track record of responding to subpoenas from law enforcement.

Wednesday's meeting represents the latest effort by the Bush administration to increase the ability of law enforcement and intelligence agencies to monitor Internet users. Since 2001, the administration has repeatedly pushed for more surveillance capabilities in the form of the Patriot Act and a follow-up proposal that--if it had been enacted--would have given the FBI online eavesdropping powers without a court order for up to 48 hours.

Often invoking terrorism and child pornography as justifications, the administration has argued that Internet providers must install backdoors for surveillance and has called for routers to be redesigned for easier eavesdropping. President Bush's electronic surveillance program, which was recently modified, has drawn an avalanche of lawsuits.

The Justice Department's request for information about compliance costs echoes a decade-ago debate over wiretapping digital telephones, which led to the 1994 Communications Assistance for Law Enforcement Act. To reduce opposition by telephone companies, Congress set aside $500 million for reimbursement and the legislation easily cleared both chambers by voice votes.

Once Internet providers come up with specific figures, privacy advocates worry, Congress will offer to write a generous check to cover all compliance costs and the process will repeat itself.

The Justice Department did not respond to a request for comment on Thursday. The U.S. Internet Service Provider Association, which has been critical of data retention proposals before, declined to comment.

Because the Justice Department did not circulate a written proposal at the private meeting, it's difficult to gauge the effects on Web sites that would be forced to record information on image uploads for two years. Meeting participants said that Justice officials (including Brand, the assistant attorney general for legal policy and a former White House attorney) did not answer questions about anonymously posted content and whether text comments on a blog would qualify for retention.

In practice, some Web businesses already make it a practice to store personal information forever. Google stores search terms indefinitely, for instance, while AOL says it deletes them after 30 days.

David Weekly, a San Francisco-area entrepreneur who founded popular Wiki-creation site PBWiki.com, said the Justice Department's proposal would be routinely evaded by people who use overseas sites to upload images. (PBWiki, which recently raised $2 million from Mohr Davidow Ventures, lets people embed photographs on pages they create with a point-and-click editor.)

If the proposal were to become law, PBWiki would already be in compliance, Weekly said. "We already keep all that data pretty much indefinitely because it's invaluable for us to mine and figure out how people use services," he said. "How do they use services now versus a year ago? Was February a bad month for traffic?...We already have the data there. It's already searchable. It's already indexed."

Getting Tough On Child Porn (MINNST)

By Dan Browning, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 3, 2007

Prosecuting child porn cases is a top priority for Minnesota's new U.S. attorney, who helped draft a no-holds-barred U.S. Department of Justice enforcement initiative a year ago. Child pornography isn't just dirty pictures, she says.

Bruce Betcher says he began searching the Web for sexually explicit photos of children in 2003, a predilection that led him to photograph two relatives -- both under 12 -- and three of their best friends in lascivious poses.

When he appears in federal court in Minneapolis on Tuesday, Betcher, a 53-year-old Burnsville property appraiser, could be sentenced to up to life in prison -- a longer term than if he had been convicted of first- or second-degree murder.

Extraordinary prison sentences for first-time offenders and a willingness of prosecutors to throw the book at them are evidence of an expanding crackdown by the federal government on anyone caught producing, possessing or distributing child pornography. Mandatory minimum sentences have been lengthened twice in the past three years, and a year ago the Department of Justice launched Project Safe Childhood, a no-holds-barred enforcement initiative that has made prosecution of child porn a top priority.

Rachel Paulose, the new U.S. attorney for Minnesota, helped draft that initiative and promised vigorous enforcement of existing laws.

A review of Minnesota cases brought by the government in the past year shows that it isn't prosecuting people who accidentally tripped across a photo or two. The cases thus far range from an international Internet consultant snared at the airport with child sex photos on his laptop to the father of three young girls who recorded himself raping and sodomizing them.

One man prosecuted in Minneapolis recently had more than 350,000 images of pornography, some of which included sexual penetration of toddlers. In another case, a Richfield man who worked as a pharmacy assistant sent child porn to an undercover agent and said he could drug young girls so they wouldn't remember being assaulted and photographed.

Though many of the cases were already underway when Paulose took office in February 2006, she's promising to bring more. Several recent search warrants indicate that she means it.

"You will, over time, see an increase," Paulose said.

Betcher's lawyer, Thomas Shiah, and other defense attorneys worry the federal sentencing guidelines are too harsh, particularly for first-time offenders like Betcher.

"You can do much more heinous crimes and do less time," Shiah said.

But in Betcher's case, Assistant U.S. Attorney Erica MacDonald urged the judge to follow the sentencing recommendation of life in prison. "The lives of five little girls and their families were irreparably damaged by this man and his deviant behavior," she said in a memo filed Friday.

Paulose, too, is unsympathetic to any pleas for mercy.

"To be blunt, no sentence would ever be long enough for a person who takes the innocence of a child," she said.

"Righteous sentences"

The government has been tightening the noose on child porn for years. Congress enacted the first law dealing specifically with child pornography in 1978. Ten years later, it made it illegal to use a computer to create or promote it.

The PROTECT Act, passed in 2003, set stiff mandatory minimum sentences. The Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act, enacted last summer, stiffened sentences even more and, among other things, established the Dru Sjodin National Sex Offender public website.

Inexpensive digital cameras and the Internet have made it easier than ever for people to create, distribute and acquire child pornography, but they have also made it easier for investigators to track their footprints.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation says it has more agents working on child porn than any other program in its Cyber Division. Since 1996, the Innocent Images National Initiative to target child porn on the Internet has resulted in 5,752 criminal cases.

The Department of Justice began funding regional Internet Crimes Against Children (ICAC) task forces in 1998 to help state and local law enforcement agencies investigate online child exploitation. In January 2006, the Justice Department awarded $14 million to the 46 task forces. A month later, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales decreed child-porn prosecutions a top priority, and he said federal law enforcement agencies would help state investigators and nongovernmental agencies to attack the problem.

Until recently, Minnesota's ICAC task force had just one full-time investigator. But last year the Minnesota Legislature voted to kick in $1 million a year, and the task force is moving from the St. Paul Police Department into the Bureau of Criminal Apprehension (BCA), which is assigning four agents, two forensic analysts, an information technology expert and a trainer to the task force, according to BCA Superintendent Tim O'Malley.

Federal prison sentences for child porn producers more than doubled between 1994 and 2005, and defense attorneys expect them to get even longer as a result of recent congressional action.

Federal prosecutors in Minnesota are pushing for and getting maximum sentences.

"In the last six months we have obtained three sentences of terms that are 30 years, 30 years and 10 years, respectively," Paulose said. "We think those are righteous sentences."

Tougher laws and more resources will undoubtedly result in more criminals being brought to justice, said David Finkelhor, director of the Crimes Against Children Research Center at the University of New Hampshire. But he cautioned that no one really knows whether the Internet has spawned an actual increase in child pornography production in recent years or merely helped law enforcement agents uncover it.

St. Paul police Sgt. Bill Haider, the lone investigator on the Minnesota ICAC task force, said he hasn't noticed an increase recently in child porn cases in Minnesota. But the Internet has allowed people who have sexual interests in children to find others like themselves. "And for them, it leads them to believe that it's more normal," he said.

The FBI, U.S. Postal Inspection Service, Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Internal Revenue Service, Secret Service, and state and local police all play a role in finding child porn online. Investigators work undercover in chat rooms, trace suspects through Internet service providers (ISPs) and credit card companies, track down peer-to-peer file sharing networks and follow tips.

ISPs such as Yahoo and Comcast, though not required to look for child porn, are now legally required to report evidence of it on their networks.

Haider said that most of the cases he gets are referrals from the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, a private nonprofit agency mandated by Congress to help law enforcement. It operates an online reporting service at www.cybertipline.com.

In 2004, the national center referred 492 reports in Minnesota, said Michelle Collins, director of the exploited-child unit. The total declined to 275 reports in 2005, but rose again last year to 353.

The center also works with U.S. law enforcement and Interpol to identify victims of child abuse, whose photos persist online for years. As of last week, the center had identified 992 children in these photos, up from 886 at the beginning of the year.

The increase is a direct result of law enforcement agencies working together, Collins said. And that's just what led to Betcher's arrest.

A Brownie uniform

In August 2005, federal agents in Atlanta seized a computer with more than 2,000 images of child pornography from a Georgia police sergeant. Alert investigators noticed the partial insignia of a Minnesota Brownie uniform, and that eventually led them to identify a girl in the photo as a relative of Betcher's. He was charged and convicted of 24 counts of producing child pornography, one count of distributing it and one count of possessing it.

The sentencing guidelines suggest piling on extra prison time because of the repeat nature of his offenses, and the fact that he was in a position of authority over the children he photographed.

A similar thing happened to Steven Koenen, 45, of Robbinsdale. He was snared by undercover FBI agents after he posted more than 30 child porn photos to an Internet news group in 2005. Investigators recovered more than 7,000 illicit images when they seized his computer equipment, and Koenen admitted to sexually assaulting three relatives, ages 3, 7 and 9.

Koenen is appealing a 30-year sentence meted out in July.

Paulose singled out his case as an example of why she's pursuing such cases so aggressively. Child pornography isn't just dirty pictures, she said.

"It's a visual depiction of a crime scene, and we need to take that seriously. I don't think a society can have any greater responsibility than protecting its children."

Stolen Painting Found In Spielberg's Collection (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian And Ashraf Khalil, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

The director, a major collector of works by Rockwell, contacts the FBI. An agent calls the movie mogul an 'unknowing victim.'

A Norman Rockwell painting stolen from a Missouri gallery 34 years ago was recovered and authenticated Friday in the collection of movie mogul Steven Spielberg.

DOJ_NMG_0140306

Spielberg's spokesman, Marvin Levy, said the director's staff contacted the FBI several weeks ago after seeing a bulletin from the agency's Art Crime Team seeking clues about the theft of the "Russian Schoolroom" oil painting.

"The second anybody said, 'I think we have that painting,' [our] office got a hold of the FBI," Levy said.

Special Agent Chris Calarco of the FBI's Art Crime Team and Jessica Todd Smith, curator of American art for the Huntington Library, inspected the painting Friday afternoon at Spielberg's offices on the Universal Studios lot. The filmmaker was not present.

"He's an absolutely unknowing victim in this," Calarco said of Spielberg.

Calarco declined to speculate on the painting's value, but two sources close to the investigation said it is worth between $700,000 and $1 million.

The painting, depicting schoolchildren in a classroom looking at a bust of Soviet leader Vladimir Lenin, was stolen during an exhibit at a small art gallery in Clayton, Mo., in June 1973.

According to the FBI, its whereabouts were unknown until 1988, when it was sold at an auction in New Orleans for about $70,000.

Spielberg bought the painting from an art dealer in 1989 for an undisclosed sum, Calarco said.

The director is a high-profile Rockwell collector who helped found the Norman Rockwell Museum in Stockbridge, Mass.

As of last fall, he was listed as the museum's third vice president and a member of its board of trustees.

"He's certainly one of the collectors of Rockwell," said Levy, who wasn't sure how many Rockwell paintings Spielberg owns or where he kept "Russian Schoolroom." "We have a few in our office on the Universal lot."

The probe into the original theft lay dormant until 2004, when art crime investigators determined that the painting had been advertised for sale at a Norman Rockwell exhibit in New York in 1989.

Agents in the New York and Los Angeles field offices began putting out bulletins in art circles and tracking down known Rockwell collectors.

"We were basically just about to figure it out when the Spielberg people made the connection," Calarco said.

Linda Pero, curator of the Norman Rockwell Museum in Stockbridge, Mass., said: "I think it's really wonderful."

The FBI made the Spielberg link public late Friday, after an earlier notice — published in today's Calendar section — that the painting may have been found.

For now, the painting will remain in Spielberg's possession.

"I just advised them to hold on to it. It's safe there," Calarco said.

Governor Weighs Compromise Plan On Death Penalty (WP)

By John Wagner

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

Short of Repeal, O'Malley Seeks Limits

Gov. Martin O'Malley, who testified last month in favor of repealing Maryland's death penalty, has started exploring a compromise with lawmakers that would limit the possibility of execution to just a few types of offenders, such as inmates who kill prison guards.

Aides to O'Malley (D) say that such a deal might be the best hope for passing legislation that would tighten the scope of the state's death penalty. But that could put the governor at odds with advocates of a repeal, who say that the strategy could backfire and result in a bill that differs little from current law.

A debate that has focused on the death penalty's value as a deterrent along with problems with lethal injection, advocates say, could degenerate into a fight over which categories of killers -- including those who kidnap, rape and abuse children -- should be eligible for execution.

In an interview yesterday, O'Malley said he thinks most lawmakers are firm in their views on the death penalty, which could make it difficult to persuade enough of them to support a full repeal.

"I don't see that changing a lot in the four years ahead," O'Malley said. "I try to make progress wherever we can make progress, trusting future leaders and generations to reach perfection."

O'Malley met this week with Sen. Alex X. Mooney (R-Frederick), who is widely considered to hold the swing vote on the Senate committee considering the repeal, about whether he could support a bill narrowing eligibility for the death penalty.

Mooney, who has also talked with an O'Malley legislative aide, said he is trying to keep an open mind. Among those he said he would like to see remain eligible for the death penalty are people who kill police officers and prison guards.

"I've never been for a full repeal of the death penalty, but I've left the door open a crack that maybe I could vote for an amended bill," said Mooney, a conservative Republican and practicing Catholic.

Del. Samuel I. Rosenberg (D-Baltimore), lead sponsor of the repeal effort in the House, is among several death penalty opponents who have said that nothing short of a full repeal is acceptable.

"We want a repeal of the death penalty," Rosenberg said. "It's a system that's broken. We can't tinker with it. We can't fix it. We can't just limit it to a certain number of crimes."

During testimony before legislative panels last month, O'Malley said that the death penalty is "inherently unjust" because wrongly convicted people could be put to death.

He also said that there is no evidence that executions are an effective deterrent to murder and that money spent prosecuting death penalty cases could be better spent fighting violent crime.

Five people have been put to death in Maryland since executions resumed in 1978, and one person has been released from death row after being exonerated. There are six people on death row.

Under current law, those guilty of first-degree murder are eligible for the death penalty if prosecutors can prove at least one of 10 aggravating factors, including killing a law enforcement officer and committing murder while in prison. Other categories include contract killings and killings of kidnap victims.

Debate over a bill that includes any of those categories inevitably will open the door to efforts to add others, lawmakers on both sides of the issue say.

"Once you say you're going to use the death penalty, it's difficult to draw lines and say who's worse than other guys on the list," said Sen. Brian E. Frosh (D-Montgomery), a death penalty opponent and chairman of the Judicial Proceedings Committee.

Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. (D-Calvert), a death penalty supporter, said he cannot see his chamber limiting executions to just a few categories of killers.

Some death penalty opponents say they probably have the votes to pass a full repeal in the House this session. Even if they are short in the Senate, some say, it would be a mistake to compromise.

A court ruling in December halted executions until the state issues new regulations on lethal injection. Jane Henderson, executive director of Maryland Citizens Against State Executions, said she thinks it is unlikely that executions will resume before next year's legislative session, when odds of a repeal would be no worse.

"I think a year from now, we'll still have an effective moratorium," Henderson said. She also said that it makes no sense to reserve the death penalty for narrow classes of offenders. "My view is, this is about whether we should have the death penalty or not."

Richard J. Dowling, executive director of the Maryland Catholic Conference, said that a bill that stops short of a full repeal could be expanded. "A door that is ajar only slightly can be pushed wide open," he said.

Dangerous Pursuits (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

The Supreme Court considers limits on high-speed chases, but police departments should be the ones changing policy.

IF YOU WORRY — as you should — about the dangers of high-speed police chases, don't expect the U.S. Supreme Court to impose new limits on the practice. This week, several justices reacted skeptically to the claim of a Georgia man that he should be allowed to sue a deputy sheriff because he was paralyzed after a police car rammed his vehicle.

Fortunately, in Los Angeles and elsewhere, police forces are acting on their own to limit the dangers such chases pose to police, suspects and the public. Sensible regulations are a better safeguard against out-of-control chases than a Supreme Court ruling making it easier for suspects injured in such cases to sue police officers.

A good thing too, because the case argued Monday was a poor candidate for a sweeping decision against police. A lawyer for Victor Harris, who is now a quadriplegic, asked the court to extend to car chases its 1985 ruling that police pursuing someone on foot may not use deadly force unless the suspect poses "a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others."

Unluckily for Harris, the justices were able to view a videotape of the nine-mile chase that began when police tried to stop Harris for speeding. Justice Antonin Scalia called it "the scariest chase I ever saw since 'The French Connection.' "

A majority of the court seems likely to embrace the position of the Bush administration. Deputy U.S. Solicitor General Gregory Garre told the court that when a suspect "demonstrates a disregard for his own life and the lives of others in his path, the police may use force, including deadly force, to bring the suspect's vehicle flight to a halt and protect the public safety."

The problem is that police chases are often prolonged not because the officers fear that a driver will injure others but because they don't want to lose their man — even if the only crime he has committed is speeding, and even when pursuing him poses a danger to bystanders.

The best way to rein in overzealous officers is to do what the Los Angeles Police Department has done: establish a pursuit policy that places the safety of the public above the goal of apprehending a motorist who hasn't committed a serious crime or who can be arrested later. The policy says that ramming a fleeing car is a "last resort" to be used only when necessary to save lives.

Technology also may help. The LAPD has experimented with an air-propelled miniature dart equipped with a global positioning device. Fired from a patrol car, it sticks to a fleeing vehicle and allows police to track it.

However the Supreme Court rules in the Georgia case, responsible police departments will continue to tell officers to take it slow — for their own and the public's protection.

Justice Department Drops Inquiry Into Cowboy Church's Worship Rights (ROT)

By Ana Ribeiro

Roanoke Times, March 3, 2007

Bedford County could review the ordinance the church was deemed to have violated.

The Justice Department has dropped an inquiry into whether Bedford County violated a church's rights by limiting their ability to worship in a Moneta barn.

The Rev. Ray Bell of the Cowboy Church of Virginia made the announcement at a news conference Thursday. In a phone interview, he said he's "puzzled, but not upset" about the agency's decision.

Controversy surrounded the Cowboy Church for months. Services temporarily ceased at the Moneta barn last spring when Bedford County cited violations to a zoning and safety ordinance.

Services resumed last summer after advocates flooded county officials with phone calls. The Constitution guarantees people the right to worship and assemble, supporters have argued -- and that includes followers of the cowboy culture who hold their weekday services on a farm.

A Feb. 16 letter to Bell from the Justice Department states: "We carefully reviewed the information that you have provided and determined that no further action by the Department is warranted."

Bell had provided information on the issue to the Justice Department, but only after the agency asked for it, he said. He did not personally request an investigation, Bell said.

Bell said he prayed for Bedford County not to have to pay fines as a result of a possible Justice Department decision against the county's ordinance, and had his prayers answered.

Now, it's likely that the county will talk about reviewing the ordinance, Bell said.

"The end product is we wanted the ordinance changed or modified," he said. "We're delighted that Bedford County didn't undergo any financial duress due to this."

U.S. Won't Corral 'cowboy' Church (RTD)

By Justin Faulconer, MEDIA GENERAL NEWS SERVICE

Richmond Times-Dispatch, March 3, 2007

Justice Department decides not to get involved in zoning dispute in Bedford County

LYNCHBURG -- The U.S. Department of Justice has decided to step out of a zoning dispute between a "cowboy" church and Bedford County officials.

In letters last month to the Rev. Raymond Bell of the Cowboy Church of Virginia and George Nester, Bedford's community development director, the federal department concluded no further action is warranted in deciding if Bedford zoning laws infringe upon a federal act that protects religious land use.

The church holds services in a large barn off Horseshoe Bend Road in Moneta.

Six months ago, the department began investigating whether the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act was violated. Bell has opposed the county's requirement that a special-use permit be obtained to hold religious services, claiming it violates the separation of church and state.

Nester said it's standard procedure that churches obtain a special-use permit to hold religious services in newly constructed buildings or new additions to existing buildings.

A spokesperson for the Department of Justice declined to comment about the matter. Bell also declined to comment but said he would have more to say later this week.

The Cowboy Church started meeting about a year ago in the Moneta barn, on a farm owned by Garland Simmons. Since then, it has been involved in zoning red tape with the county.

DOJ_NMG_0140309

The county originally said using the barn as a church violated building codes and was unsafe for large gatherings. That matter has since been resolved because it was determined the structure is not predominantly used as a church, Nester said.

The church is still holding services under the Cowboy Church name because of its part-time utilization of the barn, Nester said.

"We have no problem with it operating as it is," he said.

County officials are reviewing and amending the Comprehensive Plan. The next step would be to review the zoning ordinance. Nester said the county should take a closer look at the language regarding religious land use to ensure there are no infringements on the federal act.

Defense Argues Conflict Of Interest In Seale Case (JCL)

By Jerry Mitchell

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, March 3, 2007

Lawyer says judge, magistrate have ties to U.S. attorney's office

U.S. District Judge Henry Wingate and U.S. Magistrate Judge Linda Anderson should step down from the case involving the 1964 slayings of two black teenagers, the attorney for reputed Klansman James Seale said Friday.

Wingate and Anderson happen to be the only African-American judges in the Southern District of Mississippi, but Federal Public Defender Dennis Joiner made no mention of that fact. Instead, he argued the judges have a prior association with the U.S. attorney's office and the case had been assigned to another judge and magistrate judge initially.

In January, Seale pleaded innocent to the federal kidnapping and conspiracy charges in connection with the May 2, 1964, abduction of Henry Hezekiah Dee and Charles Eddie Moore, reportedly by Klansmen. The teenagers were hitchhiking in Meadville when they were grabbed and beaten before being drowned in the Mississippi River, according to FBI reports.

Seale, now 71, faces an April 2 trial. If convicted, he could receive life in prison.

Joiner accused U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton of manipulating the system to have these judges hear the case.

"The U.S. Attorney has had the sole ability to select which specific district court judge he wants to sit on any criminal case in the Jackson Division," Joiner wrote. "He does this by asking the grand jury to return an indictment during a month assigned to a particular judge."

Joiner pointed out Wingate and Anderson both have served at the U.S. attorney's office - Anderson during the time the case was reinvestigated. Wingate was appointed to the bench in 1985.

It will be up to Wingate to rule on the matter.

In his motion filed Friday with the U.S. District Court in Jackson, Joiner produced a July 25 document that showed the case then as being in the Western Division. By rule, all Western Division cases are assigned to U.S. District Judge David Bramlette, Joiner said.

Documents also show the case was originally assigned to U.S. Magistrate Judge James Sumner, Joiner said. "There has been no order entered in the record transferring the case from Judge Wingate to another district court judge, nor has there been any order transferring the case from James C. Sumner to another magistrate judge."

Lampton responded Friday that he doesn't know why the case was moved from Sumner to Anderson and that he had nothing to do with that switch.

He said there's nothing improper with the way his office has handled the case.

Documents filed Friday also make clear Charles Marcus Edwards will be a likely witness against Seale. Last year, federal authorities gave Edwards immunity in exchange for him testifying before the federal grand jury investigating the killings.

Both Seale and Edwards were arrested Nov. 6, 1964, in connection with the slayings. At the time, Edwards confessed his involvement in the beatings. Authorities confronted Seale about his alleged involvement, according to FBI records. "We know you did it. You know you did. The Lord above knows you did it."

"Yes," Seale was quoted as replying. "But I'm not going to admit it. You are going to have to prove it."

Local authorities never pursued the case, and it languished like many others from the civil rights era.

Justice Department officials announced this week they're reexamining about a dozen cases from that era in hopes they can be pursued.

The newly introduced Emmett Till Unsolved Crime Act would give the Justice Department additional resources to pursue these cases, said Alvin Sykes of Kansas City, who conceived the bill.

"We want anybody involved in killing, lynching or kidnapping investigated or prosecuted - or we want them to die in fear of being arrested," he said. "We want to find as much truth as possible so we can secure as much justice as possible."

Black Group Pleased With Federal Probe (SAVMN)

Savannah Morning News, March 3, 2007

ATLANTA - A civil rights group that has pushed for years to reopen state and federal investigations into the decades-old lynching at Moore's Ford Bridge near Monroe said Friday they are pleased that the U.S. Department of Justice has decided to take another look at the case.

"You just feel like the rule of law is going to prevail," said state Rep. Tyrone Brooks, D-Atlanta, who is president of the Georgia Association of Black Elected Officials.

The group has pushed since at least 1998 for new investigations into killings of two black couples - Mae and George Dorsey along with Dorothy and Roger Malcom - in the summer of 1946.

Brooks said his group has been aware for more than a year that the FBI was probing the Moore's Ford case again but kept the information quiet to avoid interfering with the probe.

But during a press conference Tuesday, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller announced that the Justice Department was reopening the investigations of some Civil Rights Era killings, including the Moore's Ford case. The Georgia Bureau of Investigation reopened its investigation several years ago on the orders of then-Gov. Roy Barnes.

Brooks said local activists have kept up with at least five living suspects who were identified in the original FBI report following the 1946 killings. Brooks' group and local organizations also have been talking to witnesses.

"We're going to be making an appeal to the suspects to turn themselves in and avoid a long ordeal," Brooks said.

Brooks also said the group is working to boost its reward fund - from $27,000 to $100,000 - for information leading to the arrest and conviction of those guilty of the murders.

GABEO also announced its annual April 4 commemoration of the lynchings to coincide with the anniversary of the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and its July 25 re-enactment of the killings.

Brooks said one of the living suspects usually makes it a point to drive his pickup across the bridge during the re-enactments.

"He drives across real slow, and he'll look at us, and we'll look back," Brooks said.

This year, however, both sides will know that the investigation of what happened in that same place 61 years ago is not over.

"I think suspects should be getting a little nervous right now," Brooks said.

In Victory For Hispanics, Judge Halts Port Chester Elections (NYT)

By Barbara Whitaker

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

WHITE PLAINS, March 2 — A federal judge on Friday stopped March elections for two seats on the Port Chester Board of Trustees, finding there was sufficient evidence to make the case that the village's at-large system for voting discriminates against Hispanic residents.

In a 32-page ruling read from the bench, Judge Stephen C. Robinson of Federal District Court found merit in virtually every argument made by Justice Department lawyers seeking an injunction to stop the March 20 elections. The village, however, may still hold a mayoral election scheduled for the same day, the judge ruled.

"I think what we heard in court says everything," said Cesar Ruiz, a Hispanic man who filed a complaint with the Justice Department after an unsuccessful bid for village trustee in 2001. "I'm very pleased."

The village trustees scheduled an executive session for Saturday morning to discuss the case and decide whether to continue its fight against breaking the village into six voting districts, one of which would be predominantly Hispanic, to replace its at-large system.

Anthony G. Piscionere, who is representing the village in the case, said he believed that the village still had a chance of winning, particularly if the case went to appeal. A trial date has been set for April 16 through April 20.

"The question is whether the board wants to continue or not," he said.

Dan Brakewood, a trustee, said he thought it was time to bring an end to the case, which he estimated had cost the village $500,000.

"We have looked at whether we are in violation or not for 11 months," Mr. Brakewood said. "Now we have the facts and information we need to move on. We need to settle this. It's in the best interest of the community."

DOJ_NMG_0140311

Mayor Gerald L. Logan defended the current system, saying that officials had reached out to Hispanics in an attempt to include them in the system. He noted that 10 percent of the Police Department is Hispanic and that Hispanics held positions on some village boards.

The lawsuit, filed by the Justice Department in December, charges that the at-large system — meaning that all residents of the village vote for all candidates on the ballot — is unfairly weighted against Hispanic residents, a violation of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. According to the lawsuit, the system allows for white bloc voting, which inhibits Hispanic voters' ability to elect their preferred candidate.

To support their case, the government presented statistics noting that more than 46 percent of the village's population and 21.9 percent of its voting age citizens are Hispanic, yet no Hispanic person has ever been elected to public office in the village. In arguments on whether the March elections should be held, David Kennedy, an assistant United States attorney, said going forward with the elections would perpetuate the discriminatory system.

Village lawyers argued that Hispanics have been invited to participate in the election process, but have often declined. They suggested that the problem is one of voter apathy and said steps are being taken to increase voter participation, particularly that of Hispanics, in the community. To divide the small village of 28,000, about 30 miles from New York City, into voting districts would ultimately segregate the village, lawyers argued.

In order to make a case for stopping the elections, the government had to prove several points, including that the minority group was geographically compact and sufficiently large enough to constitute a majority in a district; that the minority group was politically cohesive; and that the majority voted as a bloc to enable it to usually defeat the minority's preferred candidate. In addition, the government had to prove that there were other circumstances that impaired the ability of the minority.

Among the other points examined was whether there had been a history of discrimination that affected the rights of minorities to participate in the democratic process, whether elections were racially polarized, whether candidates had been denied access to the process to get on the ballot and the extent to which members of the minority group have been elected to public office in the jurisdiction.

The judge called the last stipulation one of the most important, noting that no one disputed that no member of the Hispanic community in Port Chester had ever been elected to public office.

"Indeed, in all the trustee elections studied by both sides in this case through 2006, only two Hispanics have ever been on the ballot in a Port Chester trustee election — Jose Santos in 1992 and Cesar Ruiz in 2001 — and both finished last in their respective fields," Judge Robinson said.

Federal Judge Halts Port Chester Election (NYJN)

By Liz Sadler, THE JOURNAL NEWS

New York Journal News, March 3, 2007

A federal judge yesterday halted Port Chester's March 20 election for two seats on the Board of Trustees, saying the village election system discriminates against Hispanic voters.

In an oral decision, U.S. District Judge Stephen Robinson cited evidence of racial polarization in Port Chester's at-large election system. He said that if the case goes to trial, the U. S. Justice Department was likely to succeed in its claim that the current election system dilutes the Hispanic vote in violation of the federal Voting Rights Act.

"It is clear to this court that Hispanic voters in Port Chester prefer different candidates, and that non-Hispanic voters generally vote as a bloc to defeat the Hispanic-preferred candidate," Robinson said, capping a two-week hearing on whether the current election system discriminates against Hispanics. It is the first time a judge has stopped an election in Westchester County.

Village officials expressed disappointment, but most declined to comment on whether they wanted to continue to fight the lawsuit. The board will meet with its lawyers today to discuss the next steps. It may choose to settle with the Justice Department and adopt voting districts or go to trial. The village also can appeal the injunction to the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

It has already spent some $472,000 on lawyer fees and other legal expenses, draining what was a $2.5 million fund balance and raising some questions about whether to proceed.

"It is in the best interest of our village to reach a resolution with the Department of Justice," Democratic Trustee Daniel Brakewood said after the decision. "We cannot afford to spend more taxpayer dollars trying to maintain a flawed and outdated election system. This fight has also divided our community, and continued litigation will only make a bad situation worse."

Anthony Piscionere, a lawyer for the village, expressed doubts about whether he could win a trial before Robinson, but was already predicting the outcome of an appeal.

"I think this case is very winnable in the 2nd Circuit, from what we've seen so far," Piscionere said. "That's a decision the board is going to have to make."

U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said in a statement: "In bringing this suit, the Justice Department sought to vindicate the voting rights of minority citizens in the village of Port Chester. I am pleased that Judge Robinson ... found that the United States is likely to succeed on the merits of its claim that the village of Port Chester's system for electing its Board of Trustees violates Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act."

Robinson's decision does not affect the March mayoral election, and retiring Mayor Gerald Logan, a Republican, said he saw no reason to postpone the race. As village officials huddled with their attorneys, Hispanic advocates basked in victory outside the courthouse.

"I feel very, very happy right now," said Cesar Ruiz, an unsuccessful trustee candidate whose complaint to the Justice Department triggered the federal investigation into Hispanic voter disenfranchisement in the village. He filed papers yesterday seeking to join the suit as a plaintiff.

"What I like about this is it just doesn't open up the doors for myself," Ruiz said. "It opens it up for a lot of people in Port Chester that have been frustrated with the way this system is."

The Justice Department sued the village in December, challenging the method it uses to elect its six trustees. It wants the village to replace its voting system - in which trustees are elected in a villagewide vote - with one in which they are elected from different districts.

Robinson said his decision was based largely on the village trustee and mayoral elections from 2001 to 2006, when the candidates preferred by Hispanics lost 12 of 15 races. Robinson said he did not believe whites voted differently from Hispanics because of racial bias, but the results prove that "polarization is present in Port Chester."

The judge said he was also "struck" by a suggestion by Aldo Vitagliano, a lawyer from Port Chester, at an October public hearing on voting districts. Vitagliano asked Congress to introduce an amendment exempting Port Chester from the Voting Rights Act, then was appointed special counsel to a commission formed to examine how to best implement voting districts.

"That a lawyer would make such a suggestion is unusual enough, but the fact that the village subsequently named this individual as counsel to the newly formed Voting Rights Commission in the village was, to say the least, surprising," Robinson said. Vitagliano also served as associate counsel to Piscionere during the hearing.

In his decision, Robinson said the village had met the three preconditions established in a 1986 voting rights case, Thornburg vs. Gingles, to determine a violation of Section 2 - the minority is sufficiently large and geographically compact, the minority is politically cohesive and the white majority votes in a bloc that usually defeats the minority's preferred candidate.

"I think the judge's ruling today gives a strong sense of the likelihood of our success in court," said Democratic Trustee Dennis Pilla, who is running for mayor.

In Florida, Osceola County spent nearly 18 months and about $2 million fighting a similar federal voting rights suit, according to The Orlando Sentinel. In December, after losing at trial, county commissioners decided to abide by a federal judge's order to implement single-member voting.

Jon Greenbaum, a former Justice Department lawyer who now works for the Washington-based Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, a nonprofit legal organization, said the chances of Port Chester wining at trial are "very slight."

"You would think they would look to settle the case now," he said. "The advantage, if they settle the case, is they have some control of what the plan's going to look like. If they go to trial, they will get the first option in terms of proposing a remedy, but if they can't agree on a plan, the court could end up going with the plan the DOJ proposed."

Robinson has set aside trial dates of April 16-20.

Black Lawyer's Suit Accuses Cochran Law Firm Of Racial Bias (LAT)

By Jessica Garrison, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

For decades, the law firm founded by the late Johnnie L. Cochran Jr. has been renowned as a black-run institution fighting for civil rights and against police abuse — not to mention getting O.J. Simpson acquitted of murder charges.

But now, in a development that has dismayed some in Los Angeles' African American community, attorney Shawn Chapman Holley has sued the firm, claiming, among other things, that its leaders discriminated against her because she is black.

Holley said that after Cochran's death in 2005, leadership of the firm was turned over to white men who began to discriminate against black lawyers and black clients.

Neither she nor her attorneys would comment on the suit, although she released a statement through her lawyer:

"In deference to the memory of Johnnie Cochran and in deference to his family, I do not intend to engage in a public airing of our disagreements. The lawsuit speaks for itself, and this matter will be litigated in the courts."

Randy H. McMurray, a partner in the firm, denied Holley's charges.

"We probably have the most diverse law firm in California. I don't know what race we would be discriminating against," he said, noting that he and another partner in the L.A. office, Brian Dunn, are black.

News of the suit raised eyebrows among some members of the city's black establishment.

"Racial discrimination at the Cochran firm?" asked public affairs consultant Kerman Maddox. "When you think Johnnie Cochran, you think best and brightest in the black community.

"I'm shocked. If true, that would be a devastating blow to the legacy of Johnnie Cochran."

Cochran, the great-grandson of slaves, founded his firm in 1965. He was best known nationally for his successful defense of Simpson against charges that he murdered his ex-wife, Nicole Brown Simpson, and her friend Ronald Lyle Goldman.

But for decades before those 1994 killings, Cochran was well-known in Los Angeles for a string of cases in which he won historic financial settlements and helped bring about lasting changes in police procedure.

By the time of his death two years ago from an inoperable brain tumor, his firm had gone national, with offices in 20 U.S. cities.

Other changes brought controversy, including a merger with a national criminal defense firm, headquartered in Santa Monica, and the departure of Holley and another black partner, Eric Ferrer, who also had worked extensively with Cochran.

Holley, who worked with Cochran for 17 years, was appointed two years ago to be a liaison between the civil and criminal sides of the firm, according to her suit.

She claims that she became concerned about the quality of criminal representation being offered to clients. But when she raised her concerns with the partners at the Cochran firm, they ignored her, then demoted her, she says.

According to the suit, the demotion was approved by five managers of the firm, four of whom "are Caucasian males."

Then, in January 2006, according to her suit, she was fired.

McMurray, the Cochran firm partner, denied terminating Holley.

"She was not fired," he said. "Our perceptions of her leaving the firm are different."

ANTITRUST:

TXU Trading Ahead Of Deal Is Scrutinized (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, March 3, 2007

On Feb. 23, rumors began circulating in Washington that Texas utility giant TXU Corp. was close to striking an agreement with environmentalists opposing the company's plans to build new power plants. The company's shares surged 4% that day, as did trading in its options.

There was a deal, in fact. It was to sell the entire company. And, according to a Securities and Exchange Commission complaint filed late Friday, someone apparently already had begun trading illegally on the information.

The SEC issued a temporary restraining order on certain unknown accounts Friday, for trading in call options that first began on Feb. 21, two days before word leaked that the utility was to be sold to private-equity firms. These unknown traders -- the SEC plans to identify them in further litigation -- scored $5.4 million in profits, the agency alleges.

REACTION FROM THE DEAL JOURNAL

· Dana Cimilluca: Christopher Cox is Listening1

Such activity has been at the center of suspicious market moves around a number of recent mergers and acquisitions. The total dollar value of these moves, however, far exceeds the figures involved in this case, which was brought in a U.S. District Court for Northern Illinois.

In the days leading up to the deal, TXU's buyers were in discussions with a number of outside parties. Their hope was to convince both environmental groups and Texas lawmakers about the merits of its offer.

Such discussions are usually governed by strict confidentiality agreements, which is supposed to guarantee negotiations go on in secret. These agreements are supposed to protect sellers from leaks that might affect its stock price.

Buyers are always free to get waivers for these sorts of things. But that didn't happen in this case, people familiar with the matter said.

TXU spokesman Brian Tulloh said that "We don't have any objections to the contacts that they made with environmental groups or policy makers."

Jeffer Eller, a spokesman for the buyers, said: "We believe that we complied with the confidentiality agreement."

Watchdog Freezes Assets From TXU Trades (FT)

By Jeremy Grant And Stephanie Kirchgaessner In Washington

Financial Times, March 3, 2007

US federal regulators on Friday secured a court order freezing more than $5m in assets belonging to unknown traders who bought TXU call options a few days before the $45bn sale of the US utility to private equity groups.

The Securities and Exchange Commission said the buyers of the options "engaged in illegal insider trading". The SEC said the "highly profitable and suspicious purchases" were made through overseas accounts late last month ahead of the deal announced on February 26.

In a sign of the global scope of the case, the SEC was helped by the UK's Financial Services Authority and Swiss counterparts. It comes in the same week that current and former employees of three top Wall Street banks were charged by federal prosecutors with insider trading.

Regulators uncovered the use of overseas accounts to trade options at the Chicago Board Options Exchange in advance of the announcement of TXU's purchase by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, Texas Pacific Group and Goldman Sachs.

The SEC said unknown traders made purchases of call-option contracts three times last week through accounts at Credit Suisse in Zurich, broker Fimat in Frankfurt and UBS in London.

The price of TXU shares jumped by 13 per cent after the deal was announced, netting the traders more than $5.3m.

The SEC has contacted the firms that handled the trades to try to identify the traders, but lawyers said they had enough evidence of insider trading without knowing who the perpetrators were.

Kevin Edmundson, trial counsel in the SEC's Fort Worth office, said: "The presumption is based on the timing and the sizes of the trades, particularly on February 23, which strongly suggests that a person or entity was acting on confidential information."

The TXU deal stands apart from traditional mergers and acquisitions because the companies involved engaged in a fairly widespread lobbying campaign to line up support for the transaction before it was announced.

A few days before the deal was first leaked on the CNBC television channel on Friday after the close of the market, representatives for the buy-out groups involved pitched the takeover to the Environmental Defense Fund, Public Citizen, and the Natural Resources Defense Council.

Then, on Thursday – a day before it was first reported – the buy-out groups reached out to legislators and the governor of Texas. It is far from clear whether the lobbying campaign is connected to the insider trading allegations.

U.S. Is Investigating Trades Made Just Before TXU Deal (NYT)

By Eric Dash

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

Federal regulators froze more than $5.3 million that they suspect may be profits from insider trading of TXU stock options that occurred just days before a $45 billion buyout of the Texas energy company.

The Securities and Exchange Commission is trying to identify who made at least three large and unusually well-timed bets that TXU's stock would rise.

The trading occurred from Feb. 21 to Feb. 23; two private equity firms, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company and the Texas Pacific Group, announced the deal on Feb. 26.

Federal investigators hope to track down the traders by untangling a web of transactions that passed through offshore accounts of several large banks and brokerage firms.

In papers filed yesterday in Federal District Court in Chicago, the S.E.C. froze more than $5.3 million that may be held in the domestic accounts of UBS Securities, Credit Suisse and Fimat Banque Frankfurt. It hopes to recover any gains linked to insider trading. Without the identities of any suspects, the commission said that it would need help from its counterparts overseas.

Yesterday's action comes as securities regulators have been signaling their intent to crack down on insider trading. On Thursday, the S.E.C. and the Justice Department accused more than a dozen people and hedge funds of making more than $15 million from an insider trading ring.

It is unclear whether the Justice Department is pursuing its own insider trading case related to TXU. A spokeswoman for the United States attorney's office in Dallas, Kathy Colvin, declined to comment about whether it is investigating.

But federal securities regulators said they were trying to track down the traders who placed big bets before reports of the TXU deal. Activity in the options market surrounding the stock was unusually high days before the takeover; TXU's shares jumped more than 13 percent the day the deal was announced.

In particular, according to court filings, investigators are zeroing-in on a transaction on Feb. 23, when a trader made about $4.7 million in profit. The unidentified trader bought 6,700 TXU call-option contracts that expired in March 2007, essentially betting that shares of the energy company would go up.

Unwinding the web of transactions could prove difficult. The trade was traced to an omnibus account at UBS Securities, an American broker-dealer. That account, in turn, was linked to an account of its British affiliate in London, which possibly contained the transactions of dozens of account holders, according to court filings.

According to the filings, a UBS compliance officer said that UBS London was acting on behalf of its affiliate in Zurich. And furthermore, the filings said, the S.E.C. learned that data suggested that the UBS Securities trade was on behalf of Julius Baer, a Swiss broker and bank.

Smaller trades passed through Credit Suisse and Fimat Banque in Germany, according to the S.E.C. complaint. On Feb. 21, unknown traders made about $457,300 from call options bought through Credit Suisse in Zurich; those trades were cleared through its Swiss American Securities subsidiary. On Feb. 21 and Feb. 22, traders made about $150,000 from call options bought through Fimat Banque.

Federal regulators said that they had been in contact with all the parties involved in the TXU takeover deal, whom they called helpful and cooperative. Officials at the banks and broker-dealers were not reached for comment.

FINE PRINT Environmentalist Groups Feud Over Terms Of The TXU Buyout (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith And Jim Carlton

The Wall Street Journal, March 3, 2007

Just days after two of the nation's leading environmental groups blessed an investor plan to buy TXU Corp. and take the controversial Texas utility in a new and "greener" direction, a battle has broken out in the environmental community over the terms of the deal.

The Natural Resources Defense Council and Environmental Defense claimed victory Monday when a holding company formed by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co., Texas Pacific Group and other investors announced the biggest buyout in history, a plan to take over TXU for $32 billion plus the assumption of around $12 billion in debt. The environmental groups, two of the most powerful and best-funded in the U.S., said they had extracted a pledge from the investors to cancel a slew of coal-fired power plants, cut emissions and back federal global-warming legislation.

DEAL JOURNAL

1 · Read the Journal's new daily take2 on the high-stakes world of deal making, and see more in our new Deals & Deal Makers page3.

But now, opponents of the deal, in a blizzard of emails and Internet posts, have put the two organizations on the defensive by accusing them of settling for too little. The critics, who encompass a broad range of smaller environmental groups and individuals, say TXU should have been forced to give up all, not just some, of its future plans involving coal-fired power plants. The plants release substantial amounts of carbon dioxide, a heat-trapping gas blamed in part for climate change.

Even worse, some believe that the environmental interests were snookered. Since the buyout was announced, it has become apparent that some of the concessions involve projects that TXU was already planning to shelve for a variety of reasons. And TXU has fueled the skepticism further in recent days by outlining new loopholes in the pledge.

NRDC and Environmental Defense "should be hung for what they've done," fumed Tim Hermach, executive director of the Native Forest Council, a group in Eugene, Ore., whose main mission is protecting public forests from commercial logging and other industrial practices.

The infighting shows that tremendous disagreements remain over how tough green activists should be in their dealings with business. The TXU deal comes at a time when more businesses are choosing to work with environmentalists to avoid costly and embarrassing public fights on issues ranging from global warming to rampant logging. The Rainforest Action Network, for example, in recent years has forged deals with companies such as Home Depot Inc. to quit using wood products from endangered forests in exchange for public endorsements. Some timber companies in the Northwest have also gotten larger environmental groups to agree to forest-protection plans that allow for some degree of logging, despite continuing opposition from other grass-roots activists.

But it can be difficult to determine who is empowered to speak for the environmental movement. As is the case with TXU, these dealings often lead to charges from other environmentalists that their peers have been co-opted by big business in exchange for a seat at the table. "It can be flattering to be invited into this crowd," says Alan Muller, executive director of a group called Green Delaware, who is also among those criticizing the NRDC and Environmental Defense.

The environmentalists involved in the TXU negotiations scoff at that assertion. "We've been around long enough that we don't flatter very easily," said David Hawkins, director of the NRDC's climate center, who helped represent the 37-year-old organization in the deal.

Environmental Defense and the NRDC -- both based in New York -- are among the best-funded groups in the green world, with annual budgets totaling about $120 million combined. Both have policies against accepting most corporate contributions. The NRDC has a somewhat higher profile, with actors Robert Redford and Leonardo DiCaprio on its board of trustees.

TXU's would-be buyers also defend the deal. "I think it's inevitable there are critics to any change," said William K. Reilly, an administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency under former Presidents Bush and Clinton who now works as a senior advisor to Texas Pacific and led its group's talks with the environmentalists. "It's important to recognize that two of the most authoritative and experienced environmental organizations think this is a good deal."

(Separately, the Securities and Exchange Commission has filed court papers suggesting that it is investigating possible insider trading before the deal was announced. See related story4.)

New details of the agreement suggest it has big built-in loopholes that seem tailor-made for conflict. Under the agreement, the buyers said they'd suspend development efforts on eight of 11 planned coal-burning power plants.

But already, TXU Chief Executive C. John Wilder, who is expected to remain at the utility, is talking about the conditions that would allow TXU to "apply or reapply" for permits to build coal-fired plants in Texas. According to a transcript of a call with investors this week, Mr. Wilder said TXU wouldn't build plants burning pulverized coal "unless our customers face reliability issues, shortages leading to higher prices, or our competitors propose plants that are expected to have a meaningful impact on market dynamics."

Those circumstances appear likely to be met, perhaps as early as 2009, meaning TXU could revive construction efforts without breaking the deal if there's a scarcity of power caused by a dearth of new plants, or if plants come along that challenge TXU's strong position in the state's deregulated electricity market. Critics say these and other exceptions make it appear unlikely that TXU's agreement to move away from coal is as solid as it initially appeared. The state's grid operator said it fears reserves could slip into a danger zone as early as 2009, given a spurt in demand growth this year.

The environmental concessions were part of a package engineered by the private-equity buyers as a way of clearing political opposition to the TXU deal, which was bound to be controversial under any circumstances. Under Mr. Wilder's leadership, TXU has become greatly profitable, but also has drawn the ire of consumer and environmental groups for its rate increases and plans to build new coal-fired plants in Texas. Lately, TXU had been talking about building other such plants in other parts of the country.

The concessions announced by the environmental groups and the prospective buyers were worked out in secretive sessions last week, before the proposed deal became public. The agreement involves not just cutting back on coal plants in Texas, but also a pledge to back away from such projects in other regions. The buyers agreed to a general cutback in carbon-dioxide emissions. And the buyers agreed to a rate cut for some TXU customers in Texas.

The environmentalists involved in the deals say these were hard-won victories. For example, Jim Marston, an Environmental Defense attorney in Austin who led negotiations for the group, said that, through tough bargaining, he got commitments from the buyers that TXU wouldn't build coal plants in Pennsylvania, Virginia and "elsewhere." TXU's would-be buyers say the utility also was considering building a coal plant in Maryland, while Mr. Marston says Georgia was another potential site.

But some environmental interests in Texas were immediately bitter that the deal allowed three coal plants in Texas to proceed. Robert and Josephine Cervenka, farmers near Waco, already live within a mile or two of existing TXU plants and within about five miles of six proposed plants, including two by TXU. They formed an organization to fight construction of more plants in an area Mr. Cervenka calls "the ring of fire."

Initially overjoyed when they heard about the environmental deal with TXU, they quickly soured after learning that the proposed plants nearest them were going forward. Now, with the well-heeled national environmental groups out of the picture, they wonder how long they'll be able to carry on the fight. "We need money bad," said Ms. Cervenka.

Negotiators for both Environmental Defense and the NRDC say they wanted the other plants tabled, too, but were told TXU had spent too much on the projects to suspend development efforts. Besides, Mr. Reilly, the former EPA administrator, said Texas would have difficulty meeting rising demand without the plants. "You can accomplish a fair amount by improving energy efficiency in the state, but to say you can do so without adding plants at all isn't really feasible," Mr. Reilly said.

What the environmentalists didn't learn until later was that TXU's board already was considering killing some of the projects to quiet public outcry and to respond to changing political winds in Washington. In his investor call, Mr. Wilder said the management team and board already were "reshaping our development program to focus on a smaller number of plants" when they were approached by the buyout team.

Mr. Hawkins of the NRDC's climate center said his group was unaware of that -- but he added such a move wasn't surprising, given all the criticism TXU has faced.

A big point of contention is the givebacks involving plants TXU was targeting for other states. In fact, TXU hasn't filed for air or water permits in any of these states, nor has it purchased or obtained options on any parcels of land. And, given the firestorm it ignited in Texas with its $10 billion construction program, many observers said they doubted TXU really intended to wade deeper into controversy anytime soon.

Sierra Club officials in Texas said they still will oppose TXU's remaining three new coal plants and eight more proposed by others, working with consumer and property-rights groups. Sierra Club officials added they have empathy for the bind the NRDC and Environmental Defense were in. "I've been there before where...we've had to compromise," said Ken Kramer, the Sierra Club's Texas director, in Austin.

EMI's Board Rejects Warner's $4.1 Billion Bid As Inadequate (NYT)

By Jeff Leeds

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

The EMI Group of Britain, which releases music by the Beatles and Bob Seger, rejected a $4.1 billion takeover proposal yesterday from the Warner Music Group, signaling the latest turn in a long merger dance.

EMI said its board decided against Warner Music's cash offer, which was subject to "numerous assumptions and conditions," because it was not in the best interests of shareholders and placed too low a value on the company.

EMI, which has issued two profit warnings this year and is undertaking a broad restructuring, also said the offer carried regulatory uncertainty and "unacceptable operational risk at a critical time" for the company, which has been grappling with weak CD sales and sluggish industrywide sales of digital music.

EMI also said the bid of 260 pence a share, or $5.07, represented an "inadequate" offer considering the risks and the potential cost savings of a merger. The offer reflects a 17 percent premium over EMI's share price at the time it last announced it had been approached by Warner Music.

Wall Street analysts have considered a merger of EMI and Warner Music as inevitable, though many say the risk of antitrust regulators scotching the deal remains high and the companies' fortunes are uncertain. One analyst, Richard Greenfield of Pali Research, wrote two weeks ago that Warner Music's stock could be overvalued even if it purchased EMI at 250 pence a share.

Warner Music declined to comment.

Any deal would reshape the architecture of the music business, which is dominated by two giant conglomerates, the Universal Music Group and Sony BMG Music Entertainment, each about twice the size of EMI or Warner Music.

But recent talks between the companies have stalled on various issues, among them the question of who should bear the risk that regulators would block the transaction, according to executives briefed on the discussions. The two companies recently began new merger conversations after breaking off a round of talks last summer. At the time, Warner had offered 320 pence a share.

Those talks stalled when a European court overturned a regulatory decision that cleared the 2004 merger of the music divisions of Sony and Bertelsmann. Antitrust regulators said this week that they would reconsider the deal for the next four months while they gather pricing data and other information.

Warner Music officials thought they had raised the odds for an approval by striking an accord securing support from Impala, a European organization representing independent record labels, which had objected to previous tie-ups. But, in a protest gesture, one of the largest independent labels, Ministry of Sound, resigned from another British trade group that backed the deal.

EMI Dismisses 'non-binding' Warner Offer (FT)

By Emiko Terazono In London And Aline Van Duyn In New York

Financial Times, March 3, 2007

EMI, the UK music group behind Norah Jones and The Beatles, on Friday said it had dismissed a "non-binding proposal" from Warner Music at 260p a share.

The latest twist in the protracted merger talks comes as the European Commission this week launched an in-depth investigation into the merger of Sony and Bertelsmann's recorded music businesses.

DOJ_NMG_0140318

Warner submitted its proposals on Thursday evening. EMI's board met on Friday and quickly moved to reject the offer. It said Warner's proposals – which would depend on regulatory clearance – were "subject to numerous assumptions and conditions", adding that 260p a share was inadequate.

EMI and Warner have been trying to create a combined group since 2000. After several failed attempts, talks revived last year, but were in effect put on ice when a European court ruled that the European Commission had made "manifest errors" in approving the Sony-BMG deal in 2004, and ordered a new probe on competition grounds. A final decision is expected by July 2.

Warner declined to comment on the move, but people familiar with its plans said the US music group believed that if it has a merger agreement with EMI in place, it would be in a better position to influence the commission's deliberations.

"The Commission is looking at Sony and BMG. It is a good chance to throw EMI and Warner in there so they can look at the music market as a whole," said one person close to Warner.

However, one big EMI shareholder said the proposal was too conditional and vague for the board to accept. "They did the right thing. There is nothing concrete on the table," he said.

Some shareholders are hoping that private equity investors will make a bid, not least because that would avoid regulatory obstacles.

The main opposition over consolidation of large music groups has come from independent record labels, which have been concerned that the combined groups would crowd out smaller music groups.

However, last month Warner struck a truce with Impala, which represents independent record labels, clearing the way for the US-listed group to make a bid for EMI.

EMI Rejects 2.1 Billion-Pound Proposal From Warner (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Zimri Smith And Don Jeffrey

Bloomberg, March 3, 2007

March 2 (Bloomberg) -- EMI Group Plc, the world's third- largest music company, rejected a 2.1 billion-pound ($4.1 billion) takeover bid from Warner Music Group Corp. as too low.

Warner offered 260 pence a share, London-based EMI said in a statement today. The bid was 17 percent higher than EMI's closing price Feb. 19, the day before it said it received an approach from New York-based Warner Music. EMI today called the proposal ``inadequate."

The rejection extends the maneuvering between two companies struggling with declining music sales and piracy. EMI and Warner abandoned $4.6 billion offers for each other in July on concern a combination would be blocked by European Union regulators.

``EMI's holding out for a better premium," said Bishop Cheen, a bond analyst with Wachovia Securities in Charlotte, North Carolina. ``These two companies, because of their size, do belong together. But it's going to take a long time."

Shares of EMI gained 10.5 pence, or 4.5 percent, to 246.25 pence in London. They have fallen 7.1 percent this year. Warner shares fell 55 cents, or 2.8 percent, to $19.03 at 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading and have lost 17 percent.

Warner offered 320 pence a share for EMI last June.

The combined company would have a quarter of the global market, moving ahead of Sony BMG Music Entertainment to rank second worldwide behind Vivendi SA's Universal Music Group.

European Regulators

EMI's rejection follows yesterday's decision by European Union regulators to begin a new investigation of the merger that created Sony BMG Music. A European court's rejection of that combination led EMI and Warner to abandon their bids last year.

``I had thought Warner would wait for a definitive ruling from Europe," Hal Vogel, an independent analyst based in New York, said in an interview. ``Maybe they felt they should rush this now and take advantage of the management turmoil at EMI."

EMI, which released albums by Robbie Williams and Norah Jones in the second half of its fiscal year, said Feb. 14 it was experiencing an ``unprecedented level of market decline" and ``an exceptionally high level of product returns."

The company ousted its top two music executives, Alain Levy and David Munns, on Jan. 12 after disappointing holiday sales. Eric Nicoli, then chairman, was named chief executive officer. In December, EMI ended talks to be acquired by buyout firm Permira Advisers LLP, after failing to agree on a price.

Shrinking Sales

The North American market for compact discs has contracted 19 percent this year through Feb. 18 from a year ago, according to Nielsen SoundScan, which tracks music sales.

Warner, under Chief Executive Officer Edgar Bronfman Jr., said Feb. 8 that sales of recorded music slid 13 percent in the quarter ended Dec. 31. Demand for new releases fell from a year earlier, when the company had new albums from Madonna, James Blunt and Enya.

The two companies backed away from attempts to combine last year, after a July 13 ruling by the European Court of First Instance in Luxembourg cast doubt on whether a merger would win approval. The court said the European Commission, the EU's Brussels-based antitrust regulator, had only carried out ``an extremely cursory examination'' of the Sony BMG merger. The court ordered a new review and the commission said yesterday it would rule by July 2.

Independent Labels

EMI said today the proposal from Warner ``would entail prolonged regulatory uncertainty and unacceptable operational risk at a critical time for the company.''

Some analysts said the renewed bid by Bronfman, 51, would have a better chance this time because Warner has the support of the Independent Music Publishers and Labels Association or Impala, a trade group whose opposition to Sony BMG led the court to order the review of that deal.

``Getting this pledge from Impala increases the chances the deal will be approved,'' Tuna Amobi, an equity analyst with Standard & Poor's, said on Feb. 20 when Warner disclosed its renewed interest in EMI.

Warner Music said then there was ``a compelling logic in the combination of the two companies.'' Spokesman Will Tanous declined to comment today on the latest bid.

EMI's Nicoli, 56, has tried since 2000 to buy Warner, the world's fourth-largest music company, as a way to reduce costs.

Warner and EMI dropped efforts to merge in 2000 after regulators opposed the plan. EMI's attempt to buy Bertelsmann AG's BMG unit in 2001 was also stymied by regulators. EMI again failed to combine with Warner in 2003, when a group led by Bronfman won the bidding for Time Warner Inc.'s music unit.

EMI has two divisions: EMI Music, the recorded music unit, and EMI Music Publishing, which manages song copyrights. EMI said last month that the publishing unit ``continues to perform in line with expectations.''

The U.K. company reported a first-half loss of 30.6 million pounds in November, saying sales fell 6.1 percent because this year's release schedule is weighted to the second half more than usual. EMI's fiscal year ends March 31.

Ashcroft Criticizes Sirius/XM Merger In Letter To DOJ (MRKTWTCH)

By Corey Boles

Market Watch, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- Former Attorney General John Ashcroft, hired by opponents of the deal, has blasted the proposed merger of Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. , saying their merger would leave only one provider in the market.

Ashcroft, who served as head of the Justice Department for four years until January 2005, was hired by the National Association of Broadcasters to examine the merger scenario.

The NAB, which represents traditional radio broadcasters, has been a fierce critic of the $13 billion merger since it was announced last week.

In a letter sent on February 27 to his replacement as attorney general, Alberto Gonzales, Ashcroft concludes "...the proposed Sirius/XM merger, which reduces the number of competitors from two to one, raises most serious competition concerns."

Ashcroft compared the current merger to the attempted takeover by satellite provider Echostar Communications Corp. of Hughes Electronic Corp. In that instance, he said, a merger would have reduced the competitors in the satellite television market in many areas from three to two.

"The Department recognized that reducing competition from three to two was anticompetitive and opposed the transaction, which was eventually abandoned," he said.

He also draws comparisons with the attempted tie-up between Echostar and DirectTV Group Inc. , in which the FCC reaffirmed its rule of not granting a single commercial license for satellite TV. That deal also wasn't allowed.

"I would submit that a thorough study of consumer demands and preferences would show that terrestrial radio stations should not be considered part of the satellite radio market for the purposes of the review of the current merger...," said the letter.

The companies' main argument for the deal being approved is that, while they are the only two satellite radio companies, they are in fact competing against the range of audio media including traditional radio, HD radio, Internet-based radio and applications like Apple Inc.'s (AAPL) iPod.

The letter was forwarded by the NAB to lawmakers on the House and Senate Judiciary Committees.

While neither panel has authority to block the deal, the House Judiciary Committee's newly formed Antitrust Task Force has already held a hearing into the matter.

Next week it is the turn of the House Commerce Committee's telecommunications subcommittee, headed by Massachusetts Democratic Rep. Edward Markey.

The merger must receive approval of both the Department of Justice's antitrust unit and the Federal Communications Commission. The latter would have to change its rules to allow one company to hold the only satellite radio license.

No one from either Sirius or XM was immediately available to comment for this report.

XM: Ashcroft Offered Services To XM Before Being Hired By NAB (DOW)

Dow Jones Newswire, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- Former Attorney General John Ashcroft, who sent a letter this week to his successor Alberto Gonzales blasting the proposed merger of Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. (SIRI) and XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. (XMSR), approached XM in the days after the merger was announced offering the firm's consulting services, a spokesman for XM said Saturday.

The spokesman said XM declined Ashcroft's offer to work as a lobbyist for the company.

Ashcroft was subsequently hired by the National Association of Broadcasters, which is fiercely opposed to the merger. On its behalf he conducted a review of the effects on competition if the two satellite radio companies were allowed to merge.

In a letter sent to Gonzales Feb. 27, Ashcroft concluded the merger would have a significant negative impact on competition in the market and urged the current Attorney General to withhold approval for the merger.

"After the merger was announced, Mr. Ashcroft's firm contacted us about hiring him to assist us," said

Nathaniel Brown, a spokesman for XM. "We declined. Apparently the National Association of Broadcasters opted to pay him to parrot their views."

Dennis Wharton, the NAB's executive director, said Saturday, "NAB approached former Attorney General Ashcroft to review the proposed XM-Sirius merger and offer his honest opinion as an antitrust expert. We are not aware of any alleged previous discussions between Mr. Ashcroft and officials at either satellite radio company."

A revelation that Ashcroft was shopping his services to both sides of the debate over the merger may raise doubts in the eyes of some as to the rigor of his review conducted on behalf of the NAB.

The letter was forwarded by the NAB to lawmakers on the House and Senate Judiciary Committees.

In the letter, Ashcroft concludes "...the proposed Sirius/XM merger, which reduces the number of competitors from two to one, raises most serious competition concerns."

He compares the current merger to the attempted takeover by satellite provider Echostar Communications Corp. (DISH) of Hughes Electronic Corp. In that instance, he said, a merger would have reduced the competitors in the satellite television market in many areas from three to two.

"The Department recognized that reducing competition from three to two was anticompetitive and opposed the transaction, which was eventually abandoned," he said.

He also draws comparisons with the attempted tie-up between Echostar and DirectTV Group Inc. (DTV), in which the FCC reaffirmed its rule of not granting a single commercial license for satellite TV. That deal also wasn't allowed.

"I would submit that a thorough study of consumer demands and preferences would show that terrestrial radio stations should not be considered part of the satellite radio market for the purposes of the review of the current merger...," said the letter.

The companies' main argument for the deal being approved is that, while they are the only two satellite radio companies, they are in fact competing against the range of audio media including traditional radio, HD radio, Internet-based radio and applications like Apple Inc.'s (AAPL) iPod.

While neither panel has authority to block the deal, the House Judiciary Committee's newly formed Antitrust Task Force has already held a hearing into the matter.

Next week it is the turn of the House Commerce Committee's telecommunications subcommittee, headed by Massachusetts Democratic Rep.

Edward Markey.

The merger must receive approval of both the Department of Justice's antitrust unit and the Federal Communications Commission. The latter would have to change its rules to allow one company to hold the only satellite radio license.

As Attorney General, Gonzales has ultimate responsibility for the Department of Justice, although Assistant Attorney General

Thomas O. Barnett is in charge of the department's antitrust unit.

Ashcroft served as head of the Justice Department for four years until January 2005. He then set up lobby firm The Ashcroft Group LLC.

According to the Web site opensecrets.com, the firm had revenue of $2.34 million in 2006. The NAB isn't listed as a client of the firm last year.

Clients of the firm included Ebay Inc. (EBAY), which paid $60,000 and Oracle Corp. (ORCL), which paid $480,000 to the firm for its services.

The NAB, which represents traditional radio broadcasters, has been a virulent critic of the $13 billion merger since it was announced last week.

No one from the Ashcroft Group was immediately available to comment for this article.

U.S. And E.U. Near Air Travel Pact (AP)

By Aoife White, Ap Business Writer

AP, March 3, 2007

EU and U.S. negotiators made "decisive progress" in talks to lift restrictions on what trans-Atlantic routes airlines can offer, the European Union said Friday, a move that could mean lower prices for air travelers.

The pact will allow European airlines to fly from anywhere in the EU to any point in the U.S. without strict rules that dictate ticket prices.

The EU said this would bring economic benefits of up to euro12 billion (US$15.8 billion) in five years and create as many as 80,000 jobs in Europe and the United States.

Air travel in Europe and the United States accounts for 60 percent of global air traffic, and an ambitious EU-U.S. open skies deal could allow more airlines to fly the lucrative trans-Atlantic routes, possibly offering cheaper tickets.

Within five years, the deal could put an extra 26 million people on trans-Atlantic flights, the EU said. Just under 50 million travelers now make that trip every year.

But the deal may also mean the EU would be allowed to restrict U.S. investments in European airlines — a tit-for-tat move that follows the U.S. administration's failure to lift a 25-percent ceiling on foreign ownership of U.S. carriers. Dropping the restriction has been among the EU's key demands.

The EU's executive arm said EU investors' rights to own stakes in U.S. airlines were negotiated — but did not give details.

EU airlines would have some access rights to the "Fly America" program that requires U.S. government agencies use American airlines to fly passengers or freight, according to the EU.

The pact also would create antitrust immunity to help airlines develop alliances.

American and European negotiators as part of the pact would work together on climate change rules, the European Commission said, though no details were released. U.S. officials have threatened to sue the EU over rules that apply to all airlines — including non-EU carriers — to trade carbon emissions permits in an effort to cut greenhouse gas releases.

EU Transport Commissioner Jacques Barrot said he would ask EU nations to back the deal when EU transport ministers meet March 22.

The U.S. Congress must also support it before the new rules would kick in beginning Oct. 28.

"We have an opportunity to unlock major benefits on both sides of the Atlantic," Barrot said in a statement.

The pact picks up on a stalled agreement that will allow European airlines to fly from anywhere in the EU to any point in the U.S.

Right now, for example, a French airline can only fly to the U.S. from a French airport.

EU airlines will also be able to operate all-cargo flights starting outside the EU, stopping in the U.S. and going on to another country. At the moment any cargo flights making a U.S. stop must start their trip in Europe. The EU said this was "highly significant" because both regions account for 70 percent of the global fleet.

This was negotiated in November 2005 but a deal fell apart as the EU demanded the U.S. drop protectionist laws that restrict foreign ownership or control of U.S. airlines — requirements that go back to security concerns allowing a government to requisition aircraft in wartime.

U.S. Transportation Secretary Mary E. Peters said in December that her department bowed to job and security fears when it withdrew a proposal to lift the 25 percent limit on foreign ownership of U.S. carriers.

U.S. officials said they were willing to seek a less ambitious deal and would try to find other ways to open the U.S. aviation sector to foreigners.

The Association of European Airlines welcomed the deal but said it needed to read the small print.

"Some fairly fundamental issues needed to be resolved," said AEA Secretary General Ulrich Schulte-Strathaus, citing the "inequality of opportunities" for European airlines to invest in U.S. airlines.

"If the benefits can be confirmed ... today's agreement will be seen as a historic step in redefining international relations in air transport," Schulte-Strathaus said.

Scepticism Greets Draft Open Skies Agreement (FT)

By Andrew Bounds In Brussels

Financial Times, March 3, 2007

US and European Union negotiators concluded a fresh draft deal to deregulate the transatlantic airline market yesterday, amid scepticism over whether it would be approved.

The European Commission said it would submit the agreement to EU governments this month after "a breakthrough" in meetings in Brussels. However, there is expected to be fierce debate when transport ministers meet on March 22, as the US has given little ground on loosening restrictions on foreign ownership of its airlines.

The quest for an "open skies" agreement has eluded the two sides since talks were launched four years ago. A 2005 deal foundered in December because of congressional opposition to easing the regulations limiting foreign investment in US airlines, which the EU made a condition of the deal. Foreign companies and individuals can own only 25 per cent of voting stock and a further 24.9 per cent of non-voting equity.

The draft agreement merely sets out in writing existing US policy, critics say. In 2004 the Commission sent a similar deal for EU approval, only to see resistance from the UK and Germany sink it.

The UK has in the past been determined to resist the loosening of restrictions on the lucrative market between London's Heathrow airport and the US, without reciprocal US concessions. Only British Airways, Virgin Atlantic, United Airlines and American Airlines have the right to direct fights on these routes.

The UK has 40 per cent of the transatlantic market. Its transport department refused to comment yesterday.

Jacques Barrot, EU transport commissioner, said the deal was worth it. "In economic terms, this unprecedented agreement would represent a step change - it could be worth up to €12bn in economic benefits and up to 80,000 new jobs [and] . . . could be a centrepiece for a reinvigorated transatlantic relationship."

The US has offered EUairlines the ability to fly between the US and non-EU European countries, such as Norway, which have an open skies agreement with it. They could also operate cargo flights between the US and third countries, if these countries allowed it.

The EU has also won the right to restrict US investment in its airlines, and to carry passengers financed by the federal government under the "Fly America" programme, although not on routes between big cities.

The Association of European Airlines, which represents scheduled carriers, gave cautious backing to the deal. "Our initial reaction is that there seems to be a substantially improved balance in the wording of the agreement," said Ulrich Schulte-Strathaus, secretary-general.

The need for an agreement is pressing, since the European Court of Justice has ruled that the network of bilateral deals is illegal. If the talks failed, airline alliances would lose their protection under antitrust law.

New Emissions Curbs For Diesel Trains, Ships (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

The Environmental Protection Agency issued stringent new rules yesterday curbing harmful emissions from diesel locomotive and marine engines.

Over the next quarter-century the regulations -- which cover 40,000 marine vessels and nearly 21,000 diesel locomotives -- will cut these engines' annual emissions of nitrogen oxide, a key ingredient in smog, by 80 percent and fine particulate matter, or soot, by 90 percent.

EPA officials estimated that by 2030 the health benefits associated with the new standards will outweigh the costs by 20 to 1, preventing 1,500 premature deaths and 1,100 hospitalizations a year.

"By tackling the greatest remaining source of diesel emissions, we're keeping our nation's clean-air progress moving full steam ahead," EPA Administrator Stephen L. Johnson told reporters in a telephone news conference yesterday. "Over the last century, diesels have been America's economic workhorse, and through this rule, an economic workhorse is also becoming an environmental workhorse."

DOJ_NMG_0140323

The federal government has already tightened diesel emissions from cars, sport-utility vehicles, trucks and non-road vehicles, prompting Johnson to call yesterday's rule "the last piece of this clean-diesel puzzle." Last year, the EPA revised its estimates for diesel train emissions and concluded that, without further action, these locomotives would generate nearly twice as much pollution in 2030 as administration officials previously projected.

Environmentalists praised the administration's decision. William Becker, executive director of the National Association of Clean Air Agencies, said diesel locomotive emissions rank as the largest remaining uncontrolled source of pollution in the Washington area.

"Every major metropolitan area in the country will benefit from the huge emissions reductions expected from this long-awaited rule. We estimate the emissions benefits will be equivalent to taking three-quarters of a million diesel trucks off the road each year," Becker said. "EPA deserves a 'thumbs-up' for this proposal."

Richard Kassel, a senior attorney who works on fuel and vehicle issues for the Natural Resources Defense Council, an advocacy group, said the engines covered by the regulations emit pollution equivalent to 150 coal-fired power plants. The new rules will cover all diesel trains in the United States, as well as ferries, tugboats and yachts, but not the foreign ships that make up the majority of ships in U.S. ports.

"Living near a rail yard or port is like living near the dirtiest of coal-fired power plants," Kassel said.

Initially, the regulations call for manufacturers to meet stricter standards on existing engines when overhauling them. By 2009 they must modify newly built diesel train and ship engine and combustion systems. By 2014 marine engine manufacturers must treat their exhaust through technological improvements, and a year later makers of locomotive engines must do the same.

General Electric, the country's largest locomotive engine manufacturer, had opposed the new rules on the grounds that they were not technically feasible. A GE spokesman did not return calls seeking comment.

Johnson said, however, that he was confident the nation's train and ship manufacturers could meet the stricter standards over time. "Through the ingenuity of the domestic manufacturers, we believe they can achieve these aggressive but practical standards," he said.

Environmental Agency Proposes Strict Standard For Some Diesel Engines (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 2 — The Environmental Protection Agency, which for a decade has been ratcheting up its controls on off-road diesel equipment, diesel trucks and diesel fuel, proposed stringent new pollution standards Friday on diesel locomotives and marine vessels operating in the United States.

The new controls would gradually cut engine emissions of two air pollutants, with the cuts accelerating sharply by 2030. By then, the agency estimates, most existing engines would have been retooled or replaced.

An engine's emissions of nitrogen oxides, which are a precursor to things like acid rain and ozone, would be reduced by 80 percent; the direct emission of lethal fine soot would be reduced by 90 percent in 2030, after the new controls were phased in, the agency said.

But because of the longevity of older, dirtier engines, and the expected growth of the fleet, the overall reduction in marine and railroad emissions of both pollutants would really be closer to 45 percent by 2030, according to the agency's supporting documents.

The proposal was announced by Bush administration officials at the Port of Elizabeth in New Jersey, against a backdrop of ships and trains. The E.P.A. administrator, Stephen L. Johnson, called it "the last piece of the clean diesel puzzle," following earlier curbs.

The agency's analysis said that by 2030, if the rule was made final in its present form, it would cost the marine and railroad industries $600 million, prevent 1,500 premature deaths and achieve overall health benefits worth $12 billion annually.

While other sources are responsible for more fine soot, the most lethal air pollutant regulated by the agency, few do as much as locomotives to deposit the pollutant into the air and lungs of the people who ride trains or live or work near rail lines.

In a conference call after the announcement, Mr. Johnson said environmentalists, engine manufacturers like General Electric and railroads like CSX had widely differing opinions about the standard.

"Some were concerned about technology not being available in the time frames we were talking about," Mr. Johnson said. "Others believed it would be."

The new standards are designed to force the development of new control technologies. A decision on the new rules is expected by year's end.

Environmental groups were enthusiastic about the new proposals; railroad industry officials were more subdued, indicating more lobbying would come from both sides.

DOJ_NMG_0140324

Frank O'Donnell, president of Clean Air Watch, said the proposed rules were "the final frontier when it comes to the really big sources of pollution." In a later e-mail message, he said that without the rules, "diesel trains collectively will emit almost double the pollution by 2030 than all the trucks on the road combined."

Tom White, of the Association of American Railroads, said in an interview, "We're very supportive of improving efficiency and reducing the pollution from our locomotives." But, Mr. White said, "your biggest concerns always are that you have a timetable that you can meet and also that what is put out there is something doable; the technology to do this still does not exist."

Patrick Jarvis, a spokesman for the transportation division at General Electric, echoed some of Mr. White's concerns, adding, "We want to make sure the technology we bring to market is reliable and can sustain itself for the useful life of the locomotive."

The controls on marine vessels, many of which use a heavy, pollution-rich oil that packs the most power per pound, address vessels like Great Lakes freighters, ferries, fishing boats and tugboats, as well as smaller recreational boat engines.

As with locomotives, the proposed rules would take effect in stages. The first phase would affect the smallest marine diesel engines beginning in 2009; most other engines would come under the new mandate in 2012. The proposal sets long-term standards for new large marine diesel engines beginning in 2014.

The E.P.A. does not have direct authority to regulate the oceangoing vessels that burn the dirtiest fuel.

U.S. Predicting Steady Increase For Emissions (NYT)

By Andrew C. Revkin

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

The Bush administration estimates that emissions by the United States of gases that contribute to global warming will grow nearly as fast through the next decade as they did the previous decade, according to a long-delayed report being completed for the United Nations.

The document, the United States Climate Action Report, emphasizes that the projections show progress toward a goal Mr. Bush laid out in a 2002 speech: that emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases grow at a slower rate than the economy. Since that speech, he has repeated his commitment to lessening "greenhouse gas intensity" without imposing formal limits on the gases.

Kristen A. Hellmer, a spokeswoman for the White House on environmental matters, said on Friday, "The Climate Action Report will show that the president's portfolio of actions addressing climate change and his unparalleled financial commitments are working."

But when shown the report, an assortment of experts on climate trends and policy described the projected emissions as unacceptable given the rising evidence of risks from unabated global warming.

"As governor of Texas and as a candidate, the president supported mandatory limits on carbon dioxide emissions," said David W. Conover, who directed the administration's Climate Change Technology Program until February 2006 and is now counsel to the National Commission on Energy Policy, a nonpartisan research group that supports limits on gases. "When he announced his voluntary greenhouse-gas intensity reduction goal in 2002, he said it would be re-evaluated in light of scientific developments. The science now clearly calls for a mandatory program that establishes a price for greenhouse-gas emissions."

According to the new report, the administration's climate policy will result in emissions growing 11 percent in 2012 from 2002. In the previous decade, emissions grew at a rate of 11.6 percent, according to the Environmental Protection Agency.

The report also contains sections describing growing risks to water supplies, coasts and ecosystems around the United States from the anticipated temperature and precipitation changes driven by the atmospheric buildup of carbon dioxide and other heat-trapping greenhouse gases.

Drafts of the report were provided to The New York Times by a government employee at the request of a reporter. The employee did not say why this was done, but other officials involved with producing it said they have been frustrated with the slow pace of its preparation. It was due more than one year ago.

The report arrives at a moment when advocates of controls are winning new support in statehouses and Congress, not to mention Hollywood, where former Vice President Al Gore's cautionary documentary on the subject, "An Inconvenient Truth," just won an Academy Award. Five western governors have just announced plans to create a program to cap and then trade carbon-dioxide emissions. And on Capitol Hill, half a dozen bills have been introduced to curb emissions, with more expected.

Ms. Hellmer defended Mr. Bush's climate policy, saying the president was committed to actions, like moderating gasoline use and researching alternative energy, that limited climate risks while also increasing the country's energy and national security. She said Mr. Bush remained satisfied with voluntary measures to slow emissions.

Myron Ebell, who directs climate and energy policy for the Competitive Enterprise Institute, a group aligned with industries fighting curbs on greenhouse gases, said Mr. Bush was right to acknowledge the inevitability of growing emissions in a country with a growing population and economy. Mr. Ebell added that the United States was doing better at slowing emissions than many countries that had joined the Kyoto Protocol, the first binding international treaty limiting such gases.

"Since 1990, for every 1 percent increase in emissions the economy has grown about 3 percent," Mr. Ebell said. "That's good, and it's better than the European Union's performance."

Several environmental campaigners said there was no real distinction between Mr. Bush's target and "business as usual," adding that such mild steps were unacceptable given recent findings by the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change and other research groups tying recent warming more firmly than ever to smokestack and tailpipe gases.

"If you set the hurdle one inch above the ground you can't fail to clear it," said David D. Doniger, the director of climate policy for the Natural Resources Defense Council, which has long criticized the administration and sought binding cuts in greenhouse gases.

The report is the fourth in a series produced periodically by countries that are parties to the 1992 Framework Convention on Climate Change, a treaty signed by the first President Bush. It is a self-generated summary of climate-related trends and actions, including inventories of emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases, research on impacts of climate change, and policies to limit climate risks and emissions.

The last such report, completed in 2002, put the administration in something of a bind because it listed many harmful or costly projected impacts from human-caused warming. Environmental groups used those findings to press President Bush to seek mandatory caps on greenhouse gases, while foes of such restrictions criticized the findings and criticized the administration for letting them stay in the document.

While that report was approved by senior White House and State Department officials, Mr. Bush quickly distanced himself from it, saying it was "put out by the bureaucracy."

The new report has been bogged down for nearly two years. In April 2005, the State Department published a notice in the Federal Register saying it would be released for public comment that summer.

Several government officials and scientists involved with preparing or reviewing parts of the report said that the recent departures of several senior staff members running the administration's climate research program delayed its completion and no replacements have been named. The delays in finishing the report come even as Mr. Bush has elevated global warming higher on his list of concerns. This year, for the first time since he took office in 2001, he touched on "global climate change" in the State of the Union Message, calling it a "serious challenge."

The draft report contains fresh projections of significant effects of human-caused warming on the environment and resources of the United States and emphasized the need to increase the country's capacity to adapt to impending changes.

Drought, particularly, will become a persistent threat, it said: "Warmer temperatures expected with increasing concentrations of greenhouse gases are expected to exacerbate present drought risks in the United States by increasing the rate of evaporation."

Water supplies in the Northwest and Southwest are also at risk. "Much of the water used by people in the western United States comes from snow melt," the report said. "And a large fraction of the traditionally snow-covered areas of this region has experienced a decline in spring snow pack, especially since mid-century, despite increases in winter precipitation in many places." Animal and plant species face risks as climate zones shift but urbanized regions prevent ecosystems from shifting as well, according to the draft report.

"Because changes in the climate system are likely to persist into the future regardless of emissions mitigation, adaptation is an essential response for future protection of climate-sensitive ecosystems," it said.

Democrats Want Capitol Hill As A 'Green' Beacon For Planet (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, March 3, 2007

Democratic leaders yesterday called for the "greening" of buildings on Capitol Hill, saying politicians have the responsibility to preserve the planet.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi, who has led a charge to fight global warming, and other top Democrats wrote a letter to the chief administrative officer of the House asking him to embark on a "Green the Capitol" initiative.

"The Capitol complex should lead the nation in preserving our planet for future generations," the Democrats wrote to Daniel P. Beard yesterday.

The letter was signed by Mrs. Pelosi, Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland and Juanita Millender-McDonald of California, the chairman of the House Administration Committee.

The Democrats asked Mr. Beard to provide them with a preliminary report by April 30 and a final report by June 30 on ways to conserve energy inside the Capitol and its adjoining congressional offices.

DOJ_NMG_0140326

"We are writing to direct you to undertake a critical initiative to address energy conservation, efficiency and cost savings," they wrote. "The House of Representatives should provide leadership to the nation in providing an environmentally responsible and healthy working environment for our employees."

They suggested Mr. Beard coordinate with his Senate counterparts, the Capitol Police and the Architect of the Capitol Office. Among their requests was to ensure the House has the most up-to-date standards for green building efforts.

It is the latest move highlighting Democrats' plans to take action on climate change. Mrs. Pelosi has created a special panel to study global warming and took the rare step of testifying before the Science and Technology Committee on the topic last month.

On the Senate side, there is bipartisan consensus that legislation is necessary to curb carbon emissions, though a method for achieving drastic reduction is far from agreed upon.

Former Vice President Al Gore, whose film on global warming, "An Inconvenient Truth," won an Oscar, plans to testify on Capitol Hill this month and deliver hundreds of thousands of postcards he has collected from citizens demanding a climate-change bill.

Businesses Rethink Carbon Curbs (WSJ)

By Nick Timiraos

The Wall Street Journal, March 3, 2007

A growing number of businesses are calling for federal caps on greenhouse-gases, which could spur Congress to action.

For years, most of the business community has strongly opposed controls on carbon dioxide emissions, which contribute to global warming. Reducing emissions would inevitably place new costs on businesses, particularly utilities.

But in the past few weeks, three industry trade groups that have long fought such regulation, the Edison Electric Institute, the American Gas Association and the Electric Power Supply Association, dropped their opposition to a cap. That coincided with calls for an emissions cap by the two private-equity firms bidding for Texas utility TXU Corp. Earlier this year, 10 corporations, including Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and General Electric Co., announced their support for mandatory curbs on greenhouse gases.

The shift underscores a growing belief that Congress eventually will pass mandatory emissions caps. Many business leaders have concluded it would be better for it to happen now rather than later, eliminating the current uncertainty. Moreover, they fear absent federal government action they'll be left to deal with a patchwork of state regulations. And they believe that by endorsing emissions caps, they'll be given a seat at the table in the negotiations over how such a cap would work.

Here's a closer look at what a national emissions "cap-and-trade" system would look like:

How would a carbon "cap-and-trade" system work? Companies would be required to have a permit for each ton of carbon that they produce. The government would limit the amount of greenhouse-gas emissions that companies could produce and create a market for companies to buy and sell permits to produce emissions beyond their caps. Firms that went beyond the mandated limit would have to reduce their emissions or buy permits from companies that had gone under their limits. The aim is to create a marketplace that would provide incentives for companies to invest in new, environmentally friendly technologies.

The 1990 Clean Air Act established a similar cap-and-trade system to combat acid rain, and it has been widely viewed as a success.

What types of proposals will Congress consider? At least five bills propose tackling global warming with some type of cap-and-trade market. The most ambitious bill would reduce emissions to 80% below their 1990 levels by 2050. Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.) and Sen. Joseph Lieberman (I., Conn.) have proposed a target of 60% below those levels by 2050. The bill has been voted down twice before.

Sen. Jeff Bingaman (D., N.M.) offers a more modest approach, stabilizing emissions at their 2013 level by 2020 and including a "safety valve" that would force the government to issue more permits if the price of those permits rose too sharply.

Who wins and loses in a carbon market? Since the devil is in the details, it's still unclear who will pay how much. Pollution permits could be sold in an auction market or given away to companies. Utilities in the Southeast and Midwest that rely on coal-fired power plants are lobbying for a higher cap or more permits to offset what would otherwise create steep price increases because coal releases more carbon emissions than any other fuel. Conversely, West Coast and Northeast states that rely on cleaner fuels could be more insulated from higher energy costs.

Either way, consumers can expect higher energy prices because most emissions caps target electricity producers, who will pass those costs on to customers. A study by the U.S. Energy Information Administration estimates that under the Bingaman bill, electricity prices could rise 3.5% by 2020. Resources for the Future, an environmental group, predicts that under the McCain measure electricity prices could rise as much as 35% by 2025.

DOJ_NMG_0140327

Companies that produce low-carbon fuels or energy-efficiency products could benefit from a carbon cap. But the steel industry, which produces large amounts of carbon dioxide, warns that a cap would raise costs and hurt their ability to compete with overseas rivals that aren't subject to pollution penalties.

Cap And Charade (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 3, 2007

But this is not, as Lenin once said, a case of capitalists selling the rope to hang themselves with. In most cases, it is good old-fashioned rent-seeking with a climate-change patina.

Start with the name. Most of those pushing this idea want you to think about it as cap-and-trade, with emphasis on the trading part. Senator Barbara Boxer touts all the jobs that would be created for people trying to game the system -- er, save the planet. And her colleague Jeff Bingaman calls cap-and-trade "market based," because, you know, people would trade stuff.

But for that to happen, the government would first have to put a cap on CO2 emissions, either for certain industries or even the economy as a whole. At the same time, it would allocate quotas for CO2 emissions, either based on current emissions, or on energy output, or some other standard. If a company then "over-complied," which means it produced less carbon dioxide than it was allowed to under the rules, it could sell the excess allowance to someone else. That someone else would buy the right to produce CO2 if doing so cost less than actually reducing emissions.

In this way, emissions would be reduced in an relatively efficient way: Those for whom reductions were cheap or easy would reduce, and if they reduced enough, they could sell their excess allowance to someone for whom the reductions were harder or more expensive. This kind of trading works, and we've argued in these columns that cap-and-trade beats the pants off just plain capping by lowering the overall economic burden of a cap.

The difficulties don't lie with the trading, but with the cap, which is where the companies lobbying for restrictions come in. James Rogers, CEO of Duke Energy, put it plainly earlier this year: "If you're not at the table when these negotiations are going on, you're going to be on the menu." Translation: If a cap is coming, better to design it in a way that you profit from it, instead of being killed by it.

Which is why the emphasis really should be cap-and-trade. It's all about the cap, because without it there's no trading. We don't buy our daily ration of oxygen because it's in abundant supply. Same with carbon dioxide -- there's no constraint on your ability to produce CO2 until the government creates one. When it does, it creates an artificial scarcity. What Duke, Entergy, TXU, BP, Dupont and all the rest want is to make sure that when the right to produce CO2 becomes limited, they're the ones that end up owning the allowances. Because that would mean they could sell them, and make money off something that previously wasn't worth a dime.

Thus, Entergy, a utility that relies heavily on natural gas and nuclear power and thus produces relatively less CO2, would love a cap that distributes the allowances based on how much electricity you churn out, rather than on how much CO2 you produce. Entergy's "carbon footprint" is small compared to some other utilities, so an electrical-output-based cap would be windfall city. Dupont, meanwhile, wants credit for reductions already made because it sees instant profit in costs already paid. It also wants a cap to cover as many industries as possible so it can make money selling emissions-reduction products.

We don't begrudge anyone the opportunity to make a buck. But there's a difference between making money by producing things people want and making money by gaming the regulatory process. There's no market here unless the government creates one, and who has the profit opportunity depends entirely on who the government picks as the winners and the losers in designing this market in the first place. So it's no wonder that almost any business that has ever put an ounce of CO2 into the atmosphere is rushing to show its cap-and-trade bona fides. * * *

By far the biggest question, however, is where the cap is set. The trading of emissions credits does nothing to lower the quantity of emissions -- it merely shifts around the right to emit. It's the cap that sets the amount of CO2 put into the air. And as Europe has learned, that figure is a political football unto itself. When the EU started emissions trading in 2005, the price of a ton of CO2 quickly tripled before cratering when participants realized that the cap hadn't been set low enough to create a genuine shortage.

The European Commission is now in the process of reviewing each country's plans for allocating emissions allowances for 2008, but in the first round it found that all but one national plan had set the cap too high to comply with Kyoto's 2008-2012 limits. Of course, even a stringent cap means nothing if countries don't comply, and so far Europe's commitment to Kyoto has been more hot air than action.

The reason is hardly a secret, though you rarely see climate-change activists admitting it. Despite all the talk of "alternative" fuels, some 80% of the energy that the world produces today comes from carbon-based fuels. Barring cold fusion or some other miracle technology, that ratio won't change much for decades to come. That means, in turn, that any stringent CO2 cap would inevitably have serious economic costs. We doubt voters will elect politicians who tell them the cost of reducing their "carbon footprint" is more blackouts or a lower standard of living. And in any case China is putting up a new coal-fired plant every week, raising emissions that will overwhelm whatever reductions cap-and-trade would yield in the U.S.

The emerging alliance of business and environmental special interests may well prove powerful enough to give us cap-and-trade in CO2. It would make Hollywood elites feel virtuous, and it would make money for some very large corporations. But don't believe for a minute that this charade would do much about global warming.

A Pattern Of Normal Drought (NYT)

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

It has taken humans awhile to realize that our idea of normal changes as our understanding of history deepens. Climate is a case in point. Over the past couple of decades, climatology has become a deeply historical science. In the American Southwest, climatologists have found a surprisingly detailed record of weather patterns — especially patterns of moisture — in tree rings that show that prolonged periods of drought there are normal.

Those findings immediately raise questions about how water is being used in the Southwest, and particularly about the Colorado River Compact, the 1922 legal agreement that governs water distribution in the vast Colorado River basin. The agreement was based on at most two decades of measuring river flows. But the testimony of tree rings shows that those years were much wetter than the long-term historical average.

This evidence — and its implications — have been gathered in a report released last month by a committee of the National Research Council. Its conclusions are stark. The Colorado River basin itself — some 240,000 square miles across the West and Southwest — has experienced staggering population growth. Precipitation patterns are changing, in part because of global warming, and the spring runoff from snowpack in the mountains takes place earlier than it used to, which means that less water is stored for later in the season. Nearly every drop of water that flows downstream is already allocated, which means that the only new water source for residential and commercial growth is water that has been allocated to agriculture.

So what is normal? Vast quantities of water devoted to subsidized agriculture? Vast quantities of water devoted to the growth of cities and suburbs that are, in the long historical view, unsustainable?

The immediate question this report raises is whether the forces that shape development from Wyoming to California will allow themselves to be guided by the scientific evidence and a starkly different vision than the one that was visible in 1922. Science is capable of changing its mind as the evidence it discovers becomes more precise and more conclusive. The fundamental challenge for us all is to change the way we live as well.

Divine Strake's Legal Issues Keep Controversy Alive (LVRJ)

By Keith Rogers, REVIEW-JOURNAL

Las Vegas Review-Journal, March 3, 2007

U.S. judge schedules status report

Plans for the massive non-nuclear Divine Strake blast at the Nevada Test Site are dead but legal issues surrounding the controversial bunker-buster experiment were resurrected Friday.

Eight days after a Pentagon agency canceled its plans for the Divine Strake detonation, Senior U.S. District Judge Lloyd George scheduled a status report for April 30.

George anticipates that motions will be filed by U.S. attorneys who want to dismiss a case by downwinders and some members of the Winnemucca Indian Colony challenging the test.

Opponents fear that the government will conduct smaller blasts that, while not as large as Divine Strake, could still stir up potentially deadly radioactive dust that lies on the ground of the test site and could be blown to their homes.

The opponents' lawyer, Robert Hager, of Reno, wants to keep the case alive by forcing the government to formally define the smaller scale "confirmatory" experiments that a Pentagon agency has said it intends to conduct in lieu of Divine Strake's cancellation.

In his words, George decided to "keep it on the calendar so we can finally conclude this matter with satisfaction to everyone."

"You file whatever motions you choose to file," he told Hager and Justice Department attorney Caroline Blanco, who presented their respective positions in a conference call at the Lloyd George U.S. Courthouse, named after the judge.

Referring to a Feb. 22 press release from the Defense Threat Reduction Agency canceling the test amid widespread opposition from downwinders and some politicians in Nevada, Utah and Idaho, Hager said he doesn't understand what agency director James Tegnelia meant by "confirmatory experiments at a much smaller scale" will instead be conducted.

"I don't know what that means. ... To what extent smaller?" Hager asked during the conference call.

DOJ_NMG_0140329

Tegnelia apologized last year for saying the blast from Divine Strake's 700-ton slurry of ammonium nitrate and fuel oil would send a "mushroom cloud over Las Vegas."

Hager and his clients and thousands who commented on the agency's plans fear that radioactive remnants from historic nuclear weapons tests at the test site would be lofted into the atmosphere and carried off the site with fine dust particles from the above-ground explosion.

Oil Company Revives Suit On Avoidance Of Royalties (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 2 — One of the nation's biggest oil producers in the Gulf of Mexico is pressing ahead with a lawsuit that could, if successful, allow energy companies to avoid as much as $60 billion in royalties to the government over the next two decades.

Anadarko Petroleum, based in Houston, is suing the Interior Department to overturn regulations that force companies that drill in publicly owned waters to pay full royalties on oil and gas they produce during times of high energy prices.

Anadarko, which earned $4.8 billion in profit last year on sales of $10.2 billion, is arguing that Congress guaranteed oil companies a special incentive for drilling in deep water under which the companies could avoid paying the standard royalty on much of what they produced in the Gulf of Mexico. The Interior Department has adamantly argued that the incentives were never supposed to apply when oil prices climbed above about $34 a barrel.

The suit itself was filed a year ago by the Kerr-McGee Oil and Gas Corporation, which Anadarko acquired last year for $21 billion. But Anadarko put the suit on hold last year and began court-supervised mediation talks with the Interior Department.

On Thursday, a federal judge in Louisiana, Patricia Minaldi, declared that the mediation talks had failed and ordered both sides to start filing arguments in late May. The failure of the mediation poses a major problem for the Bush administration, which is already trying to prevent the loss of $10 billion in royalties as a result of a huge leasing error made during the Clinton administration.

If Anadarko is successful, the government would lose many more times that. The Government Accountability Office, the Congressional watchdog agency, estimated in January that the government would lose about $60 billion over 25 years.

The federal government leases millions of acres in the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas producers. Companies are required to pay a royalty of 12 to 16 percent of their sales from the leases, but the government also offers royalty holidays as an incentive for deepwater drilling.

The Interior Department contends that companies are not entitled to such royalty relief if oil prices climb above about $34 a barrel, as they have for the last three years.

But Anadarko, in its lawsuit, argued that Congress never authorized that kind of restriction and had "guaranteed" the incentives for any leases signed from 1996 through 2000.

"Like other companies, Kerr-McGee responded and undertook significant risks and costs associated with deepwater exploration," the company said in its lawsuit, adding that it had invested $3.5 billion to acquire, explore and develop leases in the gulf.

The revival of the lawsuit could cause political problems for the oil industry, increasing hostility among Democratic leaders already angry about high energy prices and record industry profits.

In January, House Democrats overwhelmingly passed a bill that would revoke $7.6 billion in tax breaks for oil companies and would impose a stiff additional fee on all companies that refused to renegotiate the flawed leases signed during the Clinton years.

Representative Edward J. Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts, who has criticized the Interior Department for being lax toward oil companies, accused Anadarko on Friday of intransigence and attempting a "colossal rip-off."

"This lawsuit is nothing more than a brazen attempt to fleece the American people out of billions of dollars," Mr. Markey said in a statement. "The Justice Department must put the full weight of its resources behind vigorously defending the American taxpayers."

Indeed, industry executives say that major oil companies are politically divided about the legal gauntlet thrown down by Kerr-McGee and Anadarko Petroleum.

"I think there are a lot of folks in the industry, particularly those involved in advocating the original legislation, that absolutely don't agree with Kerr-McGee," said John Northington, an industry lobbyist who worked in the Energy Department under President Clinton.

The Bush administration has repeatedly argued that Anadarko's case has no merit, but Interior officials have tried at least twice to settle the dispute without going to trial.

DOJ_NMG_0140330

The most recent effort was led by C. Stephen Allred, assistant secretary for land and minerals management.

In December, the two sides hired Benjamin A. Civiletti, a lawyer and onetime Watergate prosecutor, to mediate talks about a possible compromise.

Evangelical Angers Peers With Call For Action On Global Warming (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

Focus on the Family founder James C. Dobson and other conservative Christian leaders are calling for the National Association of Evangelicals to silence or fire an official who has urged evangelicals to take global warming seriously.

In a letter this week to the board of the NAE, which claims 30 million members, Dobson and his two dozen co-signers said the Rev. Richard Cizik, the NAE's vice president for government relations, has waged a "relentless campaign" that is "dividing and demoralizing" evangelicals.

Cizik has been a leader in efforts to broaden evangelicals' political agenda beyond abortion and same-sex marriage. He says Christians have a biblical imperative to protect the environment, which he calls "creation care."

"I speak with a voice that is authentically evangelical on all the issues, from religious freedom around the world, to compassion for the poor, ending oppression in Darfur -- and yes, creation care is one of those issues," Cizik said yesterday.

The NAE's board is scheduled to meet next week in Minnesota. Its former president, the Rev. Ted Haggard, resigned in November after a scandal involving sex and drugs.

His successor, the Rev. Leith Anderson, defended Cizik as "a great asset." He also said that the Dobson letter was released to the news media before it was received by the board. "I guess that says it all," he said.

Evangelical's Focus On Climate Draws Fire Of Christian Right (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

Leaders of several conservative Christian groups have sent a letter urging the National Association of Evangelicals to force its policy director in Washington to stop speaking out on global warming.

The conservative leaders say they are not convinced that global warming is human-induced or that human intervention can prevent it. And they accuse the director, the Rev. Richard Cizik, the association's vice president for government affairs, of diverting the evangelical movement from what they deem more important issues, like abortion and homosexuality.

The letter underlines a struggle between established conservative Christian leaders, whose priority has long been sexual morality, and challengers who are pushing to expand the evangelical movement's agenda to include issues like climate change and human rights.

"We have observed," the letter says, "that Cizik and others are using the global warming controversy to shift the emphasis away from the great moral issues of our time."

Those issues, the signers say, are a need to campaign against abortion and same-sex marriage and to promote "the teaching of sexual abstinence and morality to our children."

The letter, dated Thursday, is signed by leaders like James C. Dobson, chairman of Focus on the Family; Gary L. Bauer, once a Republican presidential candidate and now president of Coalitions for America; Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council; and Paul Weyrich, a longtime political strategist who is chairman of American Values.

They acknowledge in the letter that none of their groups belong to the National Association of Evangelicals, a broad coalition that represents 30 million Christians in hundreds of denominations, organizations and academic institutions. But, they say, if Mr. Cizik "cannot be trusted to articulate the views of American evangelicals," then he should be encouraged to resign.

Mr. Cizik (pronounced SIZE-ik) did not respond to requests for an interview yesterday, and the association's chairman, L. Roy Taylor, was unavailable. But the Rev. Leith Anderson, president of the association, said, "We're talking about somebody here who's been in Washington for 25 years, has an amazing track record and is highly respected."

"I'm behind him," said Mr. Anderson, who was named president in November after the sudden resignation of the Rev. Ted Haggard, the Colorado pastor caught up in a scandal involving a gay prostitute.

Mr. Cizik, who is well known on Capitol Hill, has long served as one of the evangelical movement's agenda-setters. He helped put foreign policy on the evangelical agenda in the late 1990s, focusing on the persecution of Christians in other countries.

He said in an interview last year that he experienced a profound "conversion" on the global warming issue in 2002 after listening to scientists at a retreat. Now an emblem for a new breed of evangelical environmentalists, he has been written about in Vanity Fair and Newsweek and has appeared in "The Great Warming," a documentary on climate change.

DOJ_NMG_0140331

Evangelicals have recently become a significant voice in the chorus on global warming. Last year more than 100 prominent pastors, theologians and college presidents signed an "Evangelical Climate Initiative" calling for action on the issue. Among the signers were several board members of the National Association of Evangelicals; Mr. Anderson, who has since been named its president; and W. Todd Bassett, who was then national commander of the Salvation Army and was appointed executive director of the association in January.

Mr. Haggard, then the president, and Mr. Cizik did not sign, after criticism from some of the same leaders who have now sent the letter about Mr. Cizik.

In interviews, some signers of this latest letter said they were wary of the global warming issue because they associated it with leftists, limits on free enterprise and population control, which they oppose.

"We're saying what is being done here," Mr. Perkins said, "is a concerted effort to shift the focus of evangelical Christians to these issues that draw warm and fuzzies from liberal crusaders."

Energy Dept.'s Missed Deadlines On Appliance Efficiency Cost Billions, Report Says (LAT)

By Robert Lee Hotz

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

The Energy Dept. was to tighten rules on appliance efficiency.

Over the last three decades, the federal government has missed legal deadlines for setting stricter efficiency standards for common appliances, resulting in billions of dollars in higher utility bills and millions more tons of the greenhouse gases that fuel global warming, congressional investigators reported.

All told, the Department of Energy has missed every one of 34 mandatory rule-making deadlines for setting minimum energy efficiency standards involving 20 products including refrigerators, dishwashers, freezers, pool heaters, furnaces and central air conditioners, analysts at the Government Accountability Office reported.

The delays ranged from a few months to 15 years, according to the GAO report made public this week. Of the 34 energy efficiency standards, 24 have yet to be set, involving 17 household and industrial product categories.

"I have never seen anything like this," said GAO analyst Karla Springer, who led the group that prepared the report. "It is nearly 30 years of not meeting a deadline. It is kind of frightening."

Congress is about to consider new measures to control the emission of heat-trapping greenhouses gases, including stricter energy efficiency standards to reduce use of carbon-rich oil, coal and natural gas.

Analysts at the Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory calculated that the missed deadlines for just four of the more popular appliances would ultimately cost consumers at least $28 billion in forgone energy savings — equivalent to the annual primary energy consumption of about 20 million households.

The delays will also result in 53 million tons of carbon dioxide emissions, about the same as 1% of total U.S. carbon dioxide emissions in 2004, the analysts reported.

"These missed deadlines have cost our nation more than we can afford," said Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee, which commissioned the audit.

Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.) called the missed deadlines the product of "a culture of incompetence and delay."

Since 1975, the Energy Department has been required to set minimum energy efficiency standards for many consumer products. The standards that have been set so far will save enough energy to operate all U.S. homes for more than two years, Energy Department officials said.

Department officials vowed this week to eliminate their backlog by 2011, though such an effort would require six times as much work with little or no increase in staff.

The GAO analysts were skeptical. The Energy Department, they said, has no way to ensure that anyone is held accountable for deadlines.

"They say they are going to do it," Springer said. "They said they were going to do it before."

L.A. To Boost Jobs For Young People As Part Of Anti-gang Effort, Mayor Says (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

His proposal would increase employment to 10,000 -- four times the number two years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0140332

After huddling with visiting U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales on efforts to keep kids out of gangs, Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa said Friday that the city would increase dramatically the number of jobs offered to young people this year, to 10,000 — four times the number provided two years ago.

The mayor announced the increase after he and Gonzales toured a silk-screening plant run by Homeboy Industries in South Los Angeles.

The nonprofit group, which received a $650,000 federal grant, hires former gang members who are trying to lead law-abiding lives.

"Young people, when they feel there are no options, when there are no job opportunities, when they don't have the skills to make it, they lose hope," Villaraigosa said. "We are both committed to the idea that in a great and beautiful country like America we can invest in young people, that we have to address the issues of prevention and intervention."

However, Gonzales' agency faced criticism from one city official Friday for delays in delivering on past promises.

The attorney general had been in Los Angeles nearly a year ago to announce a separate $2.5-million federal grant for gang intervention, suppression and prevention programs in South Los Angeles, but officials conceded recently that the money has not yet gone out to local programs.

"We have waited too long for federal dollars that were promised almost a year ago," said Councilwoman Janice Hahn, who represents the area.

"We know that money is voted for, appropriated and spent much quicker on the war on Iraq. This war on gangs is no less urgent," she said.

George Cardona of the U.S. attorney's office said federal officials had been meeting with community leaders to discuss the best way to spend the money. He added that the first installment of the funds probably will arrive before May.

Gonzales had been in Los Angeles last March to announce that the city was one of six awarded Justice Department grants, each consisting of $1 million earmarked for gang prevention, $1 million devoted to law enforcement and $500,000 to provide transitional housing and job placement help for released convicts.

Gonzales had said at the time that the money would be focused on a section of South Los Angeles that includes the Imperial Courts, Nickerson Gardens and Jordan Downs housing projects.

"I don't know the specifics," Gonzales said Friday when asked about the money. "The way these things work is that we expect the state and local communities to develop a plan, hopefully an innovative plan that is focused on the needs of the community."

The jobs discussed Friday by Villaraigosa generally are available to young people age 14 to 24, and most of them are provided during the summer, when many students are out of school, said Robert Sainz, an assistant general manager of the city Community Development Department.

Jobs are paid for with funds from the city, county and federal government, Sainz said, adding that the Los Angeles Area Chamber of Commerce has members who also provide some jobs.

The city provided 2,500 jobs to young people in fiscal 2005-06. After Villaraigosa took office in the summer of 2005, he won council approval to increase the number to 7,500 for the current fiscal year, which ends June 30. The budget he will propose next month for the coming fiscal year will call for 10,000 such jobs.

Better opportunity for jobs is a key component of Villaraigosa's campaign to reduce gang violence in the city, which increased 15.7% last year.

Gonzales said he was impressed by the work of the nonprofit Homeboy Industries, which has worked with former members of 600 gangs in Los Angeles County, providing help in removing tattoos, counseling and offering jobs in the five businesses it operates.

The attorney general said part of his job is to prosecute criminals, "but I'm equally concerned with making sure we are taking steps as the government … to provide educational campaigns, to provide job opportunities, to prevent these kids from joining gangs in the first place."

The mayor said he was working on a strategy for expanding gang prevention and intervention programs, adding that he discussed the need for more federal assistance with Gonzales.

"We did have a specific conversation about funding, a continued partnership with the federal government," Villaraigosa said, declining to reveal details of his request. "Let me just say I'm walking away with a good feeling about continuing that relationship."

Reminded by the mayor that the city is the "epicenter" for gang activity in the nation, Gonzales said he could not commit to any specific increase in federal funding.

"Los Angeles is in a unique situation, and we are going to look very, very hard at what additional resources we can make available," Gonzales said.

Nobles And Knaves (WT)

The Washington Times, March 3, 2007

Noble: The Drug Enforcement Agency, for busting a major Mexican drug-trafficking ring.

DEA agents arrested 66 persons on Wednesday, bringing the total number for their 20-month investigation of the Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum (also known as Victor Emilio Cazares-Salazar) drug-trafficking empire to 400. Agents seized more than 18 tons of marijuana, cocaine, methamphetamine and heroin, along with $45.2 million and various weapons and vehicles, according to the DEA Web site.

The Mexico-based group would smuggle the narcotics from Colombia and Venezuela through Mexico, then into the United States via points along the Southwest border. They even "built a bridge made of sandbags across the Colorado river near Yuma, Az., which allowed them to simply drive across the waterway," ABC News reported. Once in the United States, the drugs would be distributed to U.S. cells scattered across the country.

The investigation, known as "Operation Imperial Emperor," was led by the DEA but included the FBI, ICE and the IRS, among others. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has praised the officers and agents for working together "against a common foe." DEA Administrator Karen P. Tandy said Wednesday that "we ripped out this empire's U.S. infrastructure from its commanders and transportation coordinators to its local distribution cells across the country ... and tossed it in the dustbin of history."

For keeping 18 tons of illegal drugs out of the United States, the DEA is the Noble of the week.

Knave: D.C hospitals, for forgetting about the remains of infants.

This heartbreaking story exposes the Washington Hospital Center, Howard University Hospital and several others for keeping the remains of more than 100 stillborn babies and fetuses long past the city-mandated 30-day limit.

The issue surfaced when hospital workers at WHC found the remains of 95 infants in a box in the morgue refrigerator. Health officials were notified, which led to an investigation of other city hospitals. A letter obtained by The Washington Post and written by Janis M. Orlowski, the senior vice president and chief medical officer of WHC, to D.C. Health Director Gregg Pane, said that the hospital had implemented a new policy that allowed parents additional time to make decisions about the remains of the deceased. If bodies go unclaimed or the parents request it, the hospital is responsible for arrangements. But "[b]ecause of the retirement of one key employee and the death of another, the remains were not disposed of, even as the 30-day deadline passed, the letter said." Presumably, the other hospitals' mistake was due to similar administrative incompetency.

Besides being operationally stupid, this event has undoubtedly affected many D.C. families forced to rehash a miscarriage or the birth of a stillborn baby and then to wonder if he or she was left in a morgue refrigerator for upwards of five years. This story can only be described as horrific.

For their insensitivity and massive oversight, D.C. hospitals are the Knave of the week.

Exploding Ammunition Cache Greets Firefighters Arriving At Blaze In Norco (LAT)

By Jonathan Abrams, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

Firefighters responding to a house fire in a Norco neighborhood were greeted with a dangerous surprise: gunfire. Lots of it.

Authorities on Thursday found a cache containing more than 1 million rounds of ammunition and 75 firearms, ranging from small handguns to assault rifles, throughout the burning home and in a shaft and tunnel under the garage.

The firefighters realized the stockpile was inside when rounds started going off. No injuries were reported.

"The Fire Department knew exactly what was going on when they heard the sounds," said Riverside County Sheriff's Sgt. Dennis Gutierrez.

"They knew it wasn't wood crackling over the fire."

The stockpile of ammunition is probably the largest ever confiscated in Riverside County, said Gutierrez.

A neighbor reported the fire Thursday afternoon and had dragged the homeowner, whom deputies did not identify, from the house, Gutierrez said.

The man later attempted to make his way back into the home.

Property records list the homeowner as Thomas McKiernan. Neighbors said McKiernan was a quiet man who had recently separated from his wife.

"We had to hold him down until the police got here and took him into custody," said Norco Fire Battalion Chief Ron Knueven. "He was swinging wildly and throwing some kicks."

DOJ_NMG_0140334

Fire officials from Norco and Corona, agents from the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, and Riverside County sheriff's deputies continued to inspect the house Friday. Much of the roof collapsed under the fire.

Authorities are not sure how the blaze started.

Authorities described the homeowner as a survivalist. He was taken for 72-hour psychiatric evaluation, and officials will then decide whether to press charges, Gutierrez said.

The 4-by-8-foot shaft, at least 10 feet deep, extended through the garage foundation, and a tunnel of unknown size ran east toward the house, Gutierrez said. The ammunition was stored in cardboard boxes, wooden crates, plastic bins and large cooking pots.

Gutierrez said 75 pounds of black gunpowder and two semiautomatic assault rifles were also confiscated.

Gutierrez said it was legal to own up to 1 pound of the gunpowder, but illegal to possess the assault rifles.

Authorities are checking the serial numbers of the remaining firearms.

"He could have gotten them from anywhere — a reputable gun store or a shooting range, but who knows?" said Susan Raichel, spokeswoman for the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

"This isn't a hobby he just picked up last year. He has definitely been doing whatever it is he does for a very long time."

Residents in the quiet neighborhood expressed shock at the findings. Many gathered to view the ammunition accumulated on the homeowner's driveway.

Last April, authorities seized more than 900 guns in the nearby San Bernardino County city of Upland from a man who said he was planning to overthrow Cuban President Fidel Castro.

"That was the closest we've ever seen to something like this," Gutierrez said.

"But we've never seen this much ammunition."

Burning Home Yields Weapons Cache (CCT)

By Gillian Flaccus

The Contra Costa Times, March 3, 2007

NORCO - More than a million rounds of ammunition, numerous weapons and a tunnel were found in a man's home after a fire exploded bullets and forced a neighborhood evacuation, authorities said Friday.

The homeowner was hospitalized for a 72-hour psychological evaluation after being rescued from the house by a neighbor and then struggling with authorities who prevented him from re-entering, but he was not arrested.

Gary Eppler, who lives across the street, identified the man as Thomas McKiernan, a retired machinist in his 60s who recently separated from his wife, has grown children and didn't seem unusual in the nine years he has known him.

Eppler said McKiernan had an interest in guns and has a son who is an Army sniper who went to Iraq last year and returned safely.

"I knew that he target-practiced and we'd talk about that. He'd go to a rifle range so I knew he had some ammunition," Eppler said.

McKiernan talked about reloading shell casings but said he hadn't done it in some time, Eppler said.

"I've been a psych nurse for 30 years and I didn't notice anything unusual," the neighbor said.

The day after the fire, an incongruous scene played out in the windy hilltop neighborhood of older middle-class tract homes set against a backdrop of the snow-capped San Bernardino Mountains -- part of a quiet semirural community that bills itself as "Horsetown USA."

Riverside County sheriff's deputies and federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives agents carried charred boxes and pieces of furniture out of the house, stacked numerous boxes of ammunition in the driveway and examined seized rifles.

Two weapons were assault rifles that were illegal, and the man had no permit for 75 pounds of black gunpowder that was found, said sheriff's deputy Juan Zamora.

The tunnel, stretching from an entry in the garage 8 to 10 feet into the backyard, yielded three 25-gallon containers of fluid that was being analyzed by hazardous material experts, said Norco fire Battalion Chief Ron Knueven.

The tunnel was 5 feet wide and tall enough to allow someone to walk upright with room to spare, Zamora said.

Eppler said he was about to go on a bicycle ride Thursday afternoon when he noticed smoke coming from McKiernan's house. He said he alerted his wife, Linda, to call 911 and raced to his neighbor's home.

Inside, Eppler said, he found McKiernan on a couch.

"I looked and saw he was passed out on the couch and I woke him up and I had to help him up because he was staggering a little," Eppler said.

Eppler said it was smoky in the house but he didn't know whether McKiernan had been affected by it.

McKiernan then ran to the back of the house, grabbed a hose and tried to pour water on his roof, Eppler said.

Eppler said that when firefighters arrived, he persuaded McKiernan to come to the front of the house, but the man didn't think they were doing a good enough job because they weren't hosing down the roof, and he tried to re-enter the home. After McKiernan was restrained and put in a police car, ammunition began exploding, Eppler said.

The explosions forced evacuation of the area and kept firefighters at a distance. The blaze caused the roof to collapse before the fire was contained.

"It sounded like firecrackers, they were going off quite a bit," said neighbor Frank Jackson, who rushed home when he heard about the fire.

When he got there, he said firefighters were swarming over the burning house but the explosions were so intense that firefighters on the roof had to abandon it.

"The shells were going off and you had to back off," he said.

Authorities found a machine in the garage that was used to load the gunpowder into empty casings. The practice known as "reloading" is common and not illegal, ATF spokeswoman Susan Raichel said.

In 2003, McKiernan was quoted in a Riverside newspaper story about a fundraiser to build a military memorial in the city of Corona. McKiernan spoke to the Press-Enterprise about his brother Tim's 1968 death in the crash of a helicopter he was piloting in Vietnam, describing a heroic effort to avoid a school.

In 2002, he was in a newspaper photograph showing him hosing down his roof as a brush fire burned in the nearby Santa Ana River bottom.

1 Million Rounds Of Ammo, Tunnel Found After Fire At Southern California House (AP)

AP, March 3, 2007

NORCO, Calif. — More than 1 million rounds of ammunition, a cache of weapons and a tunnel were found at a man's home after an explosive fire that forced a neighborhood evacuation, authorities said Friday.

Crews worked to fortify the tunnel, which measured 5 feet wide by 8 feet long, to ensure it was safe. It appeared to be at least 10 feet deep and led into a back yard, authorities said.

The fire Thursday afternoon at the home in Norco, about 45 miles east of Los Angeles, caused some of the ammunition to explode.

The man tried to run back into the house after firefighters arrived and had to be restrained by sheriff's deputies, Riverside County sheriff's Deputy Juan Zamora said.

After the blaze was extinguished, crews discovered metal and wooden boxes of ammunition for shotguns, small handguns and assault rifles.

On Friday, sheriff's deputies and agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives combed the house for evidence.

Dozens of metal and cardboard boxes filled with ammunition for shotguns, small handguns and assault rifles sat in a driveway. Two of the assault rifles were illegal, Zamora said.

The man had no permit for 75 pounds of black gunpowder that was also recovered, Zamora said.

No arrests had been made. The man, whose identity was not released, was taken to a hospital where he will receive a psychological evaluation, Zamora said.

Last April, authorities said they found more than 1,300 weapons and 89,000 rounds of ammunition in the San Bernardino County home of a man who claimed to belong to a militant group with aims to overthrow Cuban dictator Fidel Castro. Robert Ferro of Upland faces counts of unlawfully owning and failing to register guns.

500 Guns Tied To Columbus Cop (AP)

By Sharon Cohen, AP NATIONAL WRITER

AP, March 3, 2007

COLUMBUS There were 501 guns in all, the government says - revolvers and pistols, Glocks and Rugers, a few rifles, too, a giant cache of firearms suitable for sport or self-protection.

Or felonies.

Or terrorism.

Five hundred one guns, tied to one man - 35-year-old Mark Nelson, a former Columbus cop who masterminded a conspiracy that flooded the streets with weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0140336

Nelson insists he didn't knowingly do anything wrong. But prosecutors say he enlisted his family and others (including a drug dealer) to illegally acquire 501 guns, then directly - or indirectly - sold many of them.

And soon after - within days, in a few cases - some of these guns began turning up in the wrong hands and the wrong places:

A Raven Arms .25-caliber pistol used in a Brooklyn, N.Y., shooting. A Ruger 9 mm handgun found on a man charged with crack possession in Washington, D.C. A Smith & Wesson .40-caliber pistol recovered in Youngstown, Ohio, in a car driven by a man inexplicably wearing a bulletproof vest and carrying a winter face mask - in May.

It's all part of the shadowy world of gun trafficking, where lies, stealth and cold cash make it alarmingly easy for deadly weapons to be bought and sold - and surface days, months, even years later in crimes.

This is the story of how one trafficking case unfolded and how a handful of people, bogus paperwork, the lure of a profit and the constant demand for weapons combined for a black-market scheme that could haunt investigators for decades. More than 300 guns remain missing.

"They're lost in the system," says federal prosecutor Doug Squires. "The point is we don't know where they are - and that's the real danger."

GUNS FOR TERROR?

At 5:59 a.m. on Aug. 13, 2005, a young Somali man, Mohammed Dirie, was stopped as he crossed the Peace Bridge from Buffalo, N.Y., to Fort Erie, Ontario.

Duct-taped to his thigh: a 9 mm pistol.

Agents also found a second gun on his thigh and an ammunition clip and bullets in his socks. His companion had a gun tucked in his waistband.

The two were imprisoned for illegal gun possession, but that wasn't the end of it; last summer, they were among 18 people charged in an alleged terrorist bombing plot in Canada. The two were also accused of importing weapons and ammunition.

The Taurus PT-111 pistol, authorities say, was traced back to Nelson's group.

How Dirie bought the gun is a mystery.

But one fact is not: It was purchased within five days of his arrest at the border.

HOT SELLER

When a federal judge recently sentenced Nelson to the maximum 10 years in prison, he called the former officer's behavior "a great risk to the public."

In a voice choking with emotion, Nelson, told the judge he had "high respect for the law." He portrayed himself as a man misunderstood and wronged.

Nelson claimed he was trying to sell guns as a business to supplement his police disability - he wasn't working because of back problems sustained on the job. He said he was misled by a firearms dealer who continued to sell him weapons even though the man knew it was illegal.

Nelson also said the dealer - who also pleaded guilty - told him to have others sign the legal paperwork for guns that would go to him. That's known as a "straw purchase," where an intermediary poses as the buyer for someone who can't pass the background check.

Nelson, a police officer for almost eight years, couldn't buy a gun himself because he was facing a charge in a road rage incident. So he enlisted others to claim they were the purchasers.

His wife, Phaedra, for instance, said she had bought 168 guns, his brother, Ricky, 83, according to the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. His father-in-law and two other men bought the others. All seven have pleaded guilty.

As proof he didn't hide his business, Nelson noted he bought and sold weapons to Columbus police officers, and when a customer traded in a gun and wouldn't remove the bullets, he took it to detectives for a fingerprint check. Nelson made those comments in a letter to the judge days before sentencing - written, he said, against his lawyer's advice.

But federal agents paint a far more sinister picture.

They say Nelson traveled to Minnesota and Washington, D.C., to make deals and sold guns from his car trunk, hotel rooms and gun shows, where an undercover ATF informant bought 26 weapons - even though the informant told him he had a "lot of felonies" and planned to resell them to drug dealers.

"He had no regard for who the guns were going to," says Wayne Dixie, the Columbus ATF chief. "He didn't care because it was a moneymaking scheme. Maybe there was some prestige, too. He's known as the guy to go to for guns. ... 'You need a quick firearm, you can come to me. I'm your man.'"

Agents also point out that when Nelson was arrested last summer, he seemed braced for trouble: He was wearing a bulletproof vest.

TRACKING GUNS

So far, law enforcement has traced 51 guns.

In Silver Spring, Md., a .25-caliber pistol turned up outside a high school. Witnesses said one student pointed the gun at another student's head; the incident was believed connected to the Bloods street gang.

In Minneapolis, a 9 mm pistol was discovered under a trash can by police responding to a report that some young men were pointing guns at people.

In Columbus, a 9 mm pistol was involved in the death of a man in a domestic dispute.

In Newark, N.J., a .22-caliber Derringer ended up in a very strange spot: The Essex County jail property room. A ballistics test was negative. Inmates and staff were interviewed. Cameras were checked. Nothing.

FLUID TRAFFICKING

Nelson's weapons have surfaced in six states - New York, Minnesota, North Carolina, New Jersey, Maryland and Ohio - as well as Washington, D.C., and the Canadian border.

Ohio has been known to funnel illegal guns to the East Coast, partly because of its proximity to big cities such as New York and Washington, where it's difficult to buy weapons.

But gun trafficking knows no geographic boundaries, says John Firman, director of research for the International Association of Chiefs of Police. "It's rampant. It's a national problem ... and very often it goes unrecognized," he says.

"It's also a moveable feast. Gun traffickers aren't stupid, they move on," Firman adds. "The corridors of transportation in this country are wide open. Nobody stops me at the border of Kansas and says, 'Let me look in your trunk.'"

Many Southern states - where gun laws tend to be less stringent - also have long been regarded as part of an "iron pipeline" feeding weapons to gangs and other criminals in big cities in the North.

In Alabama last year, 11 people were arrested - many in their 60s and 70s - and more than 700 guns were seized or purchased in undercover operations in flea markets and a gun show. Two others were later charged. Investigators linked hundreds of guns they previously sold to crimes, including a murder-for-hire scheme in New York and the attempted murder of a Chicago police officer.

A relatively small number of people can cause enormous damage. About 1 percent of licensed dealers account for nearly 60 percent of all crime guns sold in this country, says Joe Vince, a former ATF agent who now runs a consulting firm.

Like so many businesses, trafficking is fueled by supply and demand: The more desperate the buyer, the higher the price. A drug dealer, gang member or another criminal in a city where gun laws are strict will fork over three, four, even five times the store price for an unused weapon.

"When they get a new gun from a box, they know it hasn't been used in a crime so there's no investigative trail that can trip them up," says Patrick Berarducci, a 30-year ATF veteran who recently retired to become police chief in Boardman, Ohio. "What they're buying is not the gun. What they're buying is the anonymity that goes with it."

GUNS TIED TO CRIMES

In Newark, N.J., a 9 mm pistol was found in a car along with a dead man and about four kilos of cocaine; another was found on two teens suspected in a cocaine-related robbery.

In Brooklyn, N.Y, a 7.62 mm rifle was recovered on a man carrying 75 grams of marijuana. He was identified as a member of the Bloods street gang.

In New York City, a .38-caliber revolver turned up with cocaine, marijuana and fake IDs after police stopped a car and two men tried to flee.

In Columbus, a 9 mm pistol was found along with suspected marijuana, crack, cocaine and drug paraphernalia after police approached a car that had been reported stolen and used Mace to subdue one man who tried to run away.

GUNS ON ORDER

Nelson pleaded guilty to a single charge of falsifying paperwork, which states he had acquired more than 300 guns illegally. (Federal officials put the total count at 501; Nelson's lawyer claims they overcounted.)

The ATF has recovered more than 100 guns, mostly from his home or the undercover ATF informant, along with the 51 others found on the streets.

Nelson met with federal agents several times to track the missing guns, but it did no good, says Squires, the prosecutor.

"He kept things from us," he says. "He minimized and evaded. He didn't know his customers. He didn't know their true identities."

For example, Squires says, Nelson didn't tell them he was robbed of his guns when he met with some prospective buyers in a hotel room outside Washington, D.C.

Nelson ordered guns from Illinois, Missouri, Indiana, and Florida - sometimes on the Internet - and had them shipped to a licensed firearms dealer in Ohio, Robert Cook, who was in on the deal, making $10 for each gun, according to the ATF.

DOJ_NMG_0140338

Nelson wasn't trying to get rich, says Mark Collins, his lawyer.

"He was not trafficking drugs making $2 or $3 million," he says. He estimates Nelson probably made less than $40,000.

Squires, the prosecutor, says that while two men who were part of the scheme did receive some guns - he doesn't know how many - Nelson's family did not.

"They knew what they were doing was wrong," he says.

"But they were shocked by who the end users were and that they were the portals of crime."

Local ATF Center Brings The Gun Tracking Home (SEAPI)

By Scott Gutierrez, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, March 3, 2007

New program may help curb rising crime

When a corroded 9 mm handgun surfaced last year in a brushy West Seattle yard, police suspected it had been used nearby to kill a 14-year-old boy three years earlier.

But they needed proof.

Using the gun's serial number, they traced it through the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives to a man who had bought it from a licensed gun dealer. That man turned out to be related to Demeko B. Holland, who police already considered a main suspect.

Information from the gun trace, which helped lead to a first-degree murder charge against Holland, is collected in the ATF's database. That database, with its lists of crime guns, suspects and firearms dealers, is central to the ATF's Regional Crime Gun Center, which opened last August in Seattle.

The center is a clearinghouse for weapons that city and state police recover at crime scenes, or simply find in the streets. Its main purpose is to identify trafficking, and to determine how suspected criminals, especially felons such as Holland, get their weapons.

It's also helped identify some key trends in Washington.

One of those is that the state has become a leading source for guns being used in crimes in Western Canada, which has far more restrictive gun laws than the U.S.

"If you purchase a gun here in Washington for $100, you could sell that for $300 in Canada -- that's U.S. not Canadian (dollars)," said supervisory special ATF agent Doug Krough.

Local police hope the center also will help curb a recent rise in gun violence in the Seattle metro area.

Agents first try to trace every weapon to its manufacturer, which points them to the licensed dealer where it was sold, and the customer who bought it. Agents analyze the database for patterns, or whether one suspect, one buyer, gun dealer or geographical area is linked to a high number of crime guns, which could point them to a supply source for criminals. Leads are investigated or kicked back out to police departments.

"It sounds basic, but it's not. One gun can take us across borders, across state lines, in and out of the country. One gun from these traces could expand the globe," said Special Agent Clarence Lawrence, head of ATF's Violent Gang Task Force.

Chief Gil Kerlikowske said his department, which has an analyst to work with the center, has tracked every crime gun for the past five years. About 950 guns were confiscated by Seattle police last year, according to police records. Kerlikowske would like to see more police departments trace every gun they recover.

"Whether they're found under a bush, taken off a suspect, etc., we want to know where they're coming from, and if any dealers are supplying more guns used in crimes than others," Kerlikowske said.

Trace information can return in less than 24 hours on homicides and serious crimes, such as with the handguns used in the Jewish Federation shootings last summer.

Before regional centers became operational in Seattle and other areas, much of the analysis was done at the ATF's National Tracing Center in West Virginia, said Special Agent-in-Charge Kelvin Crenshaw, who heads the ATF Seattle division.

"Before, we had to do it from a national standpoint. But with this, the Regional Crime Gun center, we're going to be able to pick up on those trends quickly and address the problems more effectively," he said.

Recent changes in federal law, pushed by gun-rights advocates, prevent the ATF from publicly sharing specific data about crime guns used, where they were bought, or in what geographical areas.

"The problem is that the tracing center can't tell the people who live in those communities about the crime guns it's tracing," said Dennis Henigan, legal director for the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence. "It can't tell them how fast they're moving into the illegal market and ... what kind of guns are being traced. That's all information that the ATF used to disclose to the public," through annual reports.

DOJ_NMG_0140339

The law also restricts the agency from sharing its data with police outside of specific investigations, which some law enforcement sources and gun-control advocates say hinders its effectiveness. If Seattle police traced a crime gun to a person or dealer in Kent, only Seattle police would be entitled to the information. The ATF couldn't inform Kent police, Kerlikowske said.

Henigan points to a Brady Center analysis of ATF reports in 2000 that showed most crime guns were sold by a small portion of licensed firearms dealers, which he says indicates a few unscrupulous dealers are feeding the black market. That same report showed 44 percent of Seattle crime guns came from six dealers, according to the report.

But groups such as the National Rifle Association argue that allowing citizens or interest groups access to the data could jeopardize investigations and infringe on the privacy rights of law-abiding gun owners.

And since not all trace guns actually were used in crimes -- such as a rifle that someone lost while hunting -- the data can be misconstrued to paint law-abiding gun retailers as disreputable, said Andrew Arulanandam, an NRA spokesman.

"Our position has always been that trace information ought to be made available for law enforcement and for prosecuting entities. There's no conceivable reason for civilians, politicians or interest groups to have access to that data," he said.

Tracking crime guns beyond the first purchaser is difficult, given about 90 percent of firearms change hands at least once before they're involved in a crime. Police and federal agents will take the case as far as possible, especially if it's involved in a violent crime.

Most were not stolen. Many criminals get their guns through "straw purchases," a term referring to the illegal practice of buying firearms on behalf of another whose criminal background would flunk the federally mandated background check, Crenshaw said.

"Once (the investigation) gets beyond the first person at the gun store, then it becomes labor intensive," Crenshaw said. "Now I'm asking an agent to say, 'OK, this is the guy who purchased the gun from the gun store, go see him and see what he did with it.' From that point we really need to be aggressive and find out what happened."

When one person's name pops up in connection to several crime guns, that could be a hint, he said.

Linking guns to other crimes also is done through an ATF nationwide database of spent casings collected from crime scenes. Forensic firearms experts such as Rick Wyant at the State Patrol Crime Lab in South Seattle use the database while testing guns under investigation by police.

Wyant shoots crime guns and compares the markings gouged into the casings or bullets with those on casings or rounds found at the scene. Every weapon has a unique signature, which under a microscope enables him to say whether a casing came from a certain gun, he said.

He enters images of each casing into the Integrated Ballistics Information System, a nationwide database maintained by ATF.

Every few months, he and his partner take boxes of miscellaneous guns recovered by Seattle police and shoot them so the casings can be entered into the national database, possibly linking them to gun crimes. Wyant also restores serial numbers criminals have filed off weapons to impede tracing efforts.

Wyant, like Kerlikowske, said he encourages law enforcement agencies to submit every gun for forensic testing, even if it was involved in a "victimless crime" or found discarded in the street.

"We tell all agencies that nobody throws away a perfectly good gun for no reason," he said.

IMMIGRATION:

For The Sake Of Peaches, Pass Immigration Reform (LAT)

By David Mas Masumoto, David Mas Masumoto, An Organic Farmer And Author In Fresno, Is A Fellow At The Kellogg Foundation.

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

Want tasty fruit? Then find a way to ensure a steady workforce.

I HAVE A CHOICE of growing one of two types of peaches, but which one will be decided by Congress and President Bush. Without immigration reform, the better peach will be lost.

One peach is complex; the other is simple. One involves many hands; the other would be the product of technology that controls the process as much as possible.

One peach can have an unbelievable taste if I get it right as I work with the intricacies of nature; the other would be bred for consistency and a "good enough" standard, a uniform product designed for efficiency and longer shelf life.

One fruit requires manual labor — an intensive operation of workers constantly in my fields; the other calls for reducing the need for labor, substituting mechanization whenever possible and creating a system that is not at the mercy of worker shortages.

But whether I can grow a better peach depends on whether I have enough field workers, and that's where immigration reform comes in. In recent years, farm labor has been tight, with some workers lost to construction jobs and others because of increased border security. Some farmers have responded by increasing wages, yet there were still not enough people willing to work the harvests. Last year, pears in California rotted on trees; two years ago, my raisin harvest was endangered, and for the last three years, I've struggled with peach harvests, terrified that just as the fruit was at the peak of perfection, I wouldn't have enough workers. Some of my best fruit has fallen from my trees.

The agricultural industry supports federal legislation for a guest-worker program that would bring in temporary farm laborers when shortages arise. This remedy would fix short-term problems. However, a long-term solution lies in immigration reform that could change the nature of farming, especially when it comes to specialty crops and small-scale operations like mine.

Without sufficient labor, organic and sustainable agricultural methods are jeopardized. The choice to work with nature as opposed to controlling it demands constant monitoring of the fruit and adapting and responding to the rhythms of the seasons. These systems require many hands. I want the human character to be part of my fields and my produce.

With more hands on my farm, I can grow delicate heirloom varieties, pick riper fruit and work with "just in time" management strategies. Dismiss and devalue these hands and the final outcome changes. A peach may look the same on the outside, but the process used to create it will result in a very different end product. Imagine the taste of a sauce made with minimal human touch, substituting prepackaged ingredients in order to reduce the labor needed.

Agriculture makes a mistake, though, if our sole goal in immigration reform is to seek an abundant supply of cheap labor. Farmers must acknowledge the human capital in our fields. Investments in workers, such as training, can benefit all parties. Skilled positions can then be created for a more willing and able labor pool. With the right kind of reform, workers' worth would be redefined; they would no longer be invisible.

As undocumented workers emerge from the shadows, new tensions will be created. Communities will change. The social contract in a region — the relationships that connect and bind us — will be tested.

New social justice issues will challenge employers. Workers with faces can't be as easily dismissed; their calls for better wages, health benefits and working conditions will no longer be whispers. We in the agricultural community have signaled an openness to reform and acknowledged the need for labor to fill "jobs that no one else wants." We also need to accept the responsibility for that labor.

In the future, could providing better farmworker benefits help define a region and industry? Could we create an appellation based on social justice and market a valued-added product, similar to "fair trade" coffee, which guarantees growers a designated price and decent working conditions? Could I then grow peaches with a conscience? Consumers have been willing to pay more when they understand the story behind their foods, be it organic or in support of living wages.

A grape or peach can acquire a distinctive flavor from terroir — the taste of region. Surely the way that individuals, rural communities and industries include "new Americans" in agricultural systems also will alter the delicate nuances of taste. After all, the true character of a pristine fruit is a result of multiple inputs: weather, soil and water as well as management and labor relations.

As we once again debate immigration reform, agriculture has an opportunity to educate the public about the role farmers and workers have in growing food, in satisfying our hunger. We're all part of a food system at the dinner table, and the policy we create will affect the nature of each bite.

IRS Audits Marriott Over ESOP-Related Deductions (WP)

From News Services And Staff Reports

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

The Internal Revenue Service is auditing Marriott International's federal tax returns for fiscal 2000 through 2002 over $1 billion in deductions the hotel chain took related to its employee stock-ownership plan.

Bethesda-based Marriott said it received "notices of proposed adjustment" from the IRS on Thursday that challenged most of the federal income tax deductions related to the plan, and the government agency proposed "substantial excise taxes and penalties."

"We believe the IRS' proposed adjustments are incorrect, intend to vigorously defend our positions and are examining various procedural alternatives for resolution of this matter," Marriott said in a filing yesterday with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Thomas Marder, a spokesman for the company, said he couldn't provide guidance on the size of the proposed adjustment. When asked if the situation could significantly affect Marriott's bottom line, he referred to a regulatory filing from late last month, which came before the company received the proposed adjustment notice and said no material impact was expected.

He also said companies have used this type of tax transaction for more than 30 years.

The IRS is reviewing the ESOP feature of the company's "Employees' Profit Sharing, Retirement and Savings Plan and Trust" implemented on June 13, 2000.

"Principal and interest on the debt related to the transaction was forgiven over a 26-month period as a mechanism for funding company contributions of elective deferrals and matching contributions to the plan," according to the filing. Marriott claimed $1 billion in federal income tax deductions for the forgiven principal and interest on the debt over that period.

"The benefit related to the tax deductions was reflected in equity and did not flow through the provision for income taxes," the filing said.

Local Man Arrested In Tax-evasion Scam (BATCE)

Battle Creek Enquirer, March 3, 2007

U.S. Marshals on Thursday arrested Charles Conces of Battle Creek, the Justice Department announced.

The arrest resulted from a federal judge's Feb. 23 order finding Conces in civil contempt of court for failing to obey a court order entered on Feb. 8.

Conces, who lives in Pennfield Township, has run for Michigan attorney general and secretary of state as a member of the U.S. Taxpayers Party and has staged public protests against county judges outside the Calhoun County courthouse in Battle Creek.

The Feb. 8 order compelled Conces to disclose to the government the identities of certain persons for whom he drafted or provided advice regarding federal income taxes, the identities of the persons who are responsible for his Web site, and all documents that he drafted or assisted in drafting for these persons no later than Feb. 16.

Conces refused to disclose the identities and documents as ordered by the court.

On Feb. 23, the court held Conces in civil contempt and ordered him to report to the U.S. Marshal no later than noon on March 1, 2007. Conces reported to the U.S. Marshals and was taken into custody. According to the court's Feb. 23 order, Conces will remain in the custody of the U.S. Marshals until he complies with the order to disclose these identities and documents.

In April 2006, the court permanently enjoined Conces and his organization, the National Lawman Committee for the Public Interest, from preparing tax returns for others and promoting several tax fraud schemes. The court had concluded that Conces promoted "tax evasion by creating and selling materials designed to obstruct the administration of the income tax laws."

"The Justice Department is not only committed to shutting down the tax scams that cheat the federal treasury and the taxpayers who pay into it, but also ensuring that such tax scams do not resurface later," said Eileen J. O'Connor, assistant attorney general for the federal Justice Department's Tax Division, in a press release.

"Tax scam promoters who disobey court orders and refuse to comply with established court procedures risk severe consequences."

Army Secretary Ousted (WP)

Second Firing Follows Walter Reed Revelations; Bush Vows a Probe

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates fired the secretary of the Army yesterday and President Bush vowed to investigate allegations of substandard treatment of wounded soldiers as the administration scrambled to contain fallout from the scandal over squalid housing and bureaucratic delays in outpatient care at Walter Reed Army Medical Center.

The Army named Maj. Gen. Eric B. Schoomaker as the new commander of Walter Reed only a day after picking Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, who had previously commanded the medical center, as the temporary chief. Kiley's selection had angered soldiers and family groups -- and, more important, Gates -- because of their belief that he had been aware of problems at the hospital and done little to address them. Kiley is the current Army surgeon general.

Gates made little secret of his dismay when he appeared before reporters yesterday to announce the resignation of Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey. Pentagon officials indicated that Harvey was forced to resign because Gates was angry with how the Army handled allegations of poor care detailed in a series of Washington Post reports. The facility's commander, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, was dismissed this week, and a captain and several lower-level soldiers were reassigned.

"I am disappointed that some in the Army have not adequately appreciated the seriousness of the situation pertaining to outpatient care at Walter Reed," Gates said. "Some have shown too much defensiveness and have not shown enough focus on digging into and addressing the problems."

Later, in an interview, an emotional Harvey appeared both apologetic and defensive. "It's unexcusable to have soldiers in that type of building," he said, explaining why he resigned.

But he also said that the Post stories lacked balance. "Where's the other side of the story?" he asked, his voice rising. "Two articles in your paper have ruined the career of General Weightman, who is a very decent man, and then a captain . . . and the secretary of the Army. If that satisfies the populace, maybe this will stop further dismissals."

In a sign of the seriousness with which Bush takes the situation, the White House announced that he will soon name a commission to look into whether there are similar problems at other military and veterans hospitals. Administration officials took the unusual step of releasing early the text of Bush's regular Saturday radio address, in which the president will vow to ensure that the government meets the physical and mental health needs of soldiers returning from Iraq and Afghanistan.

"Most of the people working at Walter Reed are dedicated professionals," Bush will say, according to the text. "Yet some of our troops at Walter Reed have experienced bureaucratic delays and living conditions that are less than they deserve. This is unacceptable to me, it is unacceptable to our country, and it's not going to continue."

Taken together, the developments yesterday highlighted the anger at the highest levels of the administration over the problems at Walter Reed, as well as the political danger for the White House. Veterans groups remain among the few strong supporters of the war and have been an important part of the president's political base, yet they -- along with military families -- have been outraged since the problems first became public two weeks ago.

Joe Davis, a spokesman for the Veterans of Foreign Wars, said that the reports have angered members across the country and that the group hopes Vice President Cheney will address the issue when he speaks to its legislative conference on Monday. "Nobody would believe the military would do this to their wounded," Davis said. "We want accountability."

Democrats in Congress, meanwhile, have strongly denounced the administration for what they call insufficient attention to the needs of returning soldiers. At least two committees are mobilizing to investigate the Walter Reed situation. The House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform issued a subpoena yesterday to compel Weightman to testify at a congressional hearing Monday.

The committee also released an internal Army memorandum reportedly written in September in which the Walter Reed garrison commander, Col. Peter Garibaldi, warned Weightman that "patient care services are at risk of mission failure" because of staff shortages brought on by the privatization of the hospital's support workforce.

Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.), a member of the House Appropriations subcommittee on defense and a close ally of a leading war critic, Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), said Bush's new commission is too little too late. "He's the executive," Moran said. "This has been six years, and now six years later, after an awful lot of neglect, he's going to get around to putting a commission together, a study to tell him what to do. . . . I think he's feeling politically desperate."

White House officials said politics played no role in their decision to form the commission, saying that Bush is genuinely outraged by the conditions at Walter Reed and that he learned about them from the recent news reports. "Once the Walter Reed stories ran, there was a collective feeling in the building, and certainly from the president, that whatever reasons or excuses, it was unacceptable," said Tony Fratto, deputy White House press secretary.

Eleven national volunteer organizations that help the wounded were called to the White House to meet with Bush on Wednesday, a meeting that White House officials said was planned before the Walter Reed stories broke. Cindy McGrew, founder of Operation Second Chance, a Maryland-based group that deals primarily with the wounded at Walter Reed, attended and said the president "wants to do all he can to help."

But the director of another organization, who spoke on the condition of anonymity so as not to anger the administration, called the event a "missed opportunity to ask people who have day-to-day interaction with the wounded to provide insight into how to fix this situation."

Anthony J. Principi, who served Bush as his first secretary of veterans affairs, said he was not sure Walter Reed is a political problem for the president but indicated that veterans groups are watching the situation carefully. "Veterans organizations have been very supportive of the president -- they respect and admire that he is stepping out on the issue and will hold people accountable. The president needs their support," he said.

The new commander of Walter Reed is Schoomaker, 58, currently commander of the U.S. Army Medical Research and Materiel Command at Fort Detrick, Md., home to biological weapon defense research. He is the younger brother of Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff.

It appears he has his work cut out for him. Yesterday, soldiers living in Building 18, the site of the worst problems, were told to pack their things so that Walter Reed could properly renovate the dank structure besieged by mold, leaks and rot. Some of the wounded were moved to another building on the post, while others were driven to a hotel in Silver Spring.

One soldier who had been living in Building 18 for 16 months, waiting to be treated for back problems, was told to report to barracks in Fort Meade, Md., according to his father. The soldier arrived at Fort Meade yesterday afternoon with his gear but was unable to move into his new accommodations -- the building had no elevator, and the soldier could not climb the stairs.

US Army Secretary Quits Over Row (BBC)

BBC.com, March 2, 2007

US Army Secretary Francis Harvey has resigned amid a row over the treatment of wounded US soldiers.

The move follows critical reports in the US media about the care of troops wounded in Afghanistan and Iraq at Washington's Walter Reed hospital.

The Washington Post said last week that some of the soldiers lived in buildings infested with rodents and cockroaches.

Mr Harvey was appointed in November 2004 and was responsible for the efficient functioning of the US army.

Mr Harvey's resignation was announced by Defence Secretary Robert Gates.

Our wounded soldiers and their families have sacrificed much and they deserve the best we can offer

Robert Gates It came a day after the head of Walter Reed Army Medical Center, Maj Gen George Weightman, was fired.

"I am disappointed that some in the army have not adequately appreciated the seriousness of the situation pertaining to outpatient care at Walter Reed," Mr Gates said.

"Some have shown too much defensiveness and have not shown enough focus on digging into and addressing the problems," he added.

Francis Harvey was appointed army secretary in 2004

The Washington Post newspaper claimed in a series of articles that conditions at Walter Reed, the most famous veterans' hospital in the US, were poor.

Outpatients lived in rat-infested rooms and bureaucracy got in the way of those trying to provide help to often badly injured soldiers, the articles reported.

The BBC's Justin Webb in Washington says that America's wounded veterans are regarded by most people in the country as truly heroic, so the fall-out has been considerable.

Mr Gates said that he was "concerned that some do not properly understand the need to communicate to the wounded and their families that we have no higher priority than their care".

"Our wounded soldiers and their families have sacrificed much and they deserve the best we can offer," he added.

Presidential address

According to our correspondent, the White House will hope that this trenchant intervention from Mr Gates will protect the president from political damage.

President George W Bush has been forced to address the issue in his weekly radio address - to be broadcast on Saturday - acknowledging that the treatment of the veterans has not been good enough.

"This is unacceptable to me, it is unacceptable to our country and it's not going to continue," he said, in an excerpt released by the White House.

He has announced that a cross-party commission will be formed to oversee health care for veterans.

Nonetheless, for many Americans it is a shock to discover that the men and women they care so deeply about have been so badly let down, our correspondent adds.

Army Secretary Ousted In Furor On Hospital Care (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 2 — Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey was forced to resign Friday over the handling of revelations that wounded soldiers were receiving shabby and slow treatment at Walter Reed Army Medical Center.

Even as the grim-faced defense secretary, Robert M. Gates, announced Mr. Harvey's dismissal, the Army put a new general in charge of the hospital, the second change of command in two days, and a clear signal that Mr. Gates wanted a clean break from the status quo.

Earlier, the White House had announced that President Bush would appoint a bipartisan panel to examine the medical treatment provided to wounded service members, both by the Defense Department and by the Department of Veterans Affairs.

"I am disappointed that some in the Army have not adequately appreciated the seriousness of the situation," Mr. Gates told reporters. "Some have shown too much defensiveness and have not shown enough focus on digging into and addressing the problems."

A senior Pentagon official said Mr. Gates had demanded Mr. Harvey's resignation because he was displeased that Mr. Harvey on Thursday, in dismissing the commander of Walter Reed, temporarily named Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley to take command. General Kiley, the Army's top medical officer, had earlier appeared to play down the problems at Walter Reed, where he was in command until 2004.

Mr. Gates's aggressiveness in addressing the problem has surprised many Pentagon officials who are still getting used to his style more than two months into his service.

Ordered by Mr. Gates to get an acceptable new commander in place by the end of the day, the Army announced late Friday that Maj. Gen. Eric B. Schoomaker, a veteran Army doctor and the brother of the current Army chief of staff, would take over command at Walter Reed.

In his weekly radio address, taped on Friday for broadcast on Saturday morning, Mr. Bush said, "This is unacceptable to me, it is unacceptable to our country, and it's not going to continue." The White House released a transcript without the usual embargo on its publication.

White House officials said the review ordered by Mr. Bush would examine soldiers' medical treatment starting when they were wounded, as they were moved to Defense Department hospitals and as they received care in V.A. facilities after leaving the armed services.

The White House commission seemed to overlap in at least some respects with a separate panel announced by Mr. Gates last week that he said had authority to examine living conditions, problems getting prompt care and any other issues at Walter Reed and other military-run hospitals the panel chose to examine.

Officials said the White House commission was likely to undertake a broader review and take longer with its investigation than the Pentagon panel, which has a 45-day deadline. Mr. Bush plans to name his commission's members next week.

House and Senate committees, too, are planning hearings on the matter next week. The House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform said Friday that it was issuing a subpoena to Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, who had been in command of the hospital since last August before his firing on Thursday. The panel has scheduled a hearing at Walter Reed on Monday.

The committee also made public an internal hospital memorandum written last September that warned that an Army decision to privatize support services at Walter Reed was causing an exodus of experienced career personnel and putting patient care "at risk of mission failure."

The scandal at Walter Reed is particularly embarrassing to the administration because many top officials have visited injured troops there. Although Mr. Bush has visited Walter Reed several times, his spokesman, Tony Snow, said last month that the president had learned about the situation from the newspaper and that he had given orders to "find out what the problem is and fix it."

Army officials have defended the treatment provided to most patients at Walter Reed, especially the most serious cases, those admitted to inpatient wards on its campus a few miles from the center of Washington.

But the administration has been unable to explain why adequate improvements at Walter Reed's nearby satellite facilities used to house outpatients were not made before the shoddy conditions were disclosed last month in a series of articles in The Washington Post. And the furor is unlikely to abate soon.

Mr. Harvey, the senior civilian official overseeing the Army, joined the Pentagon in 2004 after a long career as an engineer working mainly for defense contractors. He was an executive with the Westinghouse Corporation from 1969 to 1997.

In a speech last year, he said improved efficiency could reduce both the federal work force and the number of contractors.

But the House committee leaders said that at Walter Reed, hiring a contractor had resulted in a steep decline in the number of support personnel like maintenance workers to fewer than 60 last month, from 300 in early 2006.

An Army spokesman, Paul Boyce, said that "didn't help" efforts over the last year to improve conditions for patients in Building 18, the dilapidated 50-room former hotel across the street from Walter Reed where outpatients are housed. Before rushed renovations last month, the building had moldy walls, stained carpets and infestations of rats.

Walter Reed officials have also acknowledged that the large number of wounded from Iraq and Afghanistan, currently around 650 patients and outpatients, has taxed doctors, nurses and other care providers and forced them to rely more heavily on overflow facilities.

General Kiley, commander of Walter Reed from 2002 to 2004, left when he was appointed Army surgeon general. On a tour of the outpatient facilities for reporters last month, he took issue with the way the conditions were portrayed in some accounts.

"While we have some issues here, this is not a horrific, catastrophic failure at Walter Reed," he said. "I mean these are not good, but you saw rooms that look perfectly acceptable, you saw the day rooms with the pool tables and plasma screen TVs, and we're working every day to make those rooms better."

But those comments and others did not please Mr. Gates, aides said. Even though he issued a statement Thursday endorsing the decision to remove General Weightman, he was not aware that the Army had chosen General Kiley to be the acting commander, an appointment that lasted just one day.

"It could have been almost anybody but Kiley," said a senior Pentagon official, who was granted anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss Mr. Gates's thinking. Referring to General Kiley's service as the hospital commander, he added: "Some of this may well have developed and even started on his watch. And his comments also demonstrated a certain insensitivity."

General Schoomaker, 58, the new commander, had been commander of the Army's Medical Research and Material Command at Fort Detrick, Md. His brother, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, who is stepping down next month, was not involved in the decision to select him, the senior Pentagon official said.

In a visit to the outpatient facility last month before it was fixed up, Mr. Harvey called the conditions inexcusable. But he went on to place the blame for the situation on noncommissioned officers.

"We had some N.C.O.'s who weren't doing their job, period," Mr. Harvey said.

Army Secretary Quits In Walter Reed Scandal (CHIT)

By Aamer Madhani, John Biemer

Chicago Tribune, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Mired in controversy over the deplorable conditions at one of the Army's pre-eminent facilities for treating battle-scarred troops, Army Secretary Francis Harvey abruptly resigned Friday as the White House announced it would conduct a comprehensive review of the military's care of wounded soldiers.

Harvey's resignation came just a day after he ousted the two-star general who was commander of the Walter Reed Army Medical Center here after revelations that soldiers recovering from wounds suffered in Iraq and Afghanistan were being housed in moldy quarters, infested by mice and cockroaches.

Harvey had replaced the fired Maj. George Weightman as the head of Walter Reed with Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, a temporary replacement whose role in the scandal is still in question. Harvey's move angered Defense Secretary Robert Gates, who announced late Friday that he had accepted Harvey's resignation and that under-secretary Peter Geren would serve as acting secretary of the Army until a permanent replacement could be found. The Army also announced that Kiley would be replaced by Maj. Gen. Eric Schoomaker, the commanding general of the U.S. Army Medical Research and Materiel Command at Ft. Detrick, Md.

The Washington Post, which uncovered the decrepit conditions at Walter Reed, reported that Kiley had received complaints as early as 2003 but had done nothing to rectify the situation. After the newspaper's initial reports about the conditions late last month, Kiley derided the coverage as "one-sided."

Gates did not take questions from reporters, but made it clear that Harvey's ouster was related to his handling of the controversy.

"I am disappointed that some in of the Army have not adequately appreciated the seriousness of the situation pertaining to outpatient care at Walter Reed," Gates said. "Some have shown too much defensiveness and have not shown enough focus on digging into and addressing the problems."

The White House also announced on Friday that a presidential commission would review conditions at Walter Reed. President Bush expressed disappointment over the handling of the revelations and said that he has directed Gates to assess the situation, according to a White House transcript of the president's weekly radio address that is scheduled to air Saturday morning.

"These servicemen and women deserve the thanks of our country, and they deserve the best care our nation can provide," Bush said according to the transcript. "Yet some of our troops at Walter Reed have experienced bureaucratic delays and living conditions that are less than they deserve. This is unacceptable to me, it is unacceptable to our country, and it's not going to continue."

Veterans Affairs Secretary James Nicholson toured the Marionjoy Rehabilitation Hospital in Wheaton, Ill., west of Chicago on Friday. He said that the VA is doing its own inquiry into the care provided at its 155 medical centers throughout the country, which serve a million veterans a week, "to make sure that things are getting done the way they're supposed to be done."

Nicholson said that overall the VA is doing a good job in providing care for wounded veterans returning from the Iraq and Afghanistan wars.

"But these injuries are so serious that if there is just one that falls through the crack, it's unacceptable and it's painful to know about and so we have to get it perfect and that's the goal of the VA and I'm sure that's the goal of the Army," said Nicholson, who was also in town for a DuPage County Republican fundraiser.

Both the Senate and House armed services committees are planning hearings on the Walter Reed scandal, which has been compounded by recent news reports that many wounded Iraq veterans are receiving inadequate treatment from a beleaguered veterans health care system. The House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform announced it had issued a subpoena to compel Weightman, the ousted head of Walter Reed, to appear at a hearing on Monday to testify about an effort to privatize some support services at Walter Reed.

Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), chairman of the government oversight panel, and fellow committee member Rep. John Tierney (D-Mass.), told Weightman in a letter that privatization efforts at Walter Reed may have led to the management staff being cut from 300 to less than 60 earlier this year.

Walter Reed awarded a five-year, $120 million contract to IAP Worldwide Services for base operation support services, according to the letter. That company is tied to a former senior official of Halliburton, which has won millions of dollars in U.S. contracts for providing support services in Iraq and Afghanistan. Vice President Dick Cheney served as Halliburton's chief executive from 1995 to 2000.

"It would be reprehensible if the deplorable conditions were caused or aggravated by an ideological commitment to privatize services regardless of the costs to taxpayers and the consequences for wounded soldiers," Waxman and Tierney wrote.

Bush Announces Plans To Investigate Veterans' Health Care (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson And Chris Adams

McClatchy Newspapers, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON - In more fallout from reports of appalling conditions at the Army's top medical facility, Army Secretary Francis Harvey resigned Friday and President Bush announced a far-reaching investigation into the quality of health care for wounded troops.

Bush said he'd appoint a bipartisan commission to examine the treatment of wounded military personnel "from the time they leave the battlefield through their return to civilian life." He said he was "deeply troubled" by reports of substandard care at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center, where some recuperating veterans complained of being neglected and left in moldy, deteriorating facilities.

The president will formally announce the new commission in his Saturday radio address, but the White House released an early transcript of his remarks. In an unusual move, it distributed his comments for immediate release, without waiting for his speech. He taped his comments Friday.

Bush said he would appoint the commission "in the coming days" and would set "a firm deadline" for a report.

Harvey's resignation came a day after Maj. Gen. George Weightman was ousted as the top commander at Walter Reed. Defense Secretary Robert Gates suggested that Harvey and Weightman were forced out because they downplayed problems highlighted by recent stories in The Washington Post. Some problems at Walter Reed were first reported as early as 2005 by the online magazine Salon.

"I am disappointed that some in the Army have not adequately appreciated the seriousness of the situation pertaining to outpatient care at Walter Reed," Gates said with what appeared to be barely contained anger. "Some have shown too much defensiveness and have not shown enough focus on digging into and addressing the problems."

He blamed the problems on Walter Reed's leadership, not its doctors, nurses and other health-care workers.

The Army later announced that Maj. Gen. Eric Schoomaker would become the new commander at Walter Reed, replacing Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, who spent just a day in the post after Harvey tapped him to fill in. Kiley, who'd served a previous stint at Walter Reed, drew objections from critics, who said he'd failed to confront some of the same problems that recently came to light.

The treatment of wounded soldiers and veterans has become a sensitive issue in the context of the Iraq war.

Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., the chairman of the House Oversight Committee, said the panel would subpoena Weightman to a hearing Monday. The Army had tried to prevent him from testifying.

The House Armed Services Committee announced plans for a hearing Thursday on conditions at Walter Reed.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., toured Walter Reed on Friday and complained that wounded soldiers had been directed to stop talking to reporters. In a letter to Harvey before he resigned, the Democratic presidential candidate said wounded soldiers "have earned the right to have their voices heard."

The Washington Post stories on Walter Reed were among a series of recent news accounts highlighting problems in medical care for veterans and active-duty military personnel.

McClatchy Newspapers early last month detailed widespread gaps in the Department of Veterans Affairs' mental health-care system and showed how veterans in many parts of the country have limited access to specialized treatment for post-traumatic stress disorder, the most frequent mental-health problem to emerge from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

McClatchy previously had documented problems in the VA's disability compensation and other benefits systems. An ABC News special this week highlighted troubles in the VA's care of veterans with traumatic brain injuries, and Newsweek magazine blasts the VA in its current cover story for a host of problems in its medical and benefits divisions.

Veterans' health care is a sensitive issue for an administration that claims to offer the best equipment and care to active-duty troops and veterans.

Accounts of dismal conditions at Walter Reed were particularly embarrassing for the White House because Bush often visits the hospital. His last trip was in December, but aides said he was unaware of any problems until he read about them in the newspaper.

"Some of our troops at Walter Reed have experienced bureaucratic delays and living conditions that are less than they deserve. This is unacceptable to me, it is unacceptable to our country and it's not going to continue," Bush says in his prepared radio remarks.

He adds, "As we work to improve conditions at Walter Reed, we're also taking steps to find out whether similar problems have occurred at other military and veterans hospitals."

Walter Reed is part of the Pentagon's military health system, designed to serve active-duty personnel. The VA's operations for military veterans are far larger, with more than 150 hospitals and more than 875 outpatient clinics nationwide.

In his radio speech, Bush points to the VA's expanding budget as evidence of "our ongoing effort to improve our service to our nation's veterans." If Congress approves his fiscal 2008 VA budget, he said, the agency's health-care budget will have jumped by 83 percent in the past six years and its overall budget will have increased 77 percent, to $86 billion.

There's no question that the VA's budget has grown recently, and the health system has received good marks for significant improvements.

At the same time, Democrats in Congress and others question whether the VA's budget is keeping pace with burdens imposed by increasing numbers of veterans coming back from the war, aging patients and rising medical-care costs.

"Yes, it has been increased, but certainly it hasn't been increased enough to meet the demands, the salary increases and inflationary factors," said Joe Violante, the national legislative director for Disabled American Veterans.

At a budget hearing two weeks ago, Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash., questioned the administration's estimate that the VA would treat 263,000 Iraq and Afghanistan war veterans next year - a figure that she suggested was too low.

In addition, Violante and others say the VA suffers from inconsistent access: good hospitals and clinics in some part of the country and understaffed or overwhelmed hospitals elsewhere.

Army Secretary Resigns In Scandal's Wake (AP)

By Robert Burns,

AP, March 3, 2007

Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey abruptly stepped down Friday as the Bush administration struggled to cope with the fallout from a scandal over substandard conditions for war-wounded soldiers at Walter Reed Army Medical Center.

Harvey's departure, announced on short notice by a visibly agitated Defense Secretary Robert Gates, was the most dramatic move in an escalating removal of officials with responsibilities over one of the military's highest-profile and busiest medical facilities.

Hours earlier, President Bush ordered a comprehensive review of conditions at the nation's network of military and veteran hospitals, which has been overwhelmed by injured troops from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Gates said Harvey had resigned, but senior defense officials speaking on condition of anonymity said Gates had privately demanded that Harvey leave. Gates was displeased that the officer Harvey had chosen as interim commander of Walter Reed — Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, the current Army surgeon general and a former commander of Walter Reed — has been accused by critics of long knowing about the problems there and not improving outpatient care.

"I am disappointed that some in the Army have not adequately appreciated the seriousness of the situation pertaining to outpatient care at Walter Reed," Gates said in the Pentagon briefing room. He took no questions from reporters.

Harvey was at Fort Benning, Ga., on Friday morning when he cut short his visit to return to Washington to meet with Gates.

In an interview in his office shortly after the announcement, Harvey said he offered Gates his resignation because he believed the Army let the wounded soldiers down. He said the furor has depressed the staff at Walter Reed, and he wanted to prevent any others from leaving or being fired.

DOJ_NMG_0140348

"We can't have them leave," he said. "We can't have them be so demoralized that they leave. So I figured what the heck, if I offer my resignation that may stop all this bleeding and it was accepted."

Asked if Gates prodded him to leave, Harvey acknowledged the secretary wasn't happy with the way the Army handled the matter. But he said he had been thinking about stepping down for a few days and "I submitted my resignation."

He added, "We let the soldiers down, I'm the head of the Army. I thought it was necessary to do that."

On Thursday, Harvey fired the medical center's previous commander, Maj. Gen. George Weightman, for failures linked to the outpatient treatment controversy. Many had speculated that Weightman would be relieved of command, but Harvey's departure was a surprise. His last day in the job will be March 9.

Peter Geren, the undersecretary of the Army, will serve as Harvey's temporary replacement until Bush nominates a new secretary.

As Army secretary, Harvey is the service's top civilian official. He commands no troops. Along with the four-star general who is Army chief of staff, the secretary has statutory responsibility for training and equipping the Army. That includes responsibility for budgeting, recruiting and other personnel and resource policies.

The Army announced Friday that Maj. Gen. Eric B. Schoomaker, 58, will be the new commander of Walter Reed, which is located in Washington.

"From what I have learned, the problems at Walter Reed appear to be problems of leadership," Gates said. "The Walter Reed doctors, nurses and other staff are among the best and most caring in the world. They deserve our continued deepest thanks and strongest support."

Harvey said the Army was addressing the problems but added that since the revelations have now ruined Weightman's career and that of several other lower level solders, perhaps his own departure will "will stop further dismissals."

The revelations about shoddy facilities and wounded soldiers enduring long waits for treatment have embarrassed the Army and the Bush administration at a time when the White House is scrambling to shore up eroding support for the Iraq war. It has prompted numerous calls in Congress for more information, and sullied the reputation of what is supposed to be one of the military's foremost medical facilities.

An internal memo from Weightman last fall requested funding and additional personnel, saying that if shortfalls and the loss of skilled staff were not addressed "patient care services are at risk of mission failure."

Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, applauded Harvey's departure.

"I commend him for taking responsibility for the problems at Walter Reed," Skelton said.

The defense secretary indicated he was unhappy with the way Army leaders had responded to the Walter Reed disclosures.

"Some have shown too much defensiveness and have not shown enough focus on digging into and addressing the problems," Gates said. "Also I am concerned that some do not properly understand the need to communicate to the wounded and their families that we have no higher priority than their care and that addressing their concerns about the quality of their outpatient experience is critically important. Our wounded soldiers and their families have sacrificed much and they deserve the best we can offer."

The White House said the president would name a bipartisan commission to assess whether the problems at Walter Reed exist at other facilities. Last week, Gates created an outside panel to review the situation at Walter Reed and the other major military hospital in the Washington area, the National Naval Medical Center at Bethesda, Md.

The actions come after The Washington Post documented squalid living conditions for some outpatient soldiers at Walter Reed and bureaucratic problems that prevented many troops from getting adequate care.

Harvey has been Army secretary since November 2004.

He is the second consecutive Army secretary to be removed abruptly from office. In April 2003, then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld fired Thomas White, who had engaged in public disputes with Rumsfeld.

A former businessman trained as an engineer, Harvey counted as one of his proudest achievements a turnaround of the Army's recent recruiting slump. The Army missed its recruiting goal 2005 for the first time since 1999, and that same year Harvey instituted a series of changes that led to a recovery in recruiting.

Army Secretary Quits In Wake Of Hospital Scandal (CNN)

CNN.com, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Secretary of the Army Francis Harvey resigned Friday in the wake of recent reports of substandard conditions at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, a key facility treating troops wounded in Iraq.

Defense Secretary Robert Gates announced Harvey's resignation at the Pentagon, just a day after Harvey removed the hospital's commander, Maj. Gen. George Weightman, from his post.

Gates said Undersecretary of the Army Peter Geren will temporarily take Harvey's place. Harvey will leave on March 9.

"I thanked Dr. Harvey for his distinguished service to the department and to the nation," Gates said. "This flagship institution must have its new leadership in place as quickly as possible."

The Army later said Maj. Gen. Eric B. Schoomaker will take command of Walter Reed and the North Atlantic Regional Medical Command.

Schoomaker now commands the U.S. Army Medical Research and Material Command at Fort Detrick, Maryland.

Gates accepted no questions after his announcement, and didn't explain why Harvey resigned. However, he repeated something the Army said Thursday when Weightman was fired: The problems at the hospital reflect a lack of leadership.

"I am disappointed that some in the Army have not adequately appreciated the seriousness of the situation pertinent to outpatient care at Walter Reed. Some have shown too much defensiveness, and have not shown enough focus on digging into and addressing the problems."

Gates praised the doctors and other medical personnel at Walter Reed, and said they deserve support.

Troops recuperating from wounds they suffered in Iraq and Afghanistan were discovered to be living in substandard conditions in Building 18, an adjunct structure at Walter Reed that was once a hotel. There also were complaints of too much bureaucratic red tape.

Weightman, the fired commander, had said he was unaware of the substandard conditions.

But in a memo signed by a deputy to Weightman in September 2006, five months before reports of the problems at Walter Reed came to light, concerns were raised about care at the facility after the Army's decision to privatize support services there.

The memo obtained by the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee says Walter Reed "operations and patient care services are at risk of mission failure."

Harvey had been the Army's top civilian official since November 2004. Before President Bush appointed him to the position, he spent much of his career working for defense contractors, according his Army biography.

Earlier Friday, Bush said he is "deeply troubled" by the reports from Walter Reed and will form a bipartisan panel to assess medical care for wounded U.S. service members.

"This review will examine their treatment from the time they leave the battlefield through their return to civilian life as veterans, so we can ensure that we are meeting their physical and mental health needs," Bush will say in his weekly radio address, which is to air Saturday. A transcript was released by the White House on Friday.

He says he will soon announce commission members and set a deadline for their recommendations.

"Most of the people working at Walter Reed are dedicated professionals," Bush will say.

"Yet some of our troops at Walter Reed have experienced bureaucratic delays and living conditions that are less than they deserve. This is unacceptable to me, it is unacceptable to our country, and it's not going to continue."

The president said steps are being taken to find out whether there are similar problems at other military and veterans hospitals.

Bush said he is asking Congress for more than $86 billion for veterans' services for fiscal year 2008. If approved, "we will have increased the VA's health-care budget by 83 percent over the past six years, from about $20 billion to more than $36 billion."

Defense Secretary Sends Stern Message About Accountability (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks, Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey was traveling outside Washington yesterday when he was notified that Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, his boss, wanted to see him as soon as possible.

By the end of the day, Harvey had returned from a trip to Fort Benning, Ga., and was out of a job -- fired because of the scandal over the poor treatment of outpatient soldiers at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center. He was the second Army secretary in a row to be relieved.

"The problems at Walter Reed appear to be problems of leadership," Gates said in a brief statement delivered at the Pentagon just after he met with Harvey.

Harvey's firing sent a strong message across the top of the military establishment that the new Pentagon chief, though a newcomer to the world of defense, would not be a passive manager and would hold senior leaders accountable for their actions. "There's a new boss in town, and the message is 'You guys need to do your job right,' " a Defense Department official said yesterday.

Indeed, in an interview shortly after Gates's statement, Harvey said: "We let the soldiers down. I'm the head of the Army. What can I say?"

The move was a "sudden, emotional decision on the parts of both secretaries," an Army official said, though Harvey maintained that it was his own decision to step down.

Pentagon officials said Gates was angry that as the scandal unfolded, the Army relieved the commander of Walter Reed, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, who had been in that job for only about half a year, and replaced him with Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, the Army surgeon general, who had previously commanded Walter Reed and was said by soldiers, their families and veterans' advocates to have long been aware of problems at the medical complex.

Harvey defended his decision to temporarily appoint Kiley as Walter Reed's commander. He said Kiley called him a few days ago and lambasted The Washington Post's series on the medical center. "He called me and said, 'I'm willing to defend myself. . . . I want to have an opportunity to defend myself, and it was wrong and it was yellow journalism at its worst, and I plan on doing it. Trust me.' " Harvey said. "I said, 'Okay, Kevin.' " Harvey added that Kiley was to be in the job only about a week until they could make a "thoughtful decision on who should replace him."

The Army's appointment of Kiley also set up a potentially embarrassing situation next week, when the general was scheduled to testify before two Senate committees about the Walter Reed situation. Yesterday, the Army appointed Maj. Gen. Eric B. Schoomaker as the new Walter Reed commander.

The White House also made it clear to the Pentagon that the scandal needed to be addressed more swiftly and vigorously than the Army appeared to be doing, defense officials said.

At a Senate Appropriations Committee hearing on Tuesday, Gates said he was "very concerned" about the situation at Walter Reed and wanted to make clear that "accountability on this will not be limited to a couple of [noncommissioned officers] and a junior officer once we know the facts."

While Gates did not explicitly mention his predecessor, the new defense secretary's approach to the problem has contrasted with the way Donald H. Rumsfeld's Pentagon handled allegations of wrongdoing. In the Abu Ghraib prison scandal, Pentagon officials were quick to point the finger at low-ranking soldiers, and only one officer who worked at the prison has faced court proceedings, even after numerous investigations found high-level problems with interrogation policies.

Gates said yesterday that "some in the Army have not adequately appreciated the seriousness" of the Walter Reed issue.

Former Army secretary Thomas E. White, who was fired by Rumsfeld in April 2003, said that the country being at war creates unique challenges for the service secretaries, especially the secretary of the Army. "The treatment of casualties is an extremely emotional issue, and there is a tremendous sense that these people should be well treated for the service they've rendered their country," White said. "And when they're not, that's an unacceptable situation."

Walter Reed Lapses Claim Another Top Army Official (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

Under pressure from Defense Secretary Gates, the Army secretary resigns.

WASHINGTON — Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey resigned Friday under pressure from Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, becoming the second top Army official forced to step down because of revelations of problems in the care of seriously injured soldiers at Walter Reed Army Medical Center.

In an unusually harsh denunciation, Gates said he was displeased with some Army officials over their handling of disclosures that soldiers had received substandard housing and poor outpatient treatment at Walter Reed.

"I am disappointed that some in the Army have not adequately appreciated the seriousness of the situation pertaining to outpatient care at Walter Reed," Gates said at the Pentagon. "Some have shown too much defensiveness and have not shown enough focus on digging into and addressing the problems."

The Army also named a new commander of Walter Reed on Friday — a day after Harvey had controversially appointed a previous head of Walter Reed, Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, as interim commander. A senior Pentagon official said Gates was upset that Harvey had appointed Kiley.

Military officers said the swift response by Gates and his willingness to move against top Army commanders and civilians was partly meant to differentiate him from his predecessor, Donald H. Rumsfeld. Throughout months of revelations of abuses by

American soldiers at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq and elsewhere, Rumsfeld brushed off demands to punish ranking officers, and awarded one a medal for distinguished service.

President Bush, meanwhile, will tell the nation in his radio address today that he finds conditions at Walter Reed "unacceptable," and congressional Democrats have subpoenaed the hospital's former commander to what promises to be an acrimonious hearing at the Washington hospital Monday.

For Bush, the revelations came as an embarrassment. His radio speech — and its early release — represented an effort to contain the damage.

It was Harvey, the Army's top civilian official, who relieved Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman of his command of the hospital Thursday. In the same announcement, Harvey appointed Kiley, the Army's surgeon general and head of its Medical Command, as Walter Reed's acting commander.

But veterans groups, lawmakers and others had criticized Kiley — who headed Walter Reed from 2002 to 2004 — saying he had known about problems at the hospital and had failed to act.

On Friday, the Army appointed Maj. Gen. Eric B. Schoomaker as the new Walter Reed commander.

Last week, a day before Gates traveled to the hospital and publicly condemned the problems at Walter Reed, Kiley denied that there had been a "breakdown of leadership" and criticized the Washington Post stories that exposed problems at the hospital.

Although Gates declined to criticize Kiley last week, his comments Friday contradicted Kiley's stance that there had been no failure by hospital leaders. Gates singled out the doctors and nurses at the hospital for praise while criticizing the command.

"I want to reaffirm my confidence in the staff at Walter Reed and their professionalism and dedication to providing caring treatment," Gates said. "From what I have learned, the problems at Walter Reed appear to be problems of leadership."

Several military officials said Kiley also might be ousted from his post as surgeon general and Army medical commander. But the senior Pentagon official, speaking on condition of anonymity when discussing internal deliberations, said Kiley's fate would probably be determined by an independent review panel appointed by Gates last week to examine Army medical facilities.

Jerry Newberry, a spokesman for the Veterans of Foreign Wars, said Gates' actions had allayed his members' concerns that only low-level officials and officers would be held accountable for the problems at Walter Reed.

"Obviously, [Gates] is a no-nonsense guy and means what he says. He's demanded people be held accountable and obviously they are," Newberry said.

Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.), a member of the Armed Services Committee, praised Gates' move.

"Secretary Gates gets a lot of points for what he did today," said McCaskill, who has drafted a measure to improve housing for wounded soldiers and to cut through bureaucracy.

But she said she did not think the problems at Walter Reed could be fixed until Kiley was replaced.

"He is responsible for the command culture that allowed the situation to continue even after he knew about it," she said. "It is clear he knew about it. The problems with the outpatients were brought to him. I hope Secretary Gates is not finished."

Military officials said Harvey had also failed to speak candidly enough about the problems.

On Thursday, during a round-table discussion with reporters, Harvey refused to entertain questions about the growing scandal, saying he had received legal advice against commenting on investigations of Army personnel.

When pressed to discuss the Army investigation, Harvey was curt: "Just let us do it," he said. "When it's done, we'll let you know."

Failure to take responsibility, acknowledge the problems or explain remedial steps was unacceptable to Gates, military officials said.

"Secretary Harvey was an outstanding leader, but he got it wrong on this one," said the senior Pentagon official. "And the secretary [Gates] is serious about accountability."

Although Army officials acknowledged Harvey's missteps in dealing with the hospital crisis, he has been popular with many officers.

Named Army secretary in 2004, Harvey is a former defense industry executive who spent much of his career as a senior executive for Westinghouse Corp. He has a doctorate in metallurgy and material sciences from the University of Pennsylvania.

In his radio address today, Bush is to announce the creation of a bipartisan presidential commission to review all medical care for wounded service members. The commission would be in addition to the independent panel appointed by Gates.

"Some of our troops at Walter Reed have experienced bureaucratic delays and living conditions that are less than they deserve," an advance Bush text says. "This is unacceptable to me, it is unacceptable to our country, and it's not going to continue."

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles) will head a congressional hearing at the hospital Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0140352

At the hearing, Weightman, the medical center commander fired Thursday, will be questioned about a 2006 memo warning that a patient overload had strained hospital staffs and threatened care.

Preserve 'Core' Of No Child Left Behind Act, Bush Urges (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

He warns Congress against 'watering down' the education law.

LOUISVILLE, KY. — President Bush urged Congress to avoid broad changes to the education law that represented one of his key domestic policy accomplishments, saying Friday that "watering down" the No Child Left Behind Act "would be doing thousands of children a disservice."

"It's working," Bush said. "We can change parts of it for the better, but don't change the core of a piece of good legislation that's making a significant difference in the lives of a lot of children."

The law, which Bush signed in 2002, is to expire this year, and the president expressed his willingness to work with Capitol Hill's new Democratic majority on renewing it. He singled out the Democratic chairmen of the Senate and House education committees — Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Rep. George Miller of Martinez — as crucial to those negotiations.

Kennedy and Miller helped provide bipartisan support for No Child Left Behind, but since its passage they and other Democrats have said that the administration has failed to provide sufficient funds to carry out its requirements.

Democratic leaders now can push for these and other changes to the law that they could not enact when Republicans controlled Congress.

Bush spoke to a crowd in the gymnasium of an elementary school in New Albany, Ind., before addressing a Republican Party fundraiser in nearby Louisville, Ky., later Friday.

Even as Bush focused on the education issue, reminders were plentiful of the foreign policy matters that have defined his presidency — his response to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and his decision to invade Iraq.

As Bush's motorcade neared the school, it passed a clutch of antiwar demonstrators; one held a sign reading, "War Leaves Every Child Left Behind." Elsewhere, he passed a banner reading, "Thank You for Keeping Us Safe."

At the fundraiser, Bush spoke to about 650 contributors to the National Republican Senatorial Committee and Mitch McConnell's 2008 reelection campaign. The Kentucky Republican, the Senate minority leader, will be seeking his fifth term.

McConnell estimated that Bush's appearance would take in about $2.1 million.

A key provision of the No Child Left Behind Act required states to establish uniform tests for assessing students' progress and school quality.

The measure's supporters say this has promoted greater accountability in public education and helped motivate improved student performance in some subjects.

But along with criticism of the funding level for the law, some skeptics have charged that it has hamstrung teachers by putting too much emphasis on "teaching to the test."

Earlier this year, an independent commission assembled by the nonpartisan Aspen Institute think tank recommended more than 70 changes to the law, including requiring an "exit exam" for high school seniors.

Bush has not said what changes he would accept. But he opposes relaxing testing requirements or requiring a national test to replace state exams.

He said Friday that he also favored speeding up the process through which parents learn about a school's test results to make it easier for them to decide whether to seek additional help for their children.

Bush Staffers Ordered 3 Ejected From Event, Man Says (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

DENVER, March 2 -- A volunteer said Friday that he was acting on orders from White House staffers when he helped eject three people from a taxpayer-funded event President Bush was attending, according to the man's attorney.

The volunteer, Michael Casper, said in a deposition that two White House employees told him to throw out the three after Casper saw them behaving suspiciously, lawyer Sean R. Gallagher said.

Casper named the White House employees as Steven A. Atkiss, deputy director for travel, and Jamie O'Keefe, lead advance staffer for the 2005 event, Gallagher said.

White House spokesman Blair Jones said he could not comment on pending litigation.

Leslie Weise and Alex Young, two of the three people who were thrown out, filed a federal lawsuit against Casper and Jay Bob Klinkerman, both volunteers with the event's host committee. Weise and Young say that they were told to leave because of their political views and that the White House had a policy of ejecting dissenters from the president's appearances.

Martha Tierney, an American Civil Liberties Union lawyer representing the plaintiffs, said Atkiss and O'Keefe would be added as defendants.

Justice Thomas Scorns Media, Affirmative Action In Interview (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

'That's a lie,' he says of the notion that he was recruited for college.

WASHINGTON — In a rare interview, Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas described himself as a high-achieving student who was mentored by a prominent priest when he enrolled in a Catholic college in Massachusetts in the late 1960s. But he bitterly rejected the idea that he benefited from affirmative action because he was black.

"That was the creation of the politicians, the people with a lot of mouth and nothing to say, and your industry," Thomas told a writer for Business Week magazine. "Everything becomes affirmative action."

In 1968, shortly after the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., the Rev. John Brooks began recruiting young black men to enroll at College of the Holy Cross, a Jesuit school in Worcester, Mass.

The initial class of 28 included Washington lawyer Theodore V. Wells Jr., who is representing former vice presidential aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby; Pulitzer Prize-winning novelist Edward P. Jones and investment banker and former New York City deputy mayor Stanley Grayson — as well as Thomas, the high court's only African American.

In an interview that accompanied the magazine's profile of Brooks, Thomas insisted he was not recruited to go to Holy Cross. After dropping out of a Missouri seminary in 1968, Thomas returned home to Savannah, Ga.

"A nun suggested Holy Cross. That's how I wound up there," he said. "Your industry [the news media] has suggested that we were all recruited. That's a lie. Really, it's a lie. I don't mean a mistake. It's a lie.

"That thing that has astounded me over the years is that there has been such an effort to roll that class into people's notion of affirmative action," he continued. "You hear this junk. It's just not consistent with what really happened."

Thomas expressed disdain for the news media several times during the interview.

"One of the reasons I don't do media interviews is, in the past, the media often has its own script," he said. "The media, unfortunately, have been universally untrustworthy because they have their own notions of what I should think or I should do."

At times, Thomas described himself as a solid student in college. "I had always been an honors student. I had always had really high grades, so that was never a problem." But he also said he struggled: "I'm not a school person. I never liked school. My best day of school was the day I graduated."

Thomas described how Brooks, then a dean of Holy Cross, won an "amnesty" for black students in December 1969 after they had quit the college en masse. Five black students had been singled out and expelled for taking part in a larger protest related to the Vietnam War. The other blacks decided to quit in solidarity with those who had been expelled. Thomas said his college career might have ended there had the priest not intervened.

"The black kids were being treated unfairly. I said: 'Look, if we're not going to be treated fairly here, let's leave,' " Thomas said. "Thank God for Ted [Wells] … and Father [Raymond] Swords and Father Brooks. They worked it…. What if he [Brooks] had just said: 'Let them go.' God only knows where I would be."

Brooks, now 83, told the magazine the initial decision to expel the five black students "was racism, basically." He persuaded Swords, the college president, to readmit them.

After graduating from Holy Cross in 1971, Thomas enrolled at Yale Law School and graduated in 1974. He took a job in Missouri with the state's then-attorney general, John Danforth. When Danforth was elected to the Senate, he took Thomas with him to Washington, and later lobbied to get him on the Supreme Court.

In 1991, when Justice Thurgood Marshall, the court's first African American, announced his retirement, President George H.W. Bush chose Thomas to succeed him.

In the interview, the now 58-year-old Thomas described his current life as an exhausting struggle. He pointed out a drawing in his office that shows an African American man draped over a desk with his hands stretching toward the floor. Thomas said a friend gave him the drawing because "he thought it captured my life."

"Look at the exhaustion," he said. "Mental. Physical. Spiritual. Just constant change. You just want to slow down. You see people take a walk and you want to, too."

U.S. Selects Design For New Nuclear Warhead (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

The National Nuclear Security Administration has selected a design from Lawrence Livermore and Sandia national laboratories that could become the basis for the first new nuclear warhead produced by the United States in more than 20 years.

The purpose of the new Reliable Replacement Warhead is to provide, beginning in 2012, a new generation of secure nuclear warheads -- initially for submarine-launched missiles -- that would provide a credible deterrent well into the mid-21st century.

"RRW will take advantage of today's science to ensure long-term confidence in the future stockpile" of nuclear warheads, Thomas P. D'Agostino, the NNSA's acting administrator, said yesterday. The Livermore design beat out one submitted by Los Alamos National Laboratory because there was a "higher confidence" that it could be certified without underground nuclear testing, D'Agostino said. He added that the Los Alamos design has some "highly innovative" features that will be developed "in parallel with the Livermore effort."

The design team will work with the Navy over the next 10 months to define a cost schedule and a production plan. The NNSA's 2008 budget includes $88 million for the RRW, though Congress could limit that funding and slow the program.

According to a chart prepared by the NNSA for Congress and made available to The Washington Post, the RRW program "decreases the likelihood of the need for nuclear testing for certification." Another program goal is to build the warheads so that "unauthorized use of the weapon" would be "impossible without re-manufacture," according to NNSA charts.

The new warheads would require an upgrade of the nation's 50-year-old nuclear weapons manufacturing complex, according to the NNSA. The current U.S. stockpile of about 6,000 "legacy" warheads is already being refurbished. Beginning in the early 1990s, as the Cold War ended and a test moratorium between the United States and Soviet Union was reached, the United States halted the development of new warheads and shifted to supervising its stockpile, making sure the deployed warheads remained reliable. At the same time, those no longer needed began to be dismantled.

During the administrations of George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton, the Pentagon and the Energy Department planned to put the stockpiles through a life-extension process every 20 to 30 years. The nonnuclear components of the warheads were to be tested and replaced if necessary. With the United States now committed to reducing its deployed warheads to between 1,700 and 2,200 by 2012, the stockpile five years from now would primarily consist of older warheads -- with fewer than half of them refurbished, according to the NNSA.

The Bush administration's 2001 Nuclear Posture Review called for a study on developing a new generation of nuclear weapons, including a controversial nuclear "bunker buster" and special warheads designed for destroying chemical or biological weapons. Congress did not fund those programs and, instead, redirected the money toward a refurbishment program for existing warheads -- a slow and time-consuming process.

It took almost 15 years to refurbish the W-87 warheads on the Minuteman III ICBMs -- six years to determine what needed replacement and eight more to complete the process, according to NNSA and Pentagon officials. And the W-76 -- the warhead for the Trident submarine-launched ICBM -- has been under study for refurbishment since 1998, but work on modernizing the warheads is just starting.

The NNSA has long said that one goal of the RRW is to "render unauthorized use of weapon impossible," a quote taken from the still-secret National Security Presidential Directive 28, titled "Nuclear Weapons Command, Control, Safety, and Security." The new RRW design includes a "use control" device, which locks the nuclear element of a weapon so it cannot be used should it fall into enemy hands.

Livermore Lab To Build Hydrogen Bomb (LAT)

By Ralph Vartabedian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

It's picked mostly because it assured that no underground testing would be necessary.

Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory on Friday was declared the winner in a competition to design the nation's first hydrogen bomb in two decades, a major step in restarting production of nuclear weapons.

The Bush administration said the program would improve the U.S. stockpile's reliability, security and safety and would allow for a reduction in the thousands of weapons held in reserve for a potential war.

Critics reacted sharply, saying the program sent the wrong international message when the U.S. was trying to stop the spread of nuclear weapons.

Key members of Congress said the program was moving too fast.

"I have serious concerns with the process leading up to today's announcement, and with the priorities of the Department of Energy," said Rep. Peter J. Visclosky (D-Ind.), chairman of the appropriations subcommittee that would pay for the program.

"Although a lot of time and energy went in determining the winning design for a new nuclear warhead, there appears to have been little thought given to the question of why the United States needs to build new nuclear warheads at this time," he said.

The award culminates a frenetic competition held since 2005 between Livermore in the Bay Area and Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico. Sandia National Laboratories, which provides engineering for the arming system, was part of both teams, and its California branch will continue the program with Livermore.

Research on some aspects of the Los Alamos design also will continue and may be included in the Livermore bomb, said Tom D'Agostino, acting chief of the Energy Department's National Nuclear Security Administration.

Livermore won largely because of its conservative approach, assuring it could build the bomb with no need for underground testing.

The U.S. temporarily halted underground testing in 1992 during the George H.W. Bush administration and then indefinitely during the Clinton administration. The program will spend eight to 12 months assessing the cost, schedule and scope of the effort, D'Agostino said.

The victory is an important boost for Livermore, which is managed under contract by the University of California.

"I can't tell you how honored the California team is," said Bruce Goodwin, chief of the nuclear weapons program at Livermore. "I am personally humbled by this."

Livermore Lab Tapped To Design New Nuke (SFC)

By James Sterngold

San Francisco Chronicle, March 3, 2007

The Energy and Defense departments have chosen the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory to design the country's first new nuclear warhead since the Cold War, giving the Bay Area institution the central role in a program that could involve billions of dollars.

The decision, announced Friday, was a clear victory for Livermore, which bested its storied sister lab, the Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico, in a competition to lead the research.

Officials said Los Alamos -- where the first atomic bombs were designed and built in the Manhattan Project in World War II -- would still be involved in nuclear weapons design but in an unaccustomed subordinate role.

The Sandia National Laboratories, an engineering program with facilities at Livermore and in New Mexico, also will be a partner with Livermore as the United States develops the most important, if strongly contested, nuclear weapons program in a generation.

The program -- called the Reliable Replacement Warhead -- is likely to have a modest initial impact on Livermore, which is managed by the University of California. Officials said there would be no significant increase in staffing or spending in the short term, and the next step would involve developing detailed budgets.

For the all the excitement over Livermore's victory -- and clear disappointment at Los Alamos -- the question of whether the new nuclear weapons actually will be built is still far from settled. The announcement was an important symbol of the Bush administration's efforts to revive the entire nuclear weapons production complex, based on an argument that the old stockpile is growing more difficult to maintain and should be replaced. But there is substantial resistance in Congress, among both Republicans and Democrats, and among some weapons experts.

Some argue that the current stockpile -- an estimated 6,000 warheads -- remains in excellent condition and will satisfy U.S. defense needs for decades to come. Others have expressed deep concern that a ramped-up manufacturing program could encourage other countries, such as Iran and North Korea, to push ahead with their own bomb programs.

"What worries me is that the minute you begin to put more sophisticated warheads on the existing fleet, you are essentially creating a new nuclear weapon, and it's just a matter of time before other nations do the same thing," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif. "In fact, this could serve to encourage the very proliferation we are trying to prevent."

Rep. Pete Visclosky, D-Ind., the chairman of the House appropriations subcommittee, which controls nuclear weapons spending, described the weapons effort as having a "make-it-up-as-you-go-along character" and as an example of misplaced priorities.

"This announcement puts the cart before the horse," Visclosky said. "Although a lot of time and energy went into determining the winning design for a new nuclear warhead, there appears to have been little thought given to the question of why the United States needs to build new nuclear warheads at this time. My preference is that the Department of Energy would have spent their resources reconfiguring the old Cold War complex and dismantling obsolete warheads."

Rep. Ellen Tauscher, D-Walnut Creek, whose district includes Livermore, said she shared some of those concerns.

DOJ_NMG_0140356

"I have to admit that I'm thrilled that Livermore won," said Tauscher, the chairwoman of the Strategic Forces Subcommittee of the House Armed Services Committee. But she agreed it was not clear that any new weapons were needed, and she insisted that Congress would hold the weapons complex on a tight leash by scrutinizing budgets carefully.

"This is just one step in what could be a long series of steps," she said.

Visclosky and Tauscher said they planned hearings on the new weapons program soon.

Lab and government officials, well aware of the skepticism in Congress, went out of their way Friday to stress that the program remained in a preliminary phase.

"This is absolutely not an announcement to build a new warhead," said Thomas D'Agostino, the acting director of the National Nuclear Security Administration, which oversees the weapons complex. "This is absolutely proceeding on a design effort. ... This is not about starting a new arms race."

D'Agostino also stressed that, if the United States were to build and deploy the new weapons, the increased reliability would mean the country could sharply reduce its stockpile down to levels not seen since the 1950s.

The Reliable Replacement Warhead program involves building weapons that would, in principle, be more reliable and safer than existing warheads but would fit on existing missiles. The first warheads would replace those on Trident missiles, which are carried on nuclear-powered submarines.

Congress has mandated that the weapons be built without any underground testing -- a technical feat that has never been tried before -- and that they could not involve new capabilities or new military missions. Underground testing has been banned since 1992.

The Bush administration has requested $119 million to support design studies for fiscal 2008. Government officials did not estimate the total cost of replacing the nation's nuclear stockpile, but experts generally agree that it would be a multi-billion-dollar endeavor over several decades.

Both Republicans and Democrats have insisted they will fund the research efforts on a year-to-year basis to ensure that the new weapons are built only if they are needed and can be deployed without testing.

But assessments of the program's designs by outside experts have undercut some of the government's assertions, and some experts have complained about the lack of a timetable or firm plan for how many new weapons would be needed.

C. Bruce Tarter, a former director of Livermore and head of a team of outside scientists that has been reviewing the designs, said at a scientific conference two weeks ago that there is no empirical evidence that the old weapons are deteriorating and need to be replaced. He also said the design just approved would be the first in a series of new generations of warheads to be built over a span of decades.

Only a small number of the claimed benefits of the new warheads, Tarter added, would be included in the first of the new warheads; it would take many generations and many years for all the promised benefits to be realized.

In addition, D'Agostino insisted Friday that the warhead was in an initial design phase. However, lab officials said researchers not only have produced extensive designs -- each lab prepared more than 1,000 pages of testing and design specifications -- but they have already conducted non-nuclear tests of the critical detonation devices and other components. They have even begun to plan in detail how the weapons would be manufactured.

The officials said the designs presented by Los Alamos and Livermore had some critical differences. The Livermore design was based on a weapon that was built and actually tested during the Cold War but never deployed. This "robust test pedigree" gave Livermore the advantage, D'Agostino said.

The Los Alamos team designed a weapon that used previously tested elements, but it combined them in a more innovative way and incorporated more safety features. D'Agostino said the Livermore design was chosen because "it is the more conservative approach," but the more innovative features of the Los Alamos bomb might be incorporated later. Either way, he said, Los Alamos would continue to have extensive involvement in the design effort.

That was not much consolation for Los Alamos' proud scientists. Los Alamos has been criticized in recent years for a string of security lapses, and some officials there had believed it would be impossible to let Los Alamos win for political reasons.

Brad Holian, a retired Los Alamos scientist who still works part time in the weapons division, said the "team is thoroughly demoralized."

He described as "dog treats" the idea that Los Alamos scientists could participate by reviewing Livermore designs and working on some secondary components.

Feds Select Plan For New Nuclear Warhead (AP)

By H. Josef Hebert
AP, March 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0140357

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Bush administration selected a design Friday for a new generation of atomic warheads, taking a major step toward building the first new nuclear weapon since the end of the Cold War two decades ago.

The military and the Energy Department selected a design developed by the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory in California over a competing design by the Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico, according to government sources who spoke on condition of anonymity in advance of a formal announcement.

The decision to move ahead with the warhead, which eventually would replace the existing arsenal of weapons, has been criticized as sending the wrong signal to the world at a time when the United States is assailing attempts at nuclear weapons development in North Korea and Iran and striving to contain it.

But military and Energy Department officials have argued that the new U.S. warhead will not add to the nuclear arsenal. They maintain the new design will make the weapons stockpile more secure and reliable without the need for actual underground testing.

The warhead has been the focus of an intense competition between Los Alamos and Lawrence Livermore, the government's two premier nuclear weapons labs.

The two facilities submitted separate designs nearly a year ago. Lawrence Livermore's design is based on a warhead actually tested in an underground detonation in the 1980s. Los Alamos had a design based on a fresh approach that has not undergone testing.

One of the assurances given by defense officials to Congress is that the new warhead will not have to undergo actual testing. Once developed, it would be used in the Trident missiles on submarines and eventually would replace warheads on the Air Force's missile arsenal, officials said.

Administration officials, including the military, have argued that today's aging warheads are harder to maintain and as they age it will become more difficult to ensure their reliability.

The new design is advertised as being more robust with additional features to safeguard them against possible theft or misuse.

Of overriding concern to members of Congress has been that the warhead be developed without the need for underground tests. The administration has sought to assure Congress that the design would not require such testing.

The administration also argues that a phasing out of current warheads with the more modern design will allow additional reductions in the number of warheads that will be needed.

The decision Friday establishes a clear blueprint for designing the new warhead, officials said. A final go ahead is expected to be made by the president within two years, with the first warheads to be completed by 2012.

It has not been determined how much the program will cost. The administration asked Congress for $119 million for the fiscal year beginning Oct. 1 to push ahead with further design work.

Advocates for the warhead say it would give military commanders greater assurance of reliability and could speed the reduction of the deployed number of nuclear warheads from 6,000 to fewer than 2,000 by 2012.

New Nuclear Warhead Design For US (BBC)

BBC.com, March 3, 2007

The Bush administration has selected the design for America's first new nuclear warhead in nearly two decades.

US officials say the warhead will not add to the country's nuclear arsenal, but will replace existing missiles.

Critics have complained it sends the wrong signal at a time when the White House is leading efforts to curb Iran and North Korea's nuclear ambitions.

The chosen design was developed in a Californian laboratory and is based on a warhead already tested in the 1980s.

The US Congress authorised design work on a new warhead in 2005 on the basis that there would not be any fresh missile tests.

No nuclear underground tests have been conducted since a ban in 1992.

The new warhead, due to be operational in five years' time, will be used to replace Trident missiles on submarines.

'No arms race'

Making the announcement, US officials said the plan was simply to replace older, less reliable warheads with a safer version.

"This is not about starting a new nuclear arms race," said Thomas P D'Agostino, acting head of the National Nuclear Security Administration (NNSA).

Scientists at the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory would now continue work on the design, costing and development of the programme, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0140358

Democratic Senator However, says the BBC's Jamie Coomarasamy in Washington, at a moment when the White House is trying to stop North Korea and Iran developing their nuclear programmes, some see the decision to press ahead with a new US warhead as sending an unfortunate mixed message.

Democratic Senator Dianne Feinstein was among the critics in Congress.

"The minute you begin to put more sophisticated nuclear warheads on the existing fleet, you are essentially creating a new nuclear weapon. And it's just a matter of time before other nations do the same," the Associated Press quotes her as saying.

"This could serve to encourage the very proliferation we are trying to prevent."

Nuclear non-proliferation groups have also criticised the move, warning that it could lead to proliferation and saying there is no need to replace the US' Cold War-era stockpile.

The NNSA has said the destruction of ageing warheads will mean that in five years' time, the number held by the US will be at its lowest since the 1950s.

Locking Up The Ghost Of Congress Past (NYT)

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

Congress's quid-pro-quo corruption scandal continues to haunt the Capitol as Bob Ney, the once-unbeatable lawmaker, slips off to his prison sentence of two and a half years for peddling influence to Jack Abramoff, the bribe-dishing lobbyist already doing six years in a Florida case.

As the House's special task force considers whether Congress needs an outside monitoring panel to help enforce stronger integrity standards, we suggest that it start with an in-depth briefing on the Abramoff-Ney downfall — complete with cash-flow charts and poll data on how the scandal has tainted the public's view of lawmakers.

It shouldn't take more than that to persuade the task force of what is needed.

The House ethics committee sat mute and petrified for a year while the news media and prosecutors peeled back the Abramoff scandal. An independent integrity office to investigate allegations of ethics violations is exactly the restorative needed by the ethics committee. Unfortunately, no one knows what is on the task force's agenda because the bipartisan group has decided to start its work with private meetings. Public hearings may or may not come later as the lawmakers face a May 1 deadline for making recommendations. There may be some virtue in eliciting candor in private, but sooner or later the House very much needs to hear from a galvanized public that sent a clear demand for ethical reform when it voted the Republicans out of power last year.

The Democratic Senate has already run away from a proposed integrity office. The House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, deserves credit for ordering consideration of the sensitive subject of an outside watchdog. But the study group must not be shrouded in secrecy nor its work be allowed to drag on beyond May 1. For all the tenderness of the task, lawmakers should focus on where and how Mr. Ney went wrong and try to ensure that it does not happen again.

A Better Way On Presidential Succession (WP)

By Norman Ornstein

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

Since Sept. 11, 2001, the speaker of the House has been required for security purposes to take government planes for official business. The White House rightly called "silly" recent criticism of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's desire to have a plane that could fly to her San Francisco district nonstop, which would be larger than the plane her predecessor used. But this flap raises a more serious issue -- that of presidential succession.

Pelosi takes a military plane because the speaker of the House is second in line to succeed the president, behind only the vice president. That's what drove the Department of Homeland Security to demand the extra level of security for then-Speaker Dennis Hastert. But should the speaker of the House even be in the line of succession?

Who succeeds a president (after the vice president) is set by law, not fixed in the Constitution. The process has been addressed seriously three times. In 1792, Congress put the president pro tempore of the Senate and the speaker of the House, in that order, in the line, behind the vice president. It added no others. After the assassination of President James Garfield in 1881, there was a lengthy period with no vice president and no congressional leaders -- and therefore no one in line to succeed President Chester Arthur. An 1886 act took out the lawmakers and put in Cabinet officers, starting with the secretary of state.

In 1946, President Harry Truman, who had recently taken a dangerous trip to Potsdam with his secretary of state and was aware that with no vice president the line of succession was thin, pushed hard for a new order. The act was revised in 1947 to put the two top lawmakers back in and included after them members of the Cabinet in order of the creation of their offices.

We still have that process today.

DOJ_NMG_0140359

When the Second Congress enacted the first presidential succession act, it was highly controversial. Congress was dominated by Federalists; they did not want Secretary of State Thomas Jefferson, a leader of the rival Democratic-Republican Party, to be next behind the vice president. They turned to their own congressional leaders, a solution that was immediately challenged by James Madison, among others, as unconstitutional.

The Constitution says Congress can create a line of succession from among "Officers" of the United States, clearly meaning executive branch officials. But it also says that no one except the vice president shall serve simultaneously in the executive and legislative branches. The congressional majority brushed aside that argument. But it is a position accepted by most constitutional scholars.

Truman knew the constitutional arguments, but he believed strongly that more legitimacy came to a president who was not elected if that person had been previously elected to another office; thus, the top congressional leaders, national figures both, were restored to primacy (with the order reversed to mollify the more powerful House leaders of the time, Sam Rayburn and Joe Martin.) The constitutional issues, and any serious questions about the overall process, were pushed to the back burner and have remained there since.

But having congressional leaders in the presidential line of succession is wrong for more than constitutional reasons.

First, congressional leaders frequently are of the opposite party and viewpoint of a president; if a president and vice president were to die at the beginning of a term, the country would have four years of a president representing the opposite of what it voted for -- a situation made even worse if the change in direction came as a result of a terrorist action. Southern pro-slavery insurgents actually plotted to kill everyone in the line of succession to Abraham Lincoln to change the policy and political direction of the Union.

Second, congressional leaders have a built-in conflict of interest. When Andrew Johnson was impeached by the House and tried in the Senate, he escaped removal from office by one vote -- and among those who voted against him was the Senate president pro tempore, Benjamin Wade of Ohio, who would have succeeded Johnson had he been ousted.

The president pro tempore of the Senate, traditionally the most senior member of the majority party, poses another problem: He is usually the Senate's oldest member. For several years, Strom Thurmond, in his 90s and clearly not up to the job of president, was nonetheless third in line for the post.

The terrorism threat to Washington underscores a deeper problem -- everyone in the line of succession resides in Washington.

A suitcase nuclear bomb downtown or an attack at a presidential inauguration could wipe out everyone in that line and leave a vacuum in leadership at the worst possible time.

A better option would be to include top Cabinet members, such as the secretaries of State, Treasury and Defense, and then allow a president to designate several others -- all requiring Senate confirmation -- including qualified people of breadth who reside outside the capital area.

It won't be easy for Speaker Pelosi and President Pro Tem Robert C. Byrd to agree to take themselves out of the succession queue. Doing so -- while pushing for a meaningful update of presidential succession overall -- would be a great act of statesmanship. It would even be worth keeping the military plane.

What History Books Teach About The Market's Drop (WSJ)

By Peter A. McKay

The Wall Street Journal, March 3, 2007

Investors have reason to hope that history repeats itself.

Although they may have to wait out some turbulence along the way, there is evidence that stock-market drops like the one on Tuesday often give way to solid gains.

Research by analysts at Legg Mason Capital Management of past market performance after the Dow Jones Industrial Average, Standard & Poor's 500-stock index and Nasdaq Composite Index all fell by at least 3% the same day, showed that one year later, each had gained at least 14%.

All three indexes were little changed one month after the big one-day selloffs. Including Tuesday, there have been 27 such daily drops, going back to 1974.

DOJ_NMG_0140360

Sentiment on Wall Street this past week seemed to acknowledge that history. Most professional stock pickers fretted over the market's downturn but ultimately declined to slash their forecasts for the market's 2007 performance.

"The question on everyone's mind this week has been, are we going into a bear market?" said portfolio manager David Nelson, of Legg Mason. "To me, it seems the answer is no."

Many noted the stock market's relentless run-up since last summer and interpreted the selloff, which continued through the end of the week, as an unpleasant but necessary bump along a road that they believe will lead still higher in the long run.

Still, it was a tough week. The Dow industrials fell 4.2%, the biggest weekly percentage drop since March 2003, ending at 12114.10. The blue-chip average is now off 2.8% this year and more than 670 points below its record close less than three weeks ago.

On Friday, the market's newfound volatility remained on full display. The Dow opened lower, rose to show a gain of more than 13 points prior to midday, but finished near its intraday lows. In the end, the Dow stumbled 120.24 points, or 1%, on the day.

Among its 30 components, insurance giant American International Group was a rare bright spot, up more than 3% after announcing a strong profit, a share-buyback plan and a more-generous dividend policy.

The broad S&P 500 fell 1.1% Friday, or 16.00 points, to 1387.17, off 4.4% on the week and down 2.2% this year. The tech-stock-focused Nasdaq Composite shed 1.5%, or 36.21 points, to close at 2368.00, off 5.8% on the week. The Nasdaq, which had been leading the Dow and the S&P in gains for the year, is now down 2% in 2007.

The University of Michigan announced a large, unexpected drop in its monthly reading of consumer confidence, adding to the bearish mood in the market.

Also, the yen continued its recent surge against the dollar. Analysts say the unwinding of what are known as carry trades, in which investors seek to profit from interest-rate differences between countries, seems to be draining money from the stock market in the U.S. The dollar fell 1.3% against the yen Friday.

In the wake of Tuesday's initial selloff, Robert E. Weissenstein, managing director at Credit Suisse Securities LLC, said he doesn't believe the current market volatility will persist.

"I think that we'll quickly get back to the level where you want to be an owner [of shares] again," Mr. Weissenstein said.

Strategist Stuart Schweitzer of J.P. Morgan Private Bank still sees risks in the months ahead, noting that it now seems slumping housing prices could last longer than most of Wall Street had been expecting.

But he added that the stock market's recent downturn was "healthy," since it may effectively head off the need for a sharp downturn later.

"You've had a lot of people expecting the market to correct at some point along the way, but they've been afraid to sell because the market looked like it was on a one-way stairway to heaven," Mr. Schweitzer said.

In U.S. market action Friday:

Stocks fell; bonds rose. The 10-year note gained 11/32 point, or $3.44 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.515%. The 30-year bond rose 15/32 to yield 4.651%.

The dollar weakened, to 116.85 yen, from 117.59 yen. The euro rose to $1.3194 from $1.3186.

Dow Ends Its Worst Week Since 2003 (WP)

By Tomoeh Murakami Tse

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

NEW YORK, March 2 -- The Dow Jones industrial average ended its worst weekly performance in four years Friday, as technology stocks sank and the yen continued to rally against the dollar.

The Dow shed 120.24, or 1 percent, to close at 12,114.10. For the week, the Dow was down 4.2 percent. The tech-heavy Nasdaq composite index fell 36.21. to close at 2368, down 5.9 percent for the week. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index retreated 16 points, to 1387.17, and was down 4.4 percent for the week. Year-to-date gains for all three indicators evaporated.

"There's a growing sense of anxiety that there are more shoes to drop," said Stuart Schweitzer, global markets strategist at J.P. Morgan Private Bank. "I don't think it'll be over until there's more pain."

Heightened concerns about high-risk subprime mortgages added to the market's jitters, with federal bank regulators calling on lenders to exercise caution when making the loans.

The Dow seesawed mostly in negative territory throughout the day. Then, in late trading, it dropped another 50 points as traders tried to close out positions for the week. Although the final session of the week can often result in high trading volume, far fewer shares changed hands yesterday as the market searched for a bottom and money managers warned investors not to panic. Declining issues outnumbered gainers by 3 to 1 on the New York Stock Exchange.

DOJ_NMG_0140361

The biggest losers included high-profile tech stocks, with Cisco Systems and Intel down substantially. Among the winners were some pharmaceutical stocks, including Merck, and American International Group, which announced a buyback of up to $8 billion in shares.

Some consumer staples and utilities showed strength, but three trading sessions after the Dow's 400-point plunge, the markets remained volatile.

Yields on U.S. bonds fell yesterday, although not to the levels seen after the market's decline Tuesday. The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note, which moves inversely to price, fell to 4.50 percent from 4.55 percent Thursday.

Gold fell 3.1 percent, to $641.50, for its biggest one-day loss in almost five months.

"You'd expect it to be higher," said Marc Chandler, head of foreign currency strategy at the banking firm Brown Brothers Harriman. "This is like the million-dollar question."

Traders and analysts said they were watching the yen as it continued its rally against the dollar. The yen closed at 116.75 to the dollar, compared with 117.58 Thursday. Against other major currencies, the dollar was mixed.

The ascent of the Japanese currency is worrisome because it suggests that investors who have been borrowing yen to invest in riskier, higher-yielding assets elsewhere in a flush market were reversing their bets. That could hurt the availability of capital worldwide.

"The pendulum had swung to greed for a long time, and now it's swinging back," Chandler said.Movers

American International Group rose $2.13, to $69.54, after announcing stock repurchasing plans and higher dividends.

Merck, which got a mixed verdict in a trial over its arthritis drug Vioxx, was up 20 cents, to $44.19.

Home Depot declined 44 cents, to $39.01, continuing a two-week slide.

Gap fell 63 cents, to $18.40, after announcing that its annual forecast was below analysts' estimates.

Stocks Post Worst Week In Over 4 Years (AP)

By Tim Paradis

AP, March 2, 2007

NEW YORK (AP) - Stocks stumbled in the final session of a tumultuous week Friday as the yen rallied against the dollar and concerns about the U.S. economy still dogged investors after Tuesday's huge drop. The Dow Jones industrials logged their worst weekly performance in more than four years.

The Dow, as it had Thursday, poked tentatively into positive territory Friday before retreating as the yen furthered its gains and investors failed to shake their unease.

Larger economic concerns such as the ascendent yen have dominated Wall Street for much of the week after Tuesday's worldwide selloff that sent the Dow down 416 points and rattled investor confidence about the state of the U.S. economy.

Neil Massa, senior trader at MFC Global Investment Management, said stocks wobbled Friday after the yen broke through a key resistance level of 116.80. The dollar fell 0.92 percent to 116.86 yen.

Concerns lingered about a decline in the yen carry trade, which refers to the process of borrowing yen to acquire assets with greater yields in other currencies. A slowdown could hurt liquidity worldwide. Concerns about Japanese interest rates also weighed on investors.

A well-received profit report from American International Group Inc. (AIG) kept the Dow industrials from falling further Friday; the insurer and pharmaceutical company Merck & Co. (MRK) were the only two advancers among the index's 30 stocks. Merck, which received a mixed verdict Friday in a trial over its former painkiller Vioxx, finished up 20 cents at $44.19.

The Dow fell 120.24, or 0.98 percent, to 12,114.10. The Dow has fallen seven of the last eight sessions.

Broader stock indicators also fell. The Standard & Poor's 500 index fell 16.00, or 1.14 percent, to 1,387.17 and the Nasdaq composite index slid 36.21, or 1.51 percent, to 2,368.00.

For the week, the Dow fell 3.3 percent, the S&P 500 lost 4.4 percent and the Nasdaq fell 5.9 percent. For the Dow and the S&P 500, it was their biggest weekly point drop since the week ended July 19, 2002. And for the Nasdaq, it was the poorest weekly showing since the week ended Sept. 21, 2001, the first week of trading after the 9/11 terror attacks.

Bond prices rose sharply as economic concerns lingered and raised hopes for an interest rate cut. The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note fell to 4.51 percent from 4.55 percent late Thursday. The dollar was mixed against other major currencies, while gold prices fell sharply.

Light, sweet crude settled down 36 cents to $61.64 per barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange after settling at a more than two month high Thursday.

"I think looking at the world economies as a whole it just seems like growth is slowing across the board, or at least that's the impression," Massa said.

DOJ_NMG_0140362

Diane Dercher, chief economist at Waddell & Reed, said investors are trying to sort through the myriad signals the markets have given off this week.

"Fundamentally, I don't think a lot has changed this week and I think it's been more of a psychological re-evaluation of risk and a lot of this is focused around what's happened in the Asian markets," she said.

"There is a renewed focus on how weak the economy is going to be and the data that we've gotten this week have been very mixed and that just adds to confusion," Dercher said.

With Friday offering little of the economic data that had at turns boosted and deflated sentiment during the week, investors again looked abroad for direction. Performance of overseas markets has taken on renewed importance this week after a nearly 9 percent drop in the Shanghai Composite Index helped touch off the worldwide selling and sent U.S. stocks reeling. The major U.S. indexes each lost more than 3 percent Tuesday, erasing $632 billion in shareholder equity, according to S&P.

The pullback in stocks came after an enviable run-up. The stock market had gone more than 45 months without a drop of more than 2 percent in a single session - until Tuesday, when concerns the economy would slow and dent corporate profits came to a boil.

Fed Chief Ben Bernanke told Congress during the week that a single event didn't trigger Tuesday's slide, which was the biggest point drop in the Dow since trading resumed following the Sept. 11 attacks. While the drop brought many tense moments for investors, many observers said stocks were overvalued and were due to consolidate.

On Friday, St. Louis Federal Reserve President William Poole told reporters in Santiago, Chile, the week's pullback didn't appear to be "a huge issue," according to wire service reports.

With trading Friday less frenetic than in previous days, investors had some time to parse individual stocks as they looked for bargains.

AIG's fourth-quarter profit rose sharply from a year earlier when the world's largest insurer spent $1.64 billion to settle charges over its accounting practices. Profits were slightly below Wall Street's forecast though investors were likely pleased by the company's announcement it would repurchase $5 billion in stock in 2007. The company also is targeting a 20 percent annual increase in its dividend. AIG rose $2.13, or 3.2 percent, to $69.54.

Dell Inc. (DELL) rose 17 cents to $23.18 after the computer maker's profit fell 33 percent amid weak laptop sales. While revenue fell more than expected, the overall results weren't as sour as some investors had feared.

Gap Inc. (GPS) fell 63 cents, or 3.3 percent, to $18.40 after the company's fourth-quarter earnings dropped 35 percent amid problems that include its newest chain, which the company plans to close.

Subprime lenders fell again Friday as investors remained concerned about soured loans. New Century Financial Corp. (NEW) warned it would restate financial results for three quarters last year to fix accounting errors for losses related to bad loans. New Century fell $1.20, or 7.6 percent, to $14.65.

Declining issues outnumbered advancers by about 3 to 1 on the New York Stock Exchange, where consolidated volume came to 3.36 billion shares, compared with an unusually heavy 3.92 billion shares traded Thursday.

The Russell 2000 index of smaller companies fell 15.59, or 1.97 percent, to 775.44.

Overseas, Japan's Nikkei stock average closed down 1.35 percent, while the Shanghai Composite Index was up 1.23 percent and Hong Kong's Hang Seng index added 0.49 percent. Britain's FTSE 100 finished higher by less than 0.01 percent, Germany's DAX index fell 0.56 percent, and France's CAC-40 slid 0.62 percent.

The Dow Jones industrial average ended the week down 533.38, or 4.22 percent, at 12,114.10. The Standard & Poor's 500 is down 64.02, or 4.41 percent, at 1,387.17; the Nasdaq composite is down 147.10, or 5.85 percent, at 2,368.00.

The Russell 2000 index closed the week down 51.20, or 6.19 percent, to end at 775.44.

The Dow Jones Wilshire 5000 Composite Index - a free-float weighted index that measures 5,000 U.S. based companies- ended the week at 14,060.13, down 669.70 points from last week. A year ago the index was at 13,022.96.

Investors On Edge After Week Of Turmoil (FT)

By Christopher Brown-Humes, Paul J. Davies, Richard Beales

Financial Times, March 3, 2007

US stocks lost more ground on Friday after a turbulent week that saw European bourses endure their worst week for four years and Wall Street suffer its biggest one-day fall since markets reopened after the September 11 2001 terrorist attacks.

The global equity sell-off that began on Tuesday more than eradicated all this year's gains, leaving investors on edge over the outlook for next week.

"Investors had become complacent about the outlook for the global economy, especially the US, and the prices of many risky assets had been bid to unsustainably high levels," said Julian Jessop, of Capital Economics.

DOJ_NMG_0140363

The flight from risky investments triggered a surge in volatility across financial markets. It began on Tuesday when Chinese stock markets fell 9 per cent amid concerns over the health of the US economy and the subprime mortgage market.

The worries about the US subprime mortgage market were underscored on Friday by the Federal Reserve and other US financial regulators who said they were worried that some borrowers did not understand the risks of such loans.

"It's a classic risk sell-off after a very strong bull run," said Robert Buckland, chief global equity strategist at Citigroup. "Whatever has gone up the most is going down the most."

Wall Street, which suffered its steepest one-day fall in equities since 2001 on Tuesday, remained under pressure on Friday. The S&P 500 closed 1.1 per cent lower at 1,387.17, the second-worst day in a week in which the index lost 4.4 per cent. The Dow Jones Industrial Average was down 4.2 per cent on the week.

A flight to safety boosted global government bond prices, with 10-year US Treasury yields falling to 4.5 per cent from 4.67 per cent a week earlier.

The Nikkei 225 Average in Japan ended the week down 5.3 per cent and the Shanghai Composite index fell 5.6 per cent.

The yen climbed 3.5 per cent against the dollar as investors cut back "carry trade" positions, which involve borrowing in low-yielding currencies to buy higher yielding assets elsewhere.

In Europe, the FTSE Eurofirst 300 suffered its biggest weekly fall since March 2003, dropping 5.2 per cent. In London, the FTSE 100 fell 4.5 per cent to 6,116.2 – also its worst week since March 2003.

Down End To A Very Down Week (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

This week, investors heard that the economy was more vulnerable than they thought. A result was Wall Street's worst week in four years.

Share prices ended the week where they have spent seven of the last nine days: in the red.

After small but fleeting gains in the morning yesterday, the Dow Jones industrial average lost 120.24 points. The broader Standard & Poor's 500-stock index never turned positive yesterday and ended the day down about 1 percent.

The Dow fell 0.98 percent, to 12,114.10, yesterday. The S.& P. fell 16 points, to 1,387.17, and the Nasdaq fell 36.21 points, or 1.51 percent, to 2,368.00.

For the week, the Dow fell 4.2 percent, the S.& P. 500 lost 4.4 percent and the Nasdaq fell 5.9 percent.

As investors and economists look to the week ahead, they see signs of encouragement but also some uncertainty about what could happen.

Starting with a survey on the strength of the service sector on Monday and ending with the Labor Department's monthly employment report, investors will have a buffet of data to soothe or fray their nerves.

"The big question now is, Will the labor market tell us that the broader economy is O.K.?" said Julia Coronado, an economist with Barclays Capital. "Or will the labor market tell us in fact that things are weakening and we're heading down?"

One factor that investors and economists found reassuring during this week's stock slide was that the economy still appeared to be on steady footing. One reason for that was a strong job market.

If the Labor Department's figures show that employment deteriorated in February, the market could take another dive on the assumption that economic weakness is much more widespread than previously thought.

Early indications are that the report could be weaker than January's. A survey of economists by Bloomberg News forecast that the unemployment rate would remain at 4.6 percent, but that the number of jobs added would fall to 98,000, from 111,000.

During the market's headier days, a low unemployment number could have spurred an upswing. Investors have been known to cheer downbeat economic data on the chance that it could move the Federal Reserve to cut interest rates.

But with a more anxious mood on Wall Street, a surprisingly bad number is the last thing investors want.

"The market liked the idea that rates were on hold and the economy was basically not going anywhere," said Rob Carnell, chief international economist for ING Financial Markets. "It was the stability that was the really useful, positive feature for equities markets over the last few months."

The employment number is particularly telling because the health of the job market has a cascading effect on the economy, with job growth and wages directly influencing consumer spending.

Consumer spending, in turn, influences manufacturing activity and capital investment, two segments of the economy that showed signs of trouble this week.

Two other economic indicators that will also be released next week have the potential to move the markets, but to a smaller degree than the employment report.

DOJ_NMG_0140364

On Monday, the Institute for Supply Management will release its monthly survey on business activity for the service sector. Preliminary forecasts are predicting a decline from January.

And on Tuesday, the government releases revisions to its fourth-quarter data on productivity and labor costs. Productivity is expected to decline while labor costs are expected to jump.

"It's going to look very inflationary," Ms. Coronado said. "It could spook the market a bit."

Yesterday's decline heightened concerns that the sell-off might not be as temporary as many experts have said it will be. If the slump deepens next week, market experts said it would be even harder to undo as already-nervous investors pull back even further.

"People are stepping back a little bit, and they're going to be a little more careful about what decisions they make," said William Rhodes, chief investment strategist with Rhodes Analytics. "You have a good deal of uncertainty. You don't know how long it's going take this to work it's way out."

In the Treasury market, bonds rose yesterday, with the benchmark 10-year Treasury up 13/32, to 101. The yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, fell to 4.50 percent from 4.55 percent Thursday.

Jobs, Productivity Data Will Offer Nervous Investors A Lot To Chew On (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, March 3, 2007

After a week in which stocks took their wildest ride in years, in which Alan Greenspan uttered the word "recession" and in which economic data pointed in various directions, investors are understandably desperate for any decent clues as to where the U.S. economy is headed.

They might not get what they want in the coming week, but they will get something big to chew on: the government's report on February employment. The monthly estimate of how many people companies added to their payrolls is notoriously volatile and subject to revision -- just the kind of data that tend to shock investors and send markets into gyrations. Nevertheless, taken together with previous readings, the full jobs report will offer some valuable insight.

Aside from a fresh glimpse at job growth and wages -- both important drivers of consumer spending -- the report will provide a clue as to how company executives are actually feeling. That is important, because recent data have suggested they aren't too optimistic about the future. The latest report on durable goods, for example, showed companies cutting back their spending on big-ticket capital goods such as computers and machine tools -- a sign that they might not be expecting to have a lot of business to do over the next year or so.

But if executives are genuinely pessimistic, they should also be hiring fewer people. So far, that hasn't been the case.

Over the three months ended in January, nonfarm payrolls added a monthly average of 171,000 jobs, according to the government's most recent estimates. That is above the level consistent with an economy growing at its long-term, inflation-adjusted potential rate of about 3% annually.

Some economists worry that shifting weather patterns could make the February jobs number look pretty bad. That is because the Labor Department takes its payroll readings from the week that includes the 12th day of the month. That week was warm in January, but stormy and cold in February. "You could easily build houses in shirtsleeves in early January, but by the time you got to February the ground was frozen solid" in many parts of the country, says Richard Berner, chief U.S. economist at Morgan Stanley in New York. He estimates that nonfarm payrolls will add only 25,000 jobs in February.

Even if the payrolls number proves strong, though, that doesn't mean the economic outlook is rosy. Companies' hiring practices are sometimes a bit behind the times. Often they keep bringing on workers even as their markets are beginning to evaporate, and wait until things get really bad before letting people go. That is why, historically, the amount of output companies get out of each hour worked -- known as labor productivity -- has been a better harbinger of the future health of the economy than hiring.

According to the latest data available, productivity all but stopped growing in the third quarter of last year, and bounced back a bit in the fourth. But the government will revise its estimate of fourth-quarter productivity on Tuesday -- probably sharply downward, mirroring this week's downward revision of fourth-quarter economic activity. "That will not be viewed as good news," says Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at consultancy Global Insight.

Crude Edged Higher In Week, But Stock Drops Add Caution (WSJ)

By Matt Chambers

The Wall Street Journal, March 3, 2007

The crude-oil futures market, which usually has an inverse price influence on shares, is closely eyeing U.S. stocks, as traders log their concern over the damage a slowdown in U.S. and Chinese growth could do to oil demand.

DOJ_NMG_0140365

While crude-oil prices often ignore, or cause, big moves in benchmark U.S. indexes, the latest stock market jitters are related to concern about Chinese economic growth, which is estimated to have accounted for nearly 40% of increased oil demand in 2006. As a result, benchmark oil prices on the New York Mercantile Exchange have been weighed down by uncertainty over stocks and ended the week just 50 cents, or less than 1%, higher at $61.64 a barrel. This is despite refinery glitches that helped push gasoline futures up 8% in that time amid forecasts for record U.S. summer fuel demand.

"The bull market in crude was mainly due to reduced spare [oil production] capacity and more demand," a large part of which was from China, said Kyle Cooper, director of research at consulting firm IAF Advisors in Houston. "There's concern China is looking to put the brakes on the economy, and there has also been talk of the possibility of a U.S. recession."

China's influence on the global economy was in full effect Tuesday when a slump in the volatile Shanghai Composite Index resulted in a U.S. stock selloff.

Oil's relationship to the stock market is usually seen in terms of the damage higher energy costs can do to economies, with crude spikes lowering share indices and lower oil prices doing the opposite.

"Crude and stock markets don't go hand in hand, typically they diverge, but given some of the views of investors, you're getting everything down on expectations we're slowing" said Joseph Quinlan, a market strategist at Bank of America Asset Management in New York. "The view that the twin engines of growth [China and America] are decelerating is going to filter into the oil markets."

In other commodity markets:

NATURAL GAS: With the heavy usage period winding down for the heating fuel, futures prices eased. Natural gas for April delivery on Nymex settled 4.5 cents lower at $7.243 a million British thermal units.

SUGAR: Futures raced to two-month highs. Top importer Russia decided not to raise the nation's raw sugar import duty in April. May-delivery sugar at the New York Board of Trade rose 0.25 cent to 11.22 cents a pound.

Bernanke Talks On Inflation, Globalization (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, March 3, 2007

Globalization hasn't had a significant impact on reducing inflation in the U.S. and may have raised it, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said.

Nor has globalization weakened the Fed's control over interest rates, Mr. Bernanke said in remarks prepared for delivery Friday night to the Stanford Institute for Economic Policy Research in California.

Some economists have argued that globalization puts downward pressure on U.S. inflation, making the Fed's job easier. Former Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan Monday said the integration of many countries since the fall of the Soviet Union into the world economy has "brought world unit labor costs down, brought inflation down and interest rates down." But he also said that as that impact fades, long-term rates could rise by one to two percentage points world-wide in the next three to five years.

Mr. Bernanke, however, said increased trade with China has reduced U.S. inflation, now running at about 2%, by only about 0.1 percentage point. And he noted that while these emerging economies have added to the global supply of manufactured goods, they are also adding to the demand for oil and other commodities.

"There seems to be little basis for concluding that globalization overall has significantly reduced inflation in the U.S. in recent years; indeed, the opposite may be true," he said.

The Fed's outlook for inflation is influenced by spare capacity in the U.S. economy. But some economists and Fed officials have argued that because of globalization, the degree of spare capacity in the global economy also needs to be considered. While some research has found a link between global capacity and domestic inflation, Mr. Bernanke said Fed researchers have cast doubt on it.

Merck Receives A Split Verdict From New Jersey Jury In Vioxx Trial (WSJ)

By Heather Won Tesoriero

The Wall Street Journal, March 3, 2007

A New Jersey state court jury delivered a split verdict in the first phase of the latest Vioxx trial, finding that Merck & Co. adequately warned doctors of the drug's heart-attack risks in the case of one plaintiff but not of another.

The eight-person jury found that in the case of both plaintiffs the drug maker violated a state consumer-protection statute by misrepresenting the drug's cardiovascular risks in marketing.

The case of Frederick "Mike" Humeston, 61 years old, of Boise, Idaho, now will move into a second phase to determine whether or not Vioxx was a cause of his heart attack -- and what damages, if any, should be awarded.

DOJ_NMG_0140366

Mr. Humeston's case was tried previously in 2005, and Merck prevailed. New Jersey Superior Court Judge Carol Higbee later ordered a new trial after new evidence emerged.

The other plaintiff in this trial, Kathleen Messerschmidt, sued Merck over the fatal heart attack of her brother, Brian Hermans, who died on Sept. 15, 2002. The Vioxx label was changed to include further cardiovascular risk information in April 2002, making it harder to prove that Mr. Hermans was the victim of a failure on Merck's part to warn doctors. But the jury will now hear evidence to determine whether damages for consumer fraud should be awarded to Ms. Messerschmidt.

Merck withdrew Vioxx from the market in September 2004 following a study that linked the drug to an increased risk of heart attacks and stroke. The company has been hit with some 28,000 lawsuits and has said it intends to fight each case. Since the first trial in the summer of 2005, the Whitehouse Station, N.J., company has won eight trials and lost four.

Bush Helps GOP Senators Raise $2.1 Million (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

LOUISVILLE, March 2 -- President Bush headlined a fundraiser Friday for Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) and the National Republican Senatorial Committee that netted $2.1 million. Organizers called it the largest fundraiser in state history.

Speaking to a dinner crowd at the century-old Seelbach Hilton Louisville Hotel, Bush defended his decision to send more troops to Iraq. He also criticized those in Congress who oppose the plan, saying, "They have a solemn responsibility to support those who wear the uniform of the United States."

The event was the second GOP fundraiser in a week for Bush, who continues to be a major Republican draw despite his dismal approval ratings. On Monday, he spoke at a Washington event that raised $10.4 million for the Republican Governors Association.

Before coming here, Bush spoke at Silver Street Elementary School in nearby New Albany, Ind., where he urged Congress to reauthorize the No Child Left Behind education law.

The measure, which requires states to set educational standards and to hold schools accountable for meeting them, is helping to improve student achievement, he said.

"This is a piece of legislation that is vital for the country, in my judgment," Bush said. "It is working, and we ought to make sure it stays in law."

Clinton, Romney Lead Among Insiders (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

Party leaders' opinions about presidential candidates often shape the race. Deep partisan divisions remain.

Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton and Republican Mitt Romney have emerged as the leading presidential favorites among party insiders, according to a new Los Angeles Times Poll, which found deep partisan divisions over the country's direction and top issues in the 2008 campaign.

The survey showed former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina in second place among Democratic Party leaders, ahead of Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois. It pointed up danger signs for Sen. John McCain of Arizona, who trailed former Massachusetts Gov. Romney and former New York City Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, the leader among Republicans in national voter surveys.

It also signaled GOP concerns about holding the White House for another four years — 42% of party leaders said it would be tougher to elect a Republican after eight years under President Bush, and just over half said the GOP nominee should campaign on moving the country in a new direction.

"I love President Bush, I really do," Cindy S. Phillips, a Republican national committeewoman from Mississippi, said in a follow-up interview. "But you can't be the same as the person before you. You have to bring your own touch, your own ideas."

Phillips is looking hard at Giuliani.

The poll surveyed members of the Democratic and Republican national committees, the governing bodies of the two major political parties. Though relatively few, these insiders could have an important role in deciding which of their candidates face each other in November 2008, thanks to the influence many wield in their states.

"The DNC and RNC members are not just delegates" to the national nominating conventions, said Charlie Cook, a nonpartisan campaign analyst in Washington. "They are key organizers and opinion leaders. They can help build or kill a groundswell, make a candidate's challenge in a state easier or much harder. They matter a lot."

The poll also offers a different reading of sentiments than national voter surveys, which tend to be heavily influenced by name recognition at this early stage of the campaign.

A similar poll of DNC members about four years ago found significant backing for Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts as well as surprising support for Edwards and former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean — at a time when the latter two made comparatively weak showings in voter surveys. The three ended up as the top contenders for the Democratic nomination, won by Kerry.

The Times Poll, directed by Susan Pinkus, interviewed 313 of 386 DNC members and 133 of 165 RNC members from Feb. 13-26. Since the poll attempted to interview current state members of each organization rather than a random sample, there is no margin of error.

The survey found no candidate enjoying a lock on institutional support. To the contrary, more than 1 in 3 RNC members had no favorite; just under 1 in 3 DNC members had no preference.

Among Republicans, Romney had the most backing among party insiders, with 20% support, followed by Giuliani with 14%, McCain with 10% and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich of Georgia — who has said he might enter the race in the fall — with 8%.

In a potentially worrisome sign for McCain, just over 1 in 10 RNC members said they would not support him if he won the party's nomination in his second attempt.

"It shows just how much resistance there is within the Republican establishment to McCain and how open the party is to candidates who either aren't very conservative, like Giuliani, or only recently minted conservatives, like Romney," Cook said. "McCain has worked pretty hard since 2000 to be a team player, but these numbers would suggest that there is still a problem for him."

Among Democrats, Sen. Clinton of New York had the backing of 20% of party leaders, followed by Edwards with 15%, Obama with 11%, former Vice President Al Gore — who is not in the race — with 10% and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson with 9%.

Regardless of whom the insiders supported, Giuliani and Clinton were each rated their party's strongest prospective nominee with the best shot at winning the White House.

The insiders were divided over their most important criterion for backing a candidate. Just over a third of Republicans said issues were the most important factor. Nearly 4 in 10 Democrats said the most important factor was a candidate's chance of winning the White House.

The survey turned up a dramatic split over the direction of the country and the problems the presidential candidates should address.

Whereas 83% of Republicans said the country was on the right track — and all said the economy was doing well — 95% of Democrats said the country was headed the wrong way, and more than 6 in 10 said the economy was in bad shape.

Not surprisingly, partisans were also worlds apart over the war in Iraq, with the overwhelming majority of Republicans supporting Bush's policies and Democrats nearly unanimous in their opposition.

There was less agreement among Democrats over an exit strategy. Just over half of DNC members favored legislation requiring Bush to begin withdrawing U.S. troops; 17% favored the more dramatic step of cutting off funding. About 2 in 10 Democrats said Bush should not be required to withdraw troops.

Despite insiders' differences and the considerable attention the war has gotten in the campaign, particularly among Democrats, many said Iraq was unlikely to be the decisive issue in their respective party primaries. Sixty-five percent of Republicans and 50% of Democrats said the war would be an important issue in the 2008 contest, but not the most important. But 48% of Democrats said Iraq would be the most important issue.

"The Democrats, by and large, have similar positions on the war," said Terry Lierman, chairman of the Maryland Democratic Party, who is neutral in the primary. "What's going to differentiate them is a further vision and means to address everything from poverty to wages to jobs to a more equitable view of our foreign policy."

Asked the most important issue for Democrats to address, nearly 6 in 10 party insiders said healthcare, followed by Iraq. Among Republicans, about 1 in 3 said the war and reconstruction of Iraq, followed by domestic security and global terrorism. Just over 20% of Republicans cited the immigration issue as a priority, compared to 2% of Democrats.

Despite some big names lurking in the background — notably Gingrich and Gore — 85% of Republican insiders and 98% of Democrats said they were satisfied with those running.

Though Gore would make "an excellent candidate ... I think he's doing just fine where he is," said Marianne Stevens, vice chairwoman of the Maine Democratic Party, who is also uncommitted. "I'm not sure he'd want to put himself and his family through all that again."

DOJ_NMG_0140368

Among Democrats, all of the candidates — declared and prospective — enjoyed overwhelmingly favorable ratings except three: Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio, who is making his second White House bid; the Rev. Al Sharpton, who ran for president in 2004; and former Sen. Mike Gravel of Alaska. They were viewed more negatively than positively.

On the Republican side, views of the candidates were mixed. Giuliani and Romney were each viewed favorably by 83% of party leaders, and Gingrich by 78%. McCain was viewed favorably by 56% of GOP insiders and unfavorably by 38%.

Other, lesser-known GOP candidates received generally favorable ratings, with two exceptions. Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, who has sharply criticized the war, and Rep. Tom Tancredo of Colorado, an outspoken foe of the president's immigration policy, were seen more negatively than positively.

There was little difference among Democrats and Republicans over the prospect of Americans electing an African American, Latino or woman president: Strong majorities in both parties said the country was ready.

Republicans were more optimistic about the chance of electing a Mormon, which probably reflects good feelings for Romney. Nearly 8 in 10 GOP insiders said the country would elect a Mormon president, compared to 48% of Democrats.

"It could be a hassle with some people," said Phillips, the GOP's Mississippi committeewoman. "One question I did ask was how far back [in Romney's family] is the plural marriage thing. They said his great-grandfather, and I said, 'OK, that's far enough.' "

Timing, Donors Drive Long-haul Strategy For '08 (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 3, 2007

Richard M. Nixon, running for the Republican presidential nomination in 1968, refused to campaign until the last moment, filing his candidacy and driving into New Hampshire just six weeks before that state's first-in-the-nation primary.

Forty years later Pat Buchanan, a veteran of that Nixon campaign and a New Hampshire primary winner himself in 1996, still chuckles at the strategy, which was so successful it chased Mr. Nixon's opponent, George Romney, out of the race.

But Mr. Buchanan says it probably can't be repeated.

With 10 months to go before the first primary vote is cast, every serious campaign has a full operation -- promising a long, drawn-out affair that is likely to fatigue voters and the candidates themselves.

"All of this strategy is really about donors and timing, what's going to be best to raise money, rather than what's going to be best for keeping voters' interests in your campaign," said Michael McDonald, a professor at George Mason University who studies voter turnout.

With a giant set of primaries increasingly likely for Feb. 5, the 2008 nomination will depend far more on television ads, and candidates will need a large bank account to compete.

Chuck Larson, an adviser to Sen. John McCain's operation in Iowa, which traditionally holds the first caucuses, said the campaign is definitely starting earlier.

"In 1999, for example, eight years ago, we took our first trip down to meet then-Governor Bush on approximately March 3, to encourage him to run for president," Mr. Larson said. "Here we are almost eight years to the date and we have had campaigns with field staff on the ground in Iowa for nearly a year."

Still, he doubts Iowans will get fatigued, saying they enjoy their position with the first-in-the-nation caucuses.

Curtis Gans, director of the Committee for the Study of the American Electorate, said voter fatigue is a myth and when it comes time to vote, voters do their duty.

"On the elections, the major elections, when there's something to decide, people vote," he said.

Mark J. Rozell, another George Mason professor, said the problem is that political insiders already are dissecting and speculating about the campaigns, though the public isn't paying attention.

"We've had lots of polls and predictions already, and many more to come -- but we're all just talking to each other," Mr. Rozell said. "By the time the public gets seriously interested, anything important that there is to say about the candidates has already been said by leading observers."

If the campaigns seem early and intense to voters, to the campaign staffs it's only natural, said Katon Dawson, chairman of South Carolina's Republican Party.

"If anything it started late," he said. "This race is over this time next year. We have races for mayor that last seven months."

With a May 15 Republican debate scheduled for Columbia, S.C., Mr. Dawson said it's possible some candidates "may not make it off that stage."

The grind of a long campaign is exactly what kept Mr. Nixon out of New Hampshire, Mr. Buchanan said. In his losing bid for the presidency in 1960, Mr. Nixon realized he wore himself out, which he thought was part of the reason he looked so tired in the famous decisive televised debate with John F. Kennedy.

DOJ_NMG_0140369

Mr. Buchanan said Mr. Nixon told him waiting also would give the press time to beat up on his New Hampshire opponent, Mr. Romney.

"Let them chew on him for a little while," Mr. Nixon told Mr. Buchanan.

And once Mr. Nixon entered the race, he still only campaigned two or three days out of the week, spending the rest of the time recharging in Florida, using television ads to keep a presence. Mr. Romney, meanwhile, exhausted himself by doing a long series of events each day.

The strategy worked beautifully. On Feb. 28, two weeks before the primary, Mr. Romney took himself out of the running, delivering the state to Mr. Nixon.

Mr. Buchanan and Mr. McDonald both said the one potential candidate who could afford to wait this time around is former Vice President Al Gore, a Democrat.

Mr. McDonald said Republican Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former New York City mayor, also could have tried that, but he ended up jumping into the race to convince donors he is serious about running.

"The amount of money that's going to be spent in this campaign, the candidates have a real incentive to get that fundraising apparatus going," Mr. McDonald said.

Mr. Dawson said with a winner probably chosen in early February, the real difference this time around will be the long gulf between the time the nomination is settled and the nominating conventions, which will come in September.

"I can't imagine the search for a VP candidate -- that's what's going to consume some of the down time, along with fundraising and party building," he said.

Conservatives Look For A Winning Hand (WP)

By Michael D. Shear. Anne E. Kornblut

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

Lack of Candidate to Rally Around Has Key GOP Constituency Feeling Glum

Each year for more than three decades, a handful of icons of the American conservative movement have met for a friendly game of seven-card stud in a Washington hotel suite the night before the annual Conservative Political Action Conference, or CPAC.

This week, according to several participants, the mood around the poker table could hardly have been more glum.

"Nothing focuses the mind like an impending hanging," said longtime conservative fundraiser Richard A. Viguerie, paraphrasing the English essayist Samuel Johnson. "And Republicans feel an impending hanging with Hillary looming on the horizon."

The possibility of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton as president was bad enough. Even worse is the absence of a Republican candidate to rally around.

The movement's leaders "are all pretty much agreed that there is no clear conservative choice," said the game's host, David A. Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union. "Or even an unclear conservative choice."

The apprehension of Keene and his poker partners is shared not only by the more than 5,000 activists on hand as the conference began yesterday. It is mirrored across the broader constituency of the Republican Party.

Between the war in Iraq, President Bush's low approval ratings, the recent midterm defeats and a void at the top with neither the president nor the vice president in the race, several Republican strategists said the mood is drearier than it has been since 1992.

"There's a sense that the Republican brand is down and it needs to come back up again if there's going to be a chance," said John Feehery, who served as communications director for Tom DeLay when the Texan was House majority leader.

Even among White House staff members, there are frequent morbid jokes that the next occupant will be a Democrat, and there has been no mass exodus of Bush administration officials to Republican campaigns as there might have been during a more optimistic time.

Polling data, though an unreliable predictor of an election 20 months away, suggest Republicans have as good a chance of keeping the White House as losing it. Republicans are marginally ahead in many of the hypothetical head-to-head contests, suggesting that the country as a whole is divided down the middle when it comes to choosing a president.

Still, the party's mood is shaping the contest, and even leading Republicans are not overly optimistic. "I'm confident that we'll do fine," Sen. John McCain of Arizona said with uncharacteristic caution last week when asked to gauge the party's chances in the next presidential campaign cycle.

McCain, considered a front-runner for the GOP nomination, said his belief is that the country is still a "right-of-center nation, and the Republican Party is still a right-of-center party," adding, with a broad grin, that the GOP nominee can win "if the guy's not too big of a jerk."

DOJ_NMG_0140370

Other Senate Republicans dodged the question. Sen. John E. Sununu of New Hampshire said last week that he is not a good person to ask about the party's prospects next year. Sen. John W. Warner of Virginia, who has endorsed McCain, waved away a question about 2008.

"It's going to be bad," a senior aide to a Senate Republican said, "but maybe we've maxed out, and the only place to go now is up."

That sense of foreboding has helped propel several of the campaigns, particularly that of former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, who in another season might not have stood a chance among Republican voters. Now, fearing they may lose, some Republicans have said they would be willing to consider someone more moderate if that is their only chance of retaining control of the White House.

"I think there's concern because the president's numbers are down and we just came off a bad election," said Warren Tompkins, a prominent Republican operative in South Carolina who supports former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney. "People are still a little down and a little shell-shocked from what happened in the last cycle."

One force who could revive the party is Clinton, Tompkins said, if she wins the Democratic nomination. "She will awaken us and get the party out of the doldrums, especially in my world," Tompkins said, referring to the South.

Polls give that theory credence, and they also suggest that either McCain or Giuliani would have greater luck drawing away independents and Democrats in a general election than the Democratic front-runners, Clinton and Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.), would have in attracting Republicans.

A recent Washington Post-ABC News poll showed Republicans having much more negative views of the Democratic contenders, particularly Clinton, than Democrats have of the Republican candidates.

Between pep talks from conservative leaders, activists at the CPAC yesterday listened to a series of Republican candidates -- minus McCain -- who trouped before them in hopes of sparking interest from the party's most committed base of supporters and a key part of the primary electorate.

The activists do not like Giuliani's support for abortion rights, gun control and gay rights. They are suspicious of Romney's positions on social issues given his more liberal pronouncements as governor. And they are wary of McCain, who did not help himself by skipping the convention. To express their dissatisfaction, some attendees wore stickers that said "Rudy McRomney" in a circle with a slash through the words.

Giuliani and Romney commanded huge crowds, many of them college students waving signs. But Giuliani's low-key speech had less partisan red meat than did Romney's, and the crowd reacted accordingly.

Giuliani gave only a glancing mention to social issues, emphasizing instead the areas of agreement. "I don't agree with myself on everything," he joked. He talked about the need for leadership, improving education and aggressively fighting terrorism.

Romney described having "stood at the center of the battlefield" on social issues as governor. "I fought to protect our family values," he said. He promised to appoint conservative judges and carry on the fight against terrorism.

The lesser-known candidates drew smaller, but often intense, crowds. Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas fired them up with vows to oppose same-sex marriage and bring faith "back to the public square."

"I don't think these people reflect my conservative beliefs," said Kyle Bristow, 20, a sophomore at Michigan State University and a supporter of long-shot presidential candidate Tom Tancredo, a congressman from Colorado. "Conservatives will lose if we're going to nominate liberals."

Viguerie, the movement veteran, said that he is not optimistic about victory in 2008 and that he tells conservatives to focus on the long term. "I think it will be '012 or '016," he said.

In the meantime, he suggested that conservative Republicans withhold support from McCain, Giuliani and Romney -- at least for the time being. "I don't think it's worth the conservative energy right now," Viguerie said.

A Mood Of Gloom At CPAC (POL)

By Jonathan Martin

The Politico, March 3, 2007

At first blush, the state of the Vast Right-Wing Conspiracy appears to be strong. Here at the annual Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC), a few thousand students, activists, hopeful pols and professional hangers-on have descended on one of Washington's larger hotels to affirm and amplify the right-wing gospel.

But even though every conservative group from the Islamic Free Market Institute to The American Protectionist is here in force, there is considerable grumbling about the health of the movement. From conservative pioneers to up-and-coming true believers, many attendees are looking for leaders -- and they're uncertain about the current crop of presidential candidates and not even thrilled with the current occupant of the White House.

"I'm disenchanted, I'm disenfranchised, I'm just dissed," quipped David Bossie, the president of Citizens United and a tireless congressional investigator in the Clinton era.

"It's a struggle," said conservative activist and public relations specialist Mike Thompson. "Conservatives want to win, but they aren't really sure the guys at the top of the field are conservative." Reconciling purity and pragmatism is always a challenge, Thompson added, but it's especially so going into 2008 because "of the fear of the other side."

Some of the ire at the CPAC conclave is directed squarely at Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), whom many conservatives suspect talks the talk when it comes to movement ideals but harbors dangerously moderate instincts.

On Thursday, Bossie gleefully unveiled a 22-page dossier kneecapping McCain ("He's No Ronald Reagan: Why Conservatives Should Not Vote for John McCain"). But Bossie also said his beef wasn't just with the one Republican presidential aspirant – McCain -- who skipped the CPAC festivities

His McCain manifesto "may be the first, but it's not going to be the only," Bossie said by way of warning to the other GOP aspirants.

It's not just skepticism about McCain, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney that has members of the movement in a funk.

While conservatives here are appreciative of his steadfastness in the war on terror, President Bush has disappointed some on the right who had high hopes.

Bush has "made so many mistakes," said the Eagle Forum's Phyllis Schlafly. "The war is a disaster and he flubbed the [immigration] issue."

And the leading GOP contenders to succeed Bush? "They're all equally unacceptable," Schlafly said.

Comparisons with the ultimate CPAC icon, Ronald Reagan, are, of course, inevitable in this crowd. While Bush has never addressed the gathering, now in its 34th year, CPAC proudly posts on its Web site all the years that Reagan addressed the conference (12 times all told). And as veteran activists recall, the Gipper did far more than give perfunctory after-dinner remarks.

"Reagan wasn't just at the head table," said a wistful Richard Viguerie, "he walked among us." The direct mail guru said conservatives "are leaderless at this point in time."

"They no longer look to Republican leaders, whether it's President Bush or Republicans in Congress."

Conservatives, Bossie said, "are desperately looking for an heir to Reagan's mantle." And among the top three contenders, "I don't think that any of these candidates are up to that."

But it's not just the old-timers, pining for the good old days that always look better in hindsight, who have soured the mood at CPAC.

"There is no agenda," said Soren Dayton, a young consultant and blogger, complaining that GOP candidates are only offering up predictable platitudes. "You say you're pro-life, you say you'll ban gay marriage and you say you'll cut taxes."

Many of the younger bloggers here, at least those not actively working for a campaign, are in no hurry to get on board with the 2008 contenders.

"I'm for letting them fight it out for a while," said Mary Katharine Ham, who writes for the conservative TownHall.

Some GOP gurus dismiss the overlay of pessimism. Grover Norquist admits that "there's no Ronald Reagan that everybody's in love with," but he takes a more hopeful view of the rightward shifts of Romney, McCain and Giuliani.

"We have candidates going to where Reagan is," pointed out the anti-tax crusader. "That's good, that's called progress."

Conservatism would be in trouble, Norquist added, if the top candidates were saying, 'I'm not where Reagan is, and I don't want to be.' "

"There's no Rockefeller wing of the party left," he observed.

Indeed, the conservative movement has consolidated their control over the GOP and kept successive Democratic hopefuls out of the White House.

As John O'Neill, Sen. John F. Kerry's fellow Swift Boat veteran-turned-nemesis put it when I asked him about the 2004 race: "mission accomplished."

The question now is what the next mission is and who will lead it.

Romancing The Conservatives (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow, Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 3, 2007

Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney yesterday delivered a faultlessly tailored appeal to more than 1,000 grass-roots conservative activists hungry for a renewed commitment to limited government.

DOJ_NMG_0140372

Addressing the 34th annual Conservative Political Action Conference, Mr. Romney stood out from the pack of Republican presidential aspirants that included Rudolph W. Giuliani and Mike Huckabee by promising to end taxes on earnings from interest, dividends and capital gains, and to cap federal spending and veto every attempt to break that cap -- whether proposed by a Republican or Democratic Congress.

"I know how to veto. I like vetoes," Mr. Romney said.

Mr. Giuliani, the former New York City mayor who served in President Reagan's Justice Department, said the late president understood that ideas, not race or ethnicity, are what identify Americans.

Drawing nearly as much applause but not the repeated standing ovations Mr. Romney received, Mr. Giuliani said, "it's very critical to begin every discussion" of Iraq and Afghanistan with the understanding that the United States is a nation that covets peace.

"Maybe we made a mistake in calling it the 'war on terror.' It is a war [by terrorists] on us," he said.

Mr. Giuliani also told the conservatives he shared their goal of offering school choice. But he skimmed over other deep differences, telling the crowd they share some beliefs and not others, just like "your relationship, I think, with your husband, your wife, your children."

In interviews afterward, some attendees said Mr. Giuliani lost momentum when he heaped lavish praise on Abraham Lincoln.

While many conservatives regard the Civil War president as the spiritual founder of the Republican Party, others deeply resent him as a man who ruthlessly suspended constitutional rights and freedoms in order to militarily challenge the South's belief in its right to secede. Some saw similar disdain for individuals' rights in Mr. Giuliani's successful war on crime in New York City.

Mr. Giuliani took the side of the Bush administration on an issue that troubles civil libertarian conservatives, saying that "you need the tools like the Patriot Act and legal intelligence surveillance."

"Rudy thought he was addressing a Republican audience," said Mike Long, chairman of the New York State Conservative Party. "Mitt understood this is an audience of people who are conservatives first."

Mr. Romney and Mr. Giuliani consistently rank in the top tier of Republican presidential contenders, along with Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich. Mr. McCain is the only major candidate not to address CPAC, while Mr. Gingrich, who today is to give the closing speech of the three-day conference, has said he won't make a decision about running until September.

Many conservatives argue Republicans lost in last year's elections because they forgot conservative principles, particularly limited government. Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana, a key voice for limited government, said the elections were the bottom of a descent he has seen coming.

"We're no longer off course. We've run aground. Six years without a course correction was simply too much," he said.

So powerful is the anti-tax sentiment among conservatives here that Mr. Huckabee, who just recently had refused to rule out raising taxes, announced he was signing Americans for Tax Reform's Taxpayer Protection Pledge not to raise taxes.

Mr. Romney, though, made the boldest overture of the day, saying it is "time to take government apart and put it back together, but this time let's make it simpler, smarter and smaller."

Coming into the conference, conservatives were looking for a champion and Mr. Huckabee summed up the attitude of many.

"The theme might be, dude, where's my candidate?" the former Arkansas governor said. "Well, I like to think that maybe he's standing in front of you."

He urged conservatives to go beyond the powerful lures of money and name recognition in choosing whom to back.

"If celebrity and money are the criteria to be president of the United States then Paris Hilton might be our next president," Mr. Huckabee said, adding he was a consistent conservative during his more than 10 years as governor.

Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican, said he would be "the family president" who would be proudly pro-life, and also would tackle big government through a flat tax.

Holding up a copy of the tax code, he said, "This should be taken behind the barn and killed with a dull ax."

Rep. Tom Tancredo, a Colorado Republican who is also exploring a bid for president, said he was surprised by the quadrennial rush to the right for many of the leading candidates.

"For those of us who have been conservatives even before Al Gore invented the Internet, this is all mildly sort of amusing," he said.

Mr. Tancredo, a major opponent of illegal entry into the United States, concedes he probably won't win, but said he will make sure candidates address issues central to conservatism.

"The conservative movement is not supposed to choose a candidate; it's supposed to produce one," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0140373

For his part, Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican, warned that the country is facing a growing threat from China, and said the country needs to change the trade policies that have sent key defense industries overseas.

"The arsenal of democracy is being fractured and sent across the world," he said.

Romney And Giuliani Make Pitch To Conservatives (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 2 — Mitt Romney of Massachusetts and Rudolph W. Giuliani of New York are both Republican presidential candidates who have been voted into office by largely Democratic electorates. They both have a history of taking liberal positions on social issues. And both are viewed warily by conservative Republicans who are integral to the party's presidential nominating process.

Mr. Romney, the former governor of Massachusetts, and Mr. Giuliani, the former mayor of New York, sought to address those challenges on Friday with speeches to conservative advocates gathered for an annual conference in Washington.

To a certain extent, they approached the task in similar ways: by presenting themselves as devotees of Ronald Reagan who had tamed Democratic excesses in their communities. Mr. Giuliani talked about cutting crime, welfare and taxes; Mr. Romney talked of cutting taxes and the size of government.

Yet they parted company on how they dealt with the more difficult question of their positions on social issues. Mr. Romney made no mention of his past support of abortion rights and gay rights, instead focusing on his current opposition to abortion and same-sex marriage. He portrayed himself as someone who stood at the barricades as his state sought to permit same-sex marriage and to remove restrictions from abortion and stem cell research.

"I stood at the center of the battlefield on every major social issue," Mr. Romney said in a speech to the gathering, the Conservative Political Action Conference. "I fought to preserve our traditional values, and to protect the sanctity of human life. I vetoed bills. I filed new bills. I enforced a law that banned out-of-state same-sex couples from coming to Massachusetts to get married."

Mr. Giuliani made no mention of his support for gay rights, abortion rights and gun control. Instead, he suggested that he and his audience had many more agreements than disagreements.

"Ronald Reagan used to say, 'My 80 percent ally is not my 20 percent enemy,' " Mr. Giuliani said. "What he meant by that is, we don't all see eye to eye on everything. You and I have a lot of common beliefs that are the same, and we have some that are different."

"We do believe in many of the same things, I'm sure," he said. "We believe in giving freedom to people. I think the core of the Republican Party and the historic mission of the Republican Party and the Republican Party makes its greatest contribution when it's giving more freedom to people."

The third major Republican presidential contender, Senator John McCain of Arizona, skipped the event; his aides said he was raising money in California and Utah. But his absence did not shield him from attacks, albeit indirect ones. Mr. Romney invoked bills Mr. McCain had sponsored to control campaign financing and his alliance with Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts on legislation to permit some illegal immigrants to apply for citizenship, two unpopular measures in this audience.

"If I'm elected president, I will fight to repeal McCain-Feingold," Mr. Romney said, referring to the campaign spending bill.

The conference drew thousands of attendees, many of whom waited in a long line out the door for a late-afternoon appearance by Ann Coulter, the conservative author and commentator. Still, the tone of the conference was less excitement about the 2008 campaign than concern about the ideological credentials of the three leading contenders for the Republican nomination.

Mr. Giuliani arrived to a rousing reception, but the room grew silent and restless as Mr. Giuliani wandered through a speech that lasted 40 minutes. By contrast, Mr. Romney arrived to a much more subdued reception but left to rousing applause.

"The governor knocked this speech out of the park," said Paloma A. Zepeda, a marketing consultant and conservative blogger who said she came into the room with "serious doubts" about Mr. Romney, and left saying she was leaning toward supporting him. By contrast, she said, Mr. Giuliani "took a risk by coming to C.P.A.C., and he managed to not allay a single conservative fear about a Giuliani candidacy."

In perhaps an unlucky bit of scheduling, Mr. Giuliani appeared after Wayne LaPierre, the executive vice president of the National Rifle Association, who gave a blistering attack on gun laws pressed for New York City by Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, also a Republican, who was elected with Mr. Giuliani's very strong support. "Everything they do in New York City on guns smacks of hypocrisy," Mr. LaPierre said.

He made no mention of Mr. Giuliani. Mr. Giuliani did not address Mr. LaPierre's criticism.

DOJ_NMG_0140374

Mr. Giuliani focused on what has been one of his electoral strengths: his performance as mayor after the attacks on the World Trade Center. Mr. Giuliani departed from a standard criticism of President Bill Clinton by Republicans, who have faulted him for not recognizing the emerging terrorist threat after the first attack on the World Trade Center and the bombing of the U.S.S. Cole.

"I don't blame people for that," he said. " I don't think it's instructive or helpful to do that."

The problem for conservatives is that the candidates they may be more inclined to support — Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas and Mike Huckabee, the former governor of Arkansas — are generally seen as being longer-shots to winning the nomination. Mr. Huckabee got in a jab, making reference to Mr. Romney's disclosure last week that he had only recently joined the National Rifle Association. "I'm not a latecomer to the N.R.A.," Mr. Huckabee said. "I was the first governor in America to have a concealed carry permit, so don't mess with me."

GOP Candidates Preen For Conservatives (GAN)

By Chuck Raasch

Gannett, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON — Invoking Ronald Reagan at every turn, a coterie of Republican presidential contenders tried to burnish their credentials Friday before the year's largest gathering of conservative activists.

Ex-New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani and ex-Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney both received warm but not raucous audience responses as they tried to calm doubts about their commitments to conservative principles.

Before an audience of several thousand at the Conservative Political Action Conference, a somewhat subdued Giuliani avoided the social issues that separate him from many conservatives — he supports abortion and gay rights — instead concentrating on his record as a tax-cutter, budget balancer and post-9/11 leader.

Quoting Reagan, Giuliani said "an 80% friend is not your 20% enemy." Invoking Reagan's optimism and applying it to the war on terrorism, he said victory was inevitable — if difficult — because "the human soul and the human heart is moving in our direction."

"We will get there the way Ronald Reagan got us there — peace through strength," Giuliani said, using another Reagan line.

Touching a conservative nerve, Romney said he'd appoint judges who would strictly interpret laws.

"It is the people who are sovereign in America, not a few folks in black robes," Romney said.

He explained his conversion from a pro-abortion rights Senate candidate in 1994 into an anti-abortion, anti-gay marriage position as the result of his being thrust in the middle of embryonic stem cell and the gay-marriage debates while he was governor of Massachusetts

"He gave a good, bullet point-like speech demonstrating how he beat back liberalism in Massachusetts while giving conservatives a lot to look forward to in a Romney administration," said veteran conservative strategist Greg Mueller, who had not yet endorsed a candidate.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., decided to bypass the conference, which some activists said could hurt him. Romney had the most direct attack on McCain, calling for repeal of the 2002 campaign finance reform measures McCain sponsored with liberal Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis.

Several lesser-known candidates may have helped themselves, in the process taking veiled swipes at what they see as election-year conversions by Romney and Giuliani.

Mueller said Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., did well defending "true-blue, unapologetic conservatism."

Ex-Gov. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas, who shares Bill Clinton's hometown of Hope, Ark., was applauded as he sought to portray himself as a lifelong conservative who believed in the Reaganesque "faith, family and freedom."

"This country is strong because there is a culture of life," Huckabee said.

Huckabee called abortion a "principled" and "defining" issue and said he was "troubled" by people who claim to be opposed to abortion but do not want to outlaw it. While Giuliani has not changed his support of abortion rights, he recently said in South Carolina that he would appoint "strict constructionists" — code words for conservative judges — if elected president.

Brownback said the Supreme Court is "one vote away from overturning Roe vs. Wade," and drew loud applause when he proclaimed that "there is not a fundamental right to abortion" in the Constitution.

Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., a staunch illegal immigration opponent and self-described "huge long shot" candidate, by inference mocked Giuliani and Romney.

"Conversions are supposed to be made on the road to Damascus, not on the road to Des Moines," he said.

GOP Candidates Woo Key Conservatives (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0140375

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

Giuliani and Romney draw large crowds while Ann Coulter's remarks prove to be the most controversial.

WASHINGTON — Republican presidential contenders Rudolph W. Giuliani and Mitt Romney made their case to influential conservatives Friday, positioning themselves as allies to the gathering despite mixed records on such high-profile social issues as abortion, gay marriage and stem cell research.

Romney, the former Massachusetts governor, and Giuliani, the former New York mayor who has staked out an early lead in polls of the GOP rank-and-file, each drew overflow crowds of several thousand at the annual meeting of the Conservative Political Action Conference.

Also addressing the crowd, but attracting less attention, were four GOP candidates with more solid conservative credentials but lesser national identities — Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, Rep. Duncan Hunter of El Cajon, and Rep. Tom Tancredo of Colorado.

Noticeably absent was Sen. John McCain of Arizona, who in his second bid for the Republican presidential nomination has sought to overcome opposition from the party's conservative base that helped doom his campaign in 2000. But McCain has made little discernible headway among the activists at Friday's event and he skipped it to campaign in Utah and his home state.

The conference is sponsored by the American Conservative Union and dozens of other like-minded organizations, and it provides an opportunity for power brokers based in Washington and conservative leaders elsewhere in the country to compare notes and plot strategy.

Giuliani pitched himself as a fiscal conservative who in New York cut taxes, reduced crime and thinned out welfare rolls — and would do the same at the national level. He defended the Bush administration for launching the war in Iraq, conducting a controversial domestic spying program and enacting the Patriot Act, saying that the U.S. needs to remain "on the offensive" in fighting terrorism.

Giuliani did not disavow his support for abortion rights, gay rights and gun control — issues he did not mention in his speech. But in a clear reference to his stands, he called for conservatives to embrace President Reagan's brand of big-tent Republican politics.

"We don't all agree all the time," Giuliani told his audience. "But the point of a presidential election is to decide who you believe the most."

He received sporadic applause during his remarks. Romney, who spoke several hours later, provoked a more enthusiastic response.

Romney criticized McCain by name, taking the senator to task for his efforts to rewrite campaign finance laws and immigration policy — comments that brought applause.

The former governor did not mention Giuliani. But in a possible effort to contrast himself with the former mayor, who has been married three times, Romney invited his wife, Ann, to join him at the podium. She made a point of noting that they will celebrate their 38th wedding anniversary this month and that they have five sons and 10 grandchildren.

Romney's efforts to court support from conservatives has been hampered by criticism that he has only recently embraced their positions on various social causes after airing more liberal views while seeking office in Massachusetts. For instance, in a failed 1994 Senate race, he stressed his support for gay rights. And he has acknowledged that he has changed his view on abortion, opposing it after previously taking a pro-choice position.

On Friday, he detailed his efforts to fight gay marriage and stem cell research during his four years as governor.

"I stood at the center of the battlefield on every major social issue, and I defended the sanctity of human life," Romney said, prompting a standing ovation.

Some of those at the conference said they remain unconvinced that Romney or Giuliani would stay true to conservative causes if either won the White House.

"People are tired of seeing people coming in right and turning left," said the Rev. LeRoy Thomas, chaplain for the National Black Republican Assn. He supports Brownback.

But David Bellows, an instructor at the Rev. Jerry Falwell's Liberty University in Lynchburg, Va., said many conservatives would be willing to compromise on candidates who do not agree with them on every issue but share their general values. "We need to … concentrate on whether they are conservative in their values, not necessarily whether they are antiabortion or not, " he said.

Some who arrived at the conference undecided left with Romney campaign signs, including Margo Saule, 65, a horse breeder from Charlottesville, Va.

Saule called Romney's speech "straightforward," saying "I liked his convictions."

As for his recent change on abortion, Saule said it did not bother her.

"People change their minds," she said. "I don't think he changed his opinions to become more electable."

Others said that Giuliani would do a better job of protecting the country from terrorism, and that his track record on national security trumped his liberal leanings on social issues.

"He's great on protecting us from terror, bringing down crime and taxes," said June Nichols, 70, a consultant from Merritt Island, Fla.

The day's most controversial speaker proved to be conservative pundit Ann Coulter, who at the end of her speech — which followed Romney's — used a slur to refer to Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards.

Coulter said she had intended to comment on the former senator from North Carolina, "but it turns out you have to go into rehab if you use the word 'faggot,' so I … can't really talk about Edwards."

The Democratic National Committee chairman, Howard Dean, quickly issued a statement calling on the GOP presidential candidates at the conference to "denounce her hateful remarks."

A Giuliani spokeswoman said she had not heard the speech, and a Romney spokesman did not return calls late Friday.

Tancredo Demos Stump Speech (DENP)

By Ann C. Mulkern

Denver Post, March 3, 2007

Washington -- The next president must possess core conservative principles or risk losing the election and much of what America stands for, Rep. Tom Tancredo told a cheering crowd today at a conservative convention.

The Littleton Republican who is considering a presidential run presented his political vision in a speech to the Conservative Political Action Conference.

In a packed and cheering ballroom, Tancredo said it's imperative to crack down on illegal immigration and reject "the cult of multi-culturalism" that he says is destroying American values. Tancredo also declared the need to return to traditional conservative ideals, including opposition to legalized abortion.

"With the world at war, and the very survival of Western Civilization at risk, with the Supreme Court potentially one death or retirement away from reversing Roe Vs. Wade," Tancredo said, referencing the case that legalized abortion, "real conservatives cannot afford to sit this one out."

Tancredo was one of several potential and declared presidential candidates appearing at the conference, an annual Washington D.C. gathering of the right wing of the Republican Party. In presidential election season, it serves as an audition for candidates wanting to capture conservative activists and impress the national media with their ability to draw crowds.

Tancredo has formed a presidential exploratory committee, saying he sees the need for a true conservative in the race. He touted his conservative credentials and used three Biblical references during his speech.

Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., and Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., also spoke.

Conservative Political Action Conference members will take a straw poll Saturday indicating which candidates they most support.

Walking on to the stage to the strains of the theme from the movie "Rocky," Tancredo said he's a "huge long shot" and compared himself to the hero of the Oscar-winning boxing movie.

Tancredo alternately spoke about his potential to win the presidency, saying he knows it's David vs. Goliath, but that "David won." But he also seemed to concede he won't advance when he said he wants "a candidate in this presidential election that I can vote for."

"I'm so tired of voting because the person is the lesser of two evils," Tancredo said. "I want to be able to vote for somebody &I believe is leading a crusade, somebody who I actually want to participate in that crusade because they inspire me to do so.

"I may not be that person, I understand," Tancredo said. "But look for that in whoever it is you're going to support."

Some Tancredo supporters at the event said they believe he can win the nomination, despite the fact that lead candidates are raising an estimated million dollars a week. Tancredo's congressional bank account had $189,000 when he made the last required disclosure at the end of 2006.

"I absolutely think he can get elected," said Nathan Rager, 21, of Virginia. "He's the most well-known conservative in this race."

According to Rager, Former New York Mayor Rudy Guiliani has a liberal record. Romney's record on conservative issues isn't consistent, he said. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., "is just an amnesty supporter," he said, referring to McCain's support of a legal status for illegal immigrants.

Republican K.C. McAlpin of Virginia didn't vote for President Bush in either 2000 or 2004, choosing instead an independent candidate. He wouldn't say whom. He said he'll do so again rather than vote for McCain, Romney or Guiliani.

Tancredo, McAlpin said "is an authentic conservative."

DOJ_NMG_0140377

Romney supporter Ruth Malhotra, 23, of Georgia, however, said while Tancredo's done a "amazing work" on the immigration issue, he's "not presidential material.

"When you're looking at someone to lead our country, you need a strong record of leadership, more broadly defined," Malhotra said. "I don't think Tom Tancredo is the best person to lead our country."

During his speech, Tancredo demonstrated his fondness for controversy. He repeated his tempest-provoking remark made last year that Miami is like a Third World Country. He talked about the letter he received from then-Florida Gov. Jeb Bush. In that letter, Bush said Florida people celebrated diversity.

"I'm all for celebrating diversity," Tancredo told the crowd. "When you make a state religion out of it, that's when you have a problem."

He said that the country needs a leader who knows we need a strong national defense "because our enemies are psychopaths and our allies are the French."

When comparing himself to the fictional Rocky character, Tancredo joked that one of the differences between himself and Sylvester Stallone was that "probably Sylvester Stallone does not smoke cigars. But I do."

The crowd erupted in large cheers and hoots. Last month, a Capitol police officer came to Tancredo's congressional office after a neighbor smelled smoke and called police. Tancredo was smoking a cigar, which is legal in lawmakers' offices.

"Although we are in the middle of a place that's run by what I refer to as the lifestyle Nazis here in Washington D.C., that don't let you do things like smoke in public places, in my office in the capitol anyway, the smoking lap is lit, even if my next door neighbor doesn't like it."

Ann Coulter Calls John Edwards "Faggot" (UPI)

UPI, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 2 (UPI) -- Best-selling right-wing author Ann Coulter, speaking to a conservative audience in Washington Friday, called former Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C., a "faggot."

Coulter was a featured speaker at the 34th annual Conservative Political Action Conference. Following her prepared remarks, televised on C-Span, Coulter was asked to talk about Edwards.

"It turns out you have to go into rehab if you use the word 'faggot,' so I'm kind of at an impasse -- I can't really talk about Edwards," she said.

"Rehab" may have been a reference to "Grey's Anatomy" star Isaiah Washington's decision to go into rehab during a public relations firestorm after he called one of his co-stars a "faggot."

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean called on Republican presidential candidates, especially those who attended the conference, to denounce Coulter's remark, Fox News reported.

Coulter has previously suggested that other prominent Democrats are gay -- including former Vice President Al Gore, former President Bill Clinton and Sen. Hillary Clinton, Editor & Publisher reported. All of them, including Edwards, are married, and Bill Clinton's heterosexual tendencies caused a certain amount of well publicized trouble for him as in the White House.

But Did Ginger Rogers Wear Flip-Flops? (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

"It's an honor to be here in high heels, walking backwards," Mitt Romney said yesterday as he began his address to the Conservative Political Action Conference.

Don't panic, Phyllis Schlafly: He was merely referring to a previous speaker's invocation of an old joke. But for a guy trying to win over religious conservatives, it was a strange opening line.

If the former Massachusetts governor is going to win the Republican presidential nomination, he is going to have to overcome suspicions that he is a supporter of alternative lifestyles and other things that rile the right -- and a discussion of women's footwear may not be the way to do it.

Outside the ballroom at the Omni Shoreham, a man was strolling about in a dolphin costume and a T-shirt declaring "Flip Romney: Just another Flip Flopper From Massachusetts." The porpoise was ready to burst his blowhole: "First he was pro-choice, now magically he's pro-life. First he's for gun control, then he's against it."

Other CPAC attendees handed out full-size yellow Romney flip-flops announcing, "1992: Romney voted for Democrat Paul Tsongas for president." On each chair was a "Romney multiple-choice exam" about gun control, taxes, abortion and gay rights; the answer to each question was "both A and B." Another flier juxtaposed Romney's photo with John Kerry's, warning that Romney "told Planned Parenthood he supports Roe v Wade!"

DOJ_NMG_0140378

For Romney, it showed a measure of bravery just coming to CPAC. John McCain skipped the event, and Rudy Giuliani gave a timid speech that avoided abortion and gay rights. CPAC is, after all, not a place to showcase diverse viewpoints.

In the session preceding Romney, Rep. Sam Johnson (R-Tex.) said of Cindy Sheehan, whose son died in Iraq: "She's an idiot." In the session after Romney, Ann Coulter used an anti-gay slur to describe John Edwards (the line drew applause) and asked: "Did Al Gore actually swallow Michael Moore?" When a questioner asked Coulter why she praises marriage but broke off so many engagements, she responded by calling the questioner ugly.

Sen. Jim Inhofe (R-Okla.) got the crowd cheering early in the day. "I have been called -- my kids are all aware of this -- dumb, crazy man, science abuser, Holocaust denier, villain of the month, hate-filled, warmonger, Neanderthal, Genghis Khan and Attila the Hun," he announced. "And I can just tell you that I wear some of those titles proudly."

Inhofe repeated his view that man-made global warming is "the greatest hoax ever perpetrated on the American people," and he quarreled with a Bush administration proposal to list polar bears as a threatened species. "They're overpopulated," he declared. "Don't worry about it: The polar bear is fine." His staff handed out supporting documentation, including the claim that "MARS HAS GLOBAL WARMING DESPITE ABSENCE OF SUVs."

Still, even the CPAC faithful know that the true conservatives in the GOP presidential race, figures such as Rep. Duncan Hunter (Calif.), have little chance of prevailing. Attendees here were, instead, talking about the least bad options among the major contenders: McCain, Giuliani and Romney.

That explains why, of more than 5,000 CPAC attendees, only 336 were on hand to hear Hunter deliver a speech proposing a wall across the Mexican border. By contrast, 1,500 people jammed the room to hear Romney. Several hundred more had to watch on televisions in the hallway. "Note rapturous crowd applause," Romney's lawyer, Ben Ginsburg, instructed a reporter. There were, in fact, several red "Mitt" mitts and blue Romney signs among the attendees.

The governor got off to a bad start when anti-tax activist Grover Norquist, assigned to introduce Romney, couldn't be located. "Grover apparently made a pit stop," the master of ceremonies announced. The pit stop went on for five minutes, forcing organizers to entertain the crowd with video titled "The Hillary Show" by the anti-Clinton Web site Stophernow.com.

Norquist said that the difficulty of being a conservative in Massachusetts made Romney like Ginger Rogers in the old joke: She "did everything Fred Astaire did, except backwards and in high heels."

The handsome Romney had a smooth delivery, but he looked mechanical as he used the teleprompter, which apparently malfunctioned while he was trying to quote Ronald Reagan. "I'll make sure I get it here right," he said, as he reached for his notes.

The governor began his discussion, sensibly, with economic policy, where his conservative credentials are not questioned. But he didn't quite have his message ready for a bumper sticker. "If I am elected president, I am going to cap non-defense discretionary spending at inflation minus 1 percent!" he vowed.

It was time for the social issues, and Romney wasn't holding back. "I stood at the center of the battlefield on every major social issue," said the man who once vowed to best Ted Kennedy in support of gay rights. "I fought to preserve our traditional values and to protect the sanctity of human life."

"This isn't the time for us to shrink from conservative principles," Romney said before he departed. Indeed, for Romney, it is the time to adopt them.

The speech didn't sway Flip the dolphin, who continued his rounds. But Romney had, at least, won over Coulter. "I think he's probably our best candidate," she said. She'd prefer Duncan Hunter, she said, but "I'm being realistic." And, besides, "I love Mormons," Coulter said. "In 1992, Bill Clinton came in third in Utah."

McCain Wins Spartanburg Straw Poll (CNN)

By Alexander Mooney

CNN.com, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Arizona Sen. John McCain won a Spartanburg, South Carolina straw poll Friday, an early sign of how conservative South Carolinians might view the GOP presidential field.

McCain beat former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani by two votes, 164-162, according to Spartanburg County GOP chairman Rick Beltram. California Rep. Duncan Hunter came in third with 158 votes.

A total of 776 people voted in the straw poll.

McCain Wins GOP Presidential Straw Poll (TSSC)

The State, March 3, 2007

U.S. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., won the Spartanburg County Republican Party presidential straw poll on the second day of vote counting.

McCain was third when tallying was suspended Thursday. But by Friday afternoon, McCain had leapt into first in the final vote, according to The Associated Press.

The final results were: McCain, 164; former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, 162; U.S. Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., 158; U.S. Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., 85; former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, 80; and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, 21.

Noticeably Absent From The Giuliani Campaign: His Children (NYT)

By Russ Buettner, Richard Pérez-Peña

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

As he embarks on a campaign for the presidency, former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani is going forward without two people who once played supporting roles in his political life: his children, Andrew, 21, and Caroline, 17.

Andrew Giuliani has been at his father's side in campaign commercials and inaugurations since he was a toddler, famously bounding across the stage in a rambunctious manner and mimicking his father's rhetorical flourishes during Mr. Giuliani's 1994 mayoral inauguration.

But Mr. Giuliani's relationship with Andrew has grown strained and distant since his very public and bitter divorce from Andrew's mother, Donna Hanover, and his marriage to Judith Nathan, according to Andrew and others familiar with the relationship.

In a telephone interview yesterday, Andrew, a sophomore and member of the golf team at Duke University, acknowledged having had difficulties with Ms. Nathan, and said that he and his father had recently tried to reconcile after not speaking "for a decent amount of time."

"There's obviously a little problem that exists between me and his wife," the younger Mr. Giuliani said. "And we're trying to figure that out. But as of right now it's not working as well as we would like."

Andrew Giuliani said he would not participate in his father's campaign, saying his devotion to becoming a professional golfer within three years allows no time for distraction.

While he would not say how long he had been estranged from his father, others close to the family said it appeared to have been for at least a year.

Similarly, a distance appears to have developed between Mr. Giuliani and his daughter, now a high school senior who is to attend Harvard University in September.

The familial tensions come as Mr. Giuliani prepares to run for president and as other Republican contenders deploy their children as campaign assets.

Mr. Giuliani's three marriages have already bubbled up as an issue. In February, Ann Romney, the wife of Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts governor, noted that her husband "had only one wife" — comparing him to other leading Republican candidates who had gone through divorces.

Some campaign Web sites highlight pictures of candidates with family members, but Mr. Giuliani's does not mention his children, though it includes photographs and mentions of Ms. Nathan.

The Giuliani campaign declined to comment about the former mayor's relationship with his children, and Ms. Hanover did not respond to messages left at her home and office.

Mr. Giuliani once prided himself on attending all his children's events and went to Andrew's high school football games and Caroline's plays. But he stopped at some point after his marriage to Ms. Nathan in 2003. He missed his son's graduation, in 2005, and his daughter's plays in the last 18 months, said people who attended those events.

In the interview, Andrew Giuliani spoke of his father's campaign, aware that he would have to address his absence. He said the decision not to participate hinged on his goal of becoming a professional golfer.

"I am going to be focused on my golf for the next, well really I don't even know for the next how long, but definitely over the next bunch of years," he said. "So I'm not going to have time to, even if I wanted to, be in the campaign."

He said that he and his father had recently begun trying to reconcile. "For a while there, we weren't talking, for a decent amount of time," Andrew said. "But lately we've been having more contact and trying to figure things out."

In 1989, Ms. Hanover and Andrew, then 3, were at Mr. Giuliani's side when he declared his mayoral candidacy. Caroline appeared with the family in campaign commercials after her birth in August that year.

When Mr. Giuliani ran in 1993, he and Andrew were featured playing baseball; Caroline appeared in a commercial blowing soap bubbles.

Clintons, Obama Hope To Woo Black Support In Selma (CNN)

By Mary Snow

CNN.com, March 2, 2007

NEW YORK (CNN) -- As they battle for support in the black community in their quest for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama will attend Sunday's commemoration of the historic 1965 Selma voting rights march.

However, Clinton will bring along a not-so-secret weapon -- her husband, former President Bill Clinton.

"There is no white politician in America who is more popular in the African-American community than Bill Clinton," said Jamal Simmons, a Democratic strategist. "So she has a very strong card to play."

The results of one recent poll suggest that card is one she may need. (Watch how the former president can help Sen. Clinton)

An ABC News-Washington Post survey, taken late last week, found that Obama, from Illinois, was the choice of 44 percent of black Democrats, compared to 33 percent for Hillary Clinton, with a sampling error of plus or minus 8 percentage points. That was a marked shift from the beginning of the year, when she led Obama 60 percent to 20 percent. (Full story)

However, the poll found that the New York senator's favorable rating among black voters was 85 percent, compared to 70 percent for Obama, although his favorability has climbed 16 points since the beginning of the year.

Rep. John Lewis, D-Georgia, one of the leaders of the Selma march 42 years ago, said the competition for black voters between the senators is "a very difficult position to be in, but it's a good position to be in."

"We have choices," he said.

Simmons said that while black voters have a great deal of loyalty for Bill Clinton, "the question is whether that loyalty transfers to Hillary Clinton, and that's really the test she'll have to meet."

On Sunday in Selma, the former president will be inducted into the Voting Rights Hall of Fame. It will be the first major public appearance the Clintons have made together since Hillary Clinton announced in January that she would seek the Democratic nomination, and political observers will be looking keenly at how well she fares alongside her husband.

"There is, of course, something of a risk that when the Clintons appear next to one another, sometimes Bill can outshine her, and his connection to the community," said political analyst Stu Rothenberg of The Rothenberg Political Report.

Selma March Raises Political Stakes For Obama, Clinton (GAN)

By Ana Radelat

Gannett, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON — When Democratic presidential candidates Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama march over the Edmund Pettus Bridge in Selma, Ala., on Sunday, their political fortunes may rise or fall with each step.

Clinton, who represents New York in the Senate, and Obama, who represents Illinois, are heading South to woo black voters who could decide key early primaries next year.

"It's smart politics," said Ron Haskins, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution. "(Selma) is sacred civil rights ground."

Both candidates say they want to honor the memory of the historic 1965 march that captured the nation's attention and sped approval of the Voting Rights Act. Both will give speeches at historic black churches in Selma before they make their way across the bridge.

"This is an opportunity for her to show her respect for what was accomplished in Selma and the civil rights movement," said Mo Elleithee, spokesman for the Clinton campaign.

Jen Psaki, spokeswoman for the Obama campaign, said the senator — who was 3 years old when the historic march took place — wanted to make a "personal trip" to the famed civil rights site.

"His hope is that this is not something that is overly politicized," Psaki said.

DOJ_NMG_0140381

But after polls this week showed Obama gaining popularity in the African-American community, Clinton raised the stakes by announcing that her husband, former President Bill Clinton, will march with her.

Bill and Hillary Clinton have strong support among African Americans, support they want to keep, Haskins said, while Obama is still in the process of introducing himself to that key Democratic constituency.

"Polls seem to show that when African Americans realize he's black, his support shoots up," Haskins said.

Both candidates hope their words this weekend are heard by black voters in South Carolina, which will hold the first-in-the-South Democratic presidential primary Jan. 29, one week after the New Hampshire primary. Nearly half the voters in the South Carolina primary will be black.

Alabama, another state with large numbers of black Democratic primary voters, also hopes to move its primary election from June to early February so it would be held on the heels of the South Carolina contest.

The rivalry between Hillary Clinton and Obama for black voters has put some black leaders in a difficult position because they are uncomfortable endorsing a presidential candidate this early in the political season.

Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., an original participant in the 1965 march who was beaten while trying to cross the Edmund Pettus Bridge, has repeatedly invited his congressional colleagues to join him in retracing his steps on the anniversary of the march. Lewis has declined to endorse either Hillary Clinton or Obama.

"This is not a political venture," said Brenda Jones, Lewis' press secretary. "For congressman Lewis, it is a spiritual experience."

Rep. James Clyburn, the black South Carolina lawmaker who is considered a king maker in his state's Democratic presidential primary election, also has refrained from backing either candidate.

But Rep. Artur Davis, D-Birmingham, who represents Selma in Congress, was among the first lawmakers to embrace Obama's candidacy.

Davis, who urged Obama to travel to Selma, has said the senator's candidacy would "ignite a feeling of national purpose and renewal that our country has not witnessed in my lifetime."

Clinton Donor Wanted By FBI In Scheme To Funnel Money (LAT)

By Robin Fields, Chuck Neubauer

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

The businessman, influential in Pakistani circles, also aided Boxer.

WASHINGTON — A Pakistani immigrant who hosted fundraisers in Southern California for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton is being sought by the FBI on charges that he funneled illegal contributions to Clinton's political action committee and Sen. Barbara Boxer's 2004 reelection campaign.

Authorities say Northridge businessman Abdul Rehman Jinnah, 56, fled the country after an indictment accused him of engineering more than $50,000 in illegal donations to the Democratic committees. A business associate charged as a co-conspirator has entered a guilty plea and is scheduled to be sentenced in Los Angeles next week.

A federal law enforcement source said prosecutors had not dealt with the political committees in conducting their investigation and had no evidence that the committees knew the contributions were illegal.

Officials for both committees said they were unaware of the investigation or indictments until they were contacted by The Times, and said they would not keep the donations.

The case has transformed Jinnah from a political point man on Pakistani issues, a man often photographed next to foreign dignitaries and U.S. leaders, into a fugitive with his mug shot on the FBI's "featured fugitives" wanted list.

Jinnah's profile peaked in 2004 and 2005 as he wooed members of Congress to join a caucus advancing Pakistani concerns and brought Clinton to speak to prominent Pakistani Americans, lauding their homeland's contributions to the war on terrorism and calling relations with Pakistan beneficial to U.S. interests.

Jinnah and his family donated more than $100,000 to the Democratic Party and Democratic candidates. Now friends say they believe Jinnah has returned to Pakistan.

Attempts to reach him and his relatives were unsuccessful. A "For Sale" sign stood in his yard on Thursday, and a neighbor said the family had not lived there for months.

Jinnah's troubles appear to have begun when he attempted to circumvent election laws by reimbursing friends, business contacts and their family members for contributions made in their names, according to court records. Federal statutes set limits on contributions to federal campaigns and political action committees and bar donations made in the names of others.

Authorities say that from June 2004 to February 2005, Jinnah directly or indirectly solicited contributions from more than a dozen "conduits," reimbursing them with funds from his company, All American Distributing, a seller of cellphone service and accessories.

Authorities said the scheme allowed Jinnah to get around limits then in effect on individual donors of $5,000 per year to PACs and $2,000 per election to candidates, as well as the ban on using corporate money for political donations.

Jinnah's case has been handled with discretion by the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles, which recently lost a high-profile case against former Clinton campaign official David Rosen. Rosen was acquitted of charges of filing false reports about a Hollywood fundraiser given for Clinton in 2000.

The indictment of Jinnah, handed down in May without a news release, mentions only the initials of the committees that received the illegal donations, referring to them as "HP" and "FB." However, the charging document filed against Stuart Schoenburg, who authorities say is a co-conspirator, identifies one of the committees as HillPac, the leadership committee Clinton formed after her first Senate campaign and which she still uses.

Though Clinton cannot use HillPac to fund her presidential campaign directly, it has allowed her to donate to Democratic candidates and organizations, as well as to pay some political staff and travel expenses.

The Times was able to identify donations to Boxer's campaign by cross-referencing dates and contributors' initials listed in the indictment with campaign finance records. The "FB" in the indictment stood for "Friends of Barbara Boxer."

According to the indictment, Jinnah arranged $30,000 in donations to HillPac by having Schoenburg, a Tarzana television producer, approach family members and others to act as straw donors.

Schoenburg and five others contributed $5,000 apiece. Jinnah later reimbursed them with funds from his corporation, prosecutors say. In one instance, authorities allege, Jinnah and Schoenburg agreed to write "production" in a reimbursement check's memo line, falsely indicating it was payment for production services.

"The campaign clearly had no knowledge of these activities," said Howard Wolfson, a spokesman for Clinton.

He said HillPac would not keep the contributions cited in the indictment, as well as others from Jinnah and his family.

The indictment says Jinnah also found 14 straw donors to give $28,000 to the 2004 reelection campaign of Boxer (D-Calif.). Among the contributors were five employees of Jinnah's company, Schoenburg and several members of Schoenburg's family, records show.

Schoenburg, 76, pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor count of conspiracy in July. Contacted this week, he said he would not comment on the case. "My attorney told me not to talk to you," he said. His sentencing is scheduled for Monday, but his attorney said it was likely to be postponed.

Rose Kapolczynski, a consultant who ran Boxer's 2004 campaign, said no one on Boxer's staff knew of Jinnah's indictment or the illegal contributions.

"We were very surprised," she said, adding that neither the FBI nor the Justice Department had requested information from the campaign for the case.

Jinnah hosted or co-hosted two fundraisers for Boxer, she acknowledged.

In addition to the donations cited in the indictment, Boxer will also give away $8,000 contributed by Jinnah and his relatives, either to charity or the U.S. Treasury, Kapolczynski said.

Pakistani Americans are relatively new players in U.S. politics, not nearly as organized or affluent as Indian Americans, who often are on the opposite side of the same international issues.

In early 2000, a controversy erupted when a group of Pakistani Americans hosted a $50,000 fundraiser for Hillary Clinton as President Clinton was deciding whether to visit Pakistan on a Southeast Asia trip. The Clintons denied the contributions swayed the decision to make the stop.

Later that year, Jinnah hosted a luncheon fundraiser for then-First Lady Clinton at his house, an event depicted in a photo posted on the website Pakistanlink.com. Jinnah hosted a second fundraiser for Clinton in October 2004.

That year, he also helped form the Pakistani American Leadership Center, which describes itself as a coalition of Pakistani Americans seeking to further U.S.-Pakistan ties. It has helped persuade more than 70 House members to join the Congressional Pakistan Caucus.

The group was particularly jubilant when Rep. Howard L. Berman (D-Valley Village), who had previously sponsored a bill targeting Pakistan for sanctions related to its nuclear program, agreed to become a member.

Jinnah met with Berman and then issued a statement welcoming the congressman to "a new and hopefully long-term relationship with the Pakistani American community."

Jinnah has been substantially less active in the last year, however. A spokesman for the leadership center said Jinnah had not attended group events since mid-2005 and had not paid his board dues for the year.

Jinnah, who is married with at least two children, has owned a string of businesses in Southern California since at least 1990, including frozen yogurt shops as well as cellphone-related enterprises. As a legal permanent resident, though not a U.S. citizen, he can make campaign contributions here.

DOJ_NMG_0140383

In September, after his indictment, Jinnah put his latest company — Advanced Communication Technology Inc., which did business as All American Distributing — into Chapter 7 bankruptcy.

Most cases involving issues of campaign finance errors or improprieties are handled civilly by the Federal Election Commission, rather than criminally by the Justice Department. Spokesman Thom Mrozek said he could not comment on how the U.S. attorney's office came to investigate Jinnah.

Obama Calls Iran Threat To U.S., Israel (CHIT)

By John McCormick

Chicago Tribune, March 3, 2007

Seeking to woo Jewish votes and contributions, Sen. Barack Obama told an audience in Chicago Friday that he considers Iran "one of the greatest threats to the United States, Israel and world peace" and pledged he would try to end that nation's uranium enrichment program.

As he criticized the Bush administration's Iraq policies, the Democratic presidential candidate suggested that the danger posed by neighboring Iran has grown in recent years because of U.S. policy in the Middle East.

"One of the most profound consequences of the administration's failed strategy in Iraq has been to strengthen Iran's strategic position, reduce U.S. credibility and influence in the region, and place Israel and other nations friendly to the United States in greater peril," Obama (D-Ill.) said before a regional gathering of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, a major pro-Israel lobbying group.

In advance of the group's national conference later this month in Washington, where Obama will court donors one-on-one, his campaign had been looking for a friendly audience to make a major policy speech on U.S.-Israel policy.

By speaking to about 800 of the committee's members at the Sheraton Chicago Hotel & Towers, Obama was able to reaffirm his support of Israel, as voters consider the early presidential field. Democratic front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) made a similar speech to the group's members in her home state on Feb. 1.

Despite the eagerness of local news crews for him to comment on the topic, Obama made no mention of a revelation reported Friday by the Baltimore Sun that he has white ancestors who owned slaves. A spokesman also said he would not be taking any media questions.

Racial issues will again be at the forefront Sunday, as the senator appears in Alabama to deliver the keynote address at an event that commemorates the 1965 Selma-to-Montgomery voting rights march, an occasion that will also attract Clinton and her husband, the nation's 42nd president. Before his departure, Obama will headline a major labor rally in Chicago Saturday morning.

Like labor, the Jewish community is an essential constituency for any Democrat running for the White House.

John Green, a senior fellow with the Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life, said research suggests it is not uncommon for Jews to represent as much as 20 percent of the donors in a presidential primary.

"Jews are strong Democrats as a group and are a very important source of money for presidential candidates," he said. "This is a pretty significant financial constituency."

Green said Jews represent only small part of the total electorate, but can also play a key role in swing states such as Florida. "In a close election, this is a critical bloc," he said.

Although Green said Obama might struggle to differentiate himself from Clinton on social issues, his early opposition to the war in Iraq could help.

"Jews are particularly opposed to President Bush's positions in Iraq," he said. "She has had a little bit of a different policy position on the war in Iraq and that is a place where he could distinguish himself from her."

Rabbi Ira Youdovin, executive vice president of the Chicago Board of Rabbis, said some Jews were initially supportive of efforts to remove Saddam Hussein when reports of weapons of mass destruction were credible and Israel could be a target. "Today, there is far less approval and a sense that maybe the war wasn't a good idea," he said.

Josh Block, a spokesman for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, said Jewish voters lean mostly Democratic, but that the group is not monolithic in its support for the party.

"It requires nurturing," he said. "It can't be taken for granted."

In one of many lines that drew applause, Obama called for "fully funding military assistance" for Israel and continued work on missile defense programs. "And when Israel is attacked, we must stand up for Israel's legitimate right to defend itself," he said.

Obama focused much of his speech on Iran, but stressed the need for greater communication among all players in the region. "My plan includes a robust regional diplomatic strategy that includes talking to Syria and Iran — something this administration has finally embraced," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0140384

Earlier this week, Obama also met with family members of kidnapped Israeli soldier Ehud Goldwasser in Washington.

Jeff Simon, a financial planner from Northbrook who attended the speech, said the senator hit all the right notes for his audience.

"He touched on all the key issues," he said. "He said the right things."

Obama Blames U.S. For Stronger Iran (AP)

AP, March 2, 2007

CHICAGO (AP) -- Democrat presidential candidate Barack Obama on Friday blamed Bush administration failings in Iraq for strengthening the strategic position of Iran, which he says must be stopped from acquiring nuclear weapons.

Illinois senator said that means "direct engagement" with Iran similar to the meetings with the Soviet Union at the height of the Cold War.

"A consequence of the Administration's failed strategy in Iraq has been to strengthen Iran's strategic position; reduce U.S. credibility and influence in the region; and place Israel and other nations friendly to the United States in greater peril," according to a text of a speech Obama delivered to the American Israel Public Affairs Committee.

The Bush administration recently altered its position, with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice saying this week that the U.S. is willing to talk to Iran on security in Iraq.

Obama also emphasized in his speech his commitment to protecting the security of Israel, which he called "our strongest ally in the region and its only established democracy."

"Our job is to renew the United States' efforts to help Israel achieve peace with its neighbors while remaining vigilant against those who do share this vision," Obama said.

The speech was the second time in recent months that Obama has formally addressed foreign policy in his hometown of Chicago. In November, Obama called for a reduction of U.S. forces in Iraq at the Chicago Council on Global Affairs.

But Obama focused on Iran Friday, calling President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's regime "a threat to all of us."

A member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Obama said the world _ not just the United States _ must stop Iran's uranium enrichment program.

"While we should take no option, including military action, off the table, sustained and aggressive diplomacy combined with tough sanctions should be our primary means to prevent Iran from building nuclear weapons," Obama said.

Obama said Iranian nuclear weapons would destabilize the region and could set off a new arms race.

Fellow senator and Democratic rival Hillary Rodham Clinton has warned Bush not to take any military action against Iran without congressional OK.

Iran has refused to freeze its enrichment-related activities and the U.N. Security Council has imposed sanctions targeting its nuclear and missile programs and persons involved in them.

Iran has refused to halt its nuclear program, contending it is to provide energy _ not weapons _ for the country.

Obama Had Slaveowning Kin (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 2 — Genealogists have uncovered a new ingredient in the melting pot identity of Senator Barack Obama, the Illinois Democrat who hopes to become the first black president. His white maternal ancestors once owned slaves.

Mr. Obama is the American-born son of a white woman from Kansas and a black man from Kenya. The genealogists, led by William Addams Reitwiesner, studied the family history of Mr. Obama's mother and determined that Mr. Obama's great-great-great-great grandfather, George Washington Overall, owned two slaves listed in the 1850 census in Nelson County, Ky.

Mr. Obama's great-great-great-great-great grandmother, Mary Duval, also owned two slaves, the records show.

Mr. Reitwiesner, who works for the Library of Congress, posted the information on his personal Web site a while ago, said a genealogist who worked with him. The Baltimore Sun reported the findings on Friday.

The details emerged the same week that the Rev. Al Sharpton disclosed that his great-grandfather was owned by a relative of Senator Strom Thurmond of South Carolina, once a defender of segregation.

Historians said the disclosures highlighted the deep, though often unknown and unacknowledged, imprint of slavery in the lives of present-day Americans.

Bill Burton, a spokesman for Mr. Obama, said the senator had long known that he was related to Jefferson Davis, president of the Confederacy, and that another forebear had fought for the Union in the Civil War. Mr. Burton said the findings showed Mr. Obama's ancestors were "representative of America."

DOJ_NMG_0140385

"It is a true measure of progress that the descendant of a slave owner would come to marry a student from Kenya and produce a son who would grow up to be a candidate for president of the United States," Mr. Burton said.

Where's His Right Hook? (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

As I sit across from Barack Obama in his Senate office, I feel like Ingrid Bergman in "The Bells of St. Mary's," when she plays a nun who teaches a schoolboy who's being bullied how to box.

I'm just not certain, having watched the fresh-faced senator shy away from fighting with the feral Hillary over her Hollywood turf, that he understands that a campaign is inherently a conflict.

The Democrats lost the last two excruciatingly close elections because Al Gore and John Kerry did not fight fiercely and cleverly enough.

After David Geffen made critical comments about Hillary, she seized the chance to play Godzilla stomping on Obambi.

As a woman, she clearly feels she must be aggressive in showing she can "deck" opponents, as she put it — whether it's Saddam with her war resolution vote or Senator Obama when he encroaches on areas that she and Bill had presumed were wrapped up, like Hollywood and now the black vote.

If Hillary is in touch with her masculine side, Barry is in touch with his feminine side.

He turned up his nose at his campaign's sharp response to Hillary and her pinstriped thug, Howard Wolfson. He told The Times's Jeff Zeleny that he had not been engaged in the vituperative exchange because he was traveling on a red-eye flight, getting a haircut and taking his daughters to school.

I ask why he couldn't have managed the donnybrook while he traveled and did errands. Since he's sitting across from me using his BlackBerry, I wonder: "Where was your BlackBerry? Did your aides not ask you how to respond or did you not want to ride herd on them — even just to tell them to ignore Hillary?"

"Look, I came up through politics in Chicago," he says. "When I arrived in Chicago in 1985, I didn't know a single person. Seventeen years later, I was the United States senator and in a position to run for president. So I must know a little something about politics."

Channeling Ingrid, I press on and say: "I know you want to run a high-minded campaign, but do you worry that you might be putting yourself on a pedestal too much? Because people also want to see you mix it up a little. That's how they judge how you'd be with Putin."

"When I get into a tussle," he replies, "I want it to be over something real, not something manufactured. If someone wants to get in an argument with me, let's argue about how we're going to fix the health care system or where we need to go on Iraq."

If campaigns follow the arc of the hero myth. ...

"What's the demon that I've slain?" he finishes. "You're getting kind of deep on me here. I think that, for me, the story was overcoming a father's absence and reconciling the different strands of my background and coming out whole."

Has he ever been struck by the similiarity of Bill Clinton's growing up without his father?

"You don't want to go on with too much pop psychology," he replies. "Somebody said that every man is either trying to live up to his father's expectations or trying to make up for his father's mistakes. And in some ways, when your father's not there, you're doing both. You try to live up to the expectations of somebody who's not present to tell you that you've done a good job, but you're also trying to make up for the mistakes that partially led to his absence."

Does Al Gore have first dibs on the presidency?

"I love Al Gore," he replies. "He's a smart guy." He said he liked Mr. Gore's seriousness on issues he cares deeply about. "This sounds clichéd, but this week I had five mothers of folks headed to Iraq cry during rope lines where I was shaking hands and had me hug 'em. This stuff is just not a game. ... Now that doesn't mean that there's not the basic blocking and tackling of politics. I've got to raise money. I've got to manage my press. We've got to respond rapidly to attacks. But what I don't want to do is get drawn into the sport of it."

When the Tiger Woods of politics goes to a civil rights commemoration in Selma, Ala., this weekend — just as the story breaks that his white ancestors had slaves — he will compete for attention with Hillary and the man billed as the first black president. How does he feel about the Clintons double-teaming him?

Talking about the woman he described at the Beverly Hills fund-raiser as smarter, better-looking and meaner then he is, he grins: "My wife's pretty tough."

Dodd Urges Opponents To Attend NH Debate (NHUL)

New Hampshire Union Leader, March 3, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0140386

Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., yesterday urged all his opponents for the Democratic Presidential nomination to participate in the April 5 political debate in Manchester.

"New Hampshire voters deserve a chance to see Presidential candidates on one stage answering tough questions," said Beneva Schulte, communications director for Dodd.

"If it's not too early in the campaign season for candidates to host million dollar fundraisers, it's not too early to debate the issues."

While several Democratic hopefuls have committed to participating in the debate, Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York and Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois have not.

The debate will be co-sponsored by the New Hampshire Union Leader, CNN and WMUR-TV.

Vilsack Says Early Polls Didn't Show His Strength (DMR)

By Thomas Beaumont

Des Moines Register, March 3, 2007

Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack criticized public opinion polls Friday and said his presidential campaign was running stronger in Iowa than early surveys reflected before he gave up his bid for the 2008 Democratic nomination a week ago.

"I don't want to sound like sour grapes, but you should not pay attention to early polls," Vilsack said during taping of "Iowa Press," a public affairs program on Iowa Public Television.

"Iowa polls are not accurate in terms of caucus support," he added, saying that polls sponsored by news organizations do not screen for the small audience of Democratic Party activists who plan to attend their precinct caucuses.

The caucuses are scheduled to launch the sequence of nominating contests next year. Polls in Iowa showed Vilsack, who said he would win his state's pivotal nominating contest, trailing the field's nationally known candidates.

"We were absolutely convinced, and I remain convinced and will as long as I live, that I would have won the Iowa caucuses based on the information that we had that is legitimate," he added.

Vilsack insisted it was his inability to raise money that forced him from the race, not the difficulty of breaking through the buzz surrounding his better known peers, New York Sen. Hillary Clinton, former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama.

Vilsack had trailed Edwards, who has remained popular among Iowa Democrats since his second-place finish in the 2004 caucuses. Vilsack also had trailed Obama and Clinton in most polls, albeit closely.

Some polls are faulty, but it's wrong to paint all of them as imprecise, Des Moines pollster Ann Selzer said.

"Many polls are out there making headlines without a lot of discipline in their method to nail down the people who will show up on caucus night or vote in a primary. But not all polls are bad," said Selzer, who conducts The Des Moines Register's Iowa Poll and contracts with other newspapers. "I've seen several polls in Iowa with decent sampling, and not one says Tom Vilsack had a good shot to take Iowa on caucus night."

Vilsack said he planned to meet with several of his former competitors in the coming weeks. Clinton, Edwards and Obama have trips planned within the next 10 days. New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson was planning to campaign in Iowa today and Saturday, having announced his candidacy in January. Likewise, Delaware Sen. Joseph Biden was planning to campaign in Iowa in early March.

Vilsack said he is most concerned with closing down his campaign, helping former staff members find work, and paying off a campaign debt. But as January approaches, he said he would look closely at the candidates with an eye toward making an endorsement.

"I think the chances are good that I'll do that, but I don't know that for certain," he said.

Vilsack also dismissed the idea that he planned to run for U.S. Senate. The former two-term governor, state senator and Mount Pleasant mayor has often said he had no interest in returning to a career as a legislator.

"I'm more of an executive kind of guy," he said.

U.S. And Brazil Seek To Promote Ethanol In West (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews, Larry Rohter

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 2 — President Bush, hoping to reduce demand for oil in the Western Hemisphere, is preparing to finish an agreement with Brazil next week to promote the production and use of ethanol throughout Latin America and the Caribbean, according to administration officials.

The agreement could lead to substantial growth in the ethanol industry in Brazil as technology and manufacturing equipment developed there is exported to other countries in the region.

DOJ_NMG_0140387

Much of the ethanol produced there is made from sugar cane and is far cheaper to produce than the corn-based ethanol that has been nurtured by protective tariffs and government mandates in the United States.

But the agreement has already begun to prompt complaints from politicians from corn-producing regions of the United States. They fear that the plan would lead to an increase in imports of cheap foreign ethanol and undercut American producers.

By increasing ethanol production and consumption, particularly in countries that produce sugar, officials of the Bush administration hope to reduce the region's overall dependence on foreign oil and to take some of the pressure off oil prices.

As a side effect, American officials contend, the program could also reduce the influence of Hugo Chavez, the president of oil-rich Venezuela.

Mr. Bush is scheduled to meet in São Paulo next week with Brazil's president, Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva.

Administration officials are hoping to complete a memorandum of understanding that calls for cooperation between the countries on research and common standards for biofuels, as well as on helping other countries replicate Brazil's expertise in producing ethanol from sugar.

The agreement is largely a framework and provides few details, according to administration officials who have been briefed on the agreement but who spoke on condition of anonymity because it has not yet been completed.

Government officials in Brazil confirmed the agreement. Senior Brazilian government officials said the most important effect of a collaboration with the United States would be in promoting a broader international market for Brazilian ethanol technology.

Brazil and the United States account for a total of more than 70 percent of global ethanol production. The agreement is aimed at encouraging other countries, especially small and poor sugar cane producing countries in the Caribbean and Central America, to become producers.

"This is more than a document, it's a point of convergence in the relationship that is denser and more intense than anything we've seen in the last 20 or 30 years," Antonio Simões, the director of the energy division of the Foreign Ministry of Brazil, said in a telephone interview from New York. "Brazil will profit, the United States will profit, and so will third countries. It's a win-win situation for everyone involved."

"The good thing is that a poor country can reduce what it pays for imported oil and earn money exporting this," Mr. Simões said. "That way they will have more money to invest in social programs, and the production of energy will be democratized in the world, with 100 countries producing energy instead of just 15 or 20."

Eventually, the two countries hope to use their accord to spur production of renewable fuels beyond the hemisphere. Brazil is interested in encouraging sugar-cane-based ethanol production in Africa, where it has extensive trade and cultural ties, and in Asian nations like Thailand.

Brazil's own direct exports of ethanol reached a record last year. But demand for the fuel is growing so rapidly within Brazil that the government's immediate priority is to satisfy its domestic market.

But Brazilian business groups see commercial opportunities in supplying advanced equipment to other countries setting up their own ethanol distilleries.

"We want ethanol to become a global commodity, and for that to happen, Brazil can't be the only producer," said José Luiz Oliverio, vice president for operations at Dedini Industries, Brazil's leading manufacturer of equipment for sugar cane and ethanol mills. "We've been growing and processing sugar for 500 years, and we are confident of our ability to maintain our leadership in this sector."

American officials expressed a similar enthusiasm for making ethanol and ethanol-producing equipment on a huge scale. The biggest area of cooperation, they said, will be in helping countries identify and remove obstacles to building their own ethanol production capacity.

Mindful of protests from domestic ethanol producers and from the powerful American farm lobby, administration officials are not expected to even hint at a reduction in American tariffs on foreign ethanol.

Nor does the administration appear ready to offer money or loan guarantees for construction of ethanol plants in other countries.

In a letter to President Bush on Thursday, Senator Charles Grassley, Republican of Iowa, said he failed to understand "why the United States would consider spending U.S. taxpayer dollars to encourage new ethanol production in other countries."

The proposed partnership, Mr. Grassley warned, could become a backdoor way for Brazil to escape the tariff on imported ethanol that currently insulates American producers.

The United States imposes a tariff of 54 cents a gallon on imported ethanol, but Caribbean nations and countries in the Central American Free Trade Agreement are exempt from those duties if they make the ethanol from products grown in their own countries. Using Brazilian technology for refining sugar-cane-based ethanol, such countries could in time become exporters to the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0140388

In addition, Caribbean nations can export a limited amount of ethanol that comes indirectly from Brazil and other countries. Under the Caribbean Basin Initiative, which has been in force for years, countries can take partly processed ethanol from a country like Brazil and carry out the last step in processing before shipping it to the United States. But the region is allowed to export that kind of ethanol only up to a limit of 7 percent of United States' ethanol consumption.

Last year, the United States imported about 600 million gallons of ethanol, and about 200 million gallons came indirectly from Brazil through the Caribbean, according to Robert Dineen, president of the Renewable Fuels Association, a trade group that represents ethanol producers. The total imports of all kinds of ethanol amounted to slightly more than 10 percent of American consumption last year.

For the moment, American ethanol producers are watching warily but not protesting.

"I don't believe the fundamental objective of the administration is to produce ethanol in the Caribbean for export to the United States," Mr. Dineen said. But, he added, American companies will be watching to see if the initiative becomes "the camel's nose under the tent."

U.S. Ready To Release N. Korean Assets (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, March 3, 2007

The United States will soon recommend releasing a significant amount of frozen North Korean bank accounts, officials say, which diplomats hope will keep North Korea from reneging on its pledge to scrap nuclear weapons.

The Treasury Department could announce as soon as next week that several million dollars connected to North Korea are not tainted by links to rogue nuclear proliferation or allegations of counterfeiting, smuggling and other crimes.

The U.S. move is expected to prompt overseas bank regulators to unfreeze between $8 million and $12 million from about $24 million in blocked assets, one official said.

Treasury and State Department officials spoke on condition of anonymity to describe results of an ongoing Treasury review.

Although the amount of money is relatively small, the frozen accounts became an unexpectedly large stumbling block in troubled nuclear negotiations with Pyongyang. The move was an affront to the secretive communist regime, and it had a devastating ripple effect that further estranged North Korea from the global banking system.

North Korea pointed to what it called unfair U.S. sanctions as a reason to boycott disarmament talks for more than a year. The restrictions were still a sore point when the North did return to talks in December. The North Korean negotiator refused to discuss the country's weapons until Washington budged.

An agreement to resolve the matter within 30 days was key to a potential breakthrough deal that the North struck Feb. 13 with the United States and four other nations.

The money is held by a blacklisted bank in Macau that North Korea accuses of complicity in counterfeiting and money laundering. A Treasury Department delegation was in Macau, a semiautonomous territory of China, this week to discuss results of the department's 18-month review of the Banco Delta Asia accounts.

"We intend to handle this matter in a straightforward way based on the evidence and the law," Treasury Undersecretary Stuart Levey said Friday. "As we have always said, the designation of Banco Delta Asia as a primary money laundering concern is separate from the nuclear talks."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other diplomats had also said the financial restrictions were a law enforcement matter that should not affect the nuclear negotiations, but it was clear even before the Feb. 13 deal that one issue could not be resolved without the other.

"They've gathered a real mountain of information," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Wednesday. "They've gone through it ... and I expect in the coming period of time the Treasury will be addressing the issue of how they have resolved the issue related to Banco Delta Asia."

Washington slapped restrictions on Banco Delta Asia in 2005 and put it on a money-laundering blacklist, prompting Macau to freeze the $24 million. Banks worldwide then shunned North Korean business for fear of losing access to American markets.

Banco Delta Asia has said money might have been laundered at the bank, but there was no evidence the institution was aware it was being used for that purpose. It said it was a small, family owned bank that didn't have the technology to check big batches of U.S. currency for fake bills.

The bank also said it used a dated computer system and it didn't pay enough attention to maintaining its own books. It also has said the bank didn't have adequate written anti-money-laundering policies for its staff.

South Korea's foreign minister met with Rice and other senior U.S. officials Friday at a crucial moment in North Korean disarmament efforts. The North said in the February accord that, in exchange for aid, it would close its main nuclear reactor within 60 days. A much larger shipment of aid — about $250 million worth — would follow once the North had declared all its nuclear programs and begun to disable them.

As part of the nuclear agreement, on Monday and Tuesday in New York, the lead U.S. envoy at the nuclear talks, Christopher Hill, and his North Korean negotiating counterpart, Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Gwan, are to discuss first steps toward establishing normal ties after decades of hostility that followed the 1950-53 Korean War. Kim arrived in New York Friday night from San Francisco, where he held private talks with a number of Asian experts.

Seoul Wants No Trace Of Nukes (WT)

By David R. Sands, Andrew Salmon

The Washington Times, March 3, 2007

South Korea's foreign minister said yesterday that North Korea must abandon all aspects of its nuclear endeavors, including a suspected uranium enrichment program, as part of a deal to solve the peninsula's nuclear crisis, even if the program has barely gotten off the ground.

Song Min-soon, Seoul's minister for foreign affairs and trade, sidestepped new questions over the state of Pyongyang's uranium-enrichment program, the key charge in the Bush administration's case that the North had violated past agreements to halt its nuclear weapons programs.

"Whether [the uranium program] is just a single piece of paper or actual, tangible facilities, all these efforts should be abolished in the course of implementing" the six-nation deal reached Feb. 13 to end the North's nuclear programs, Mr. Song said on a visit to Washington.

The South Korean envoy made the comment just before a meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in which the recent North Korea nuclear deal reached Feb. 13 in Beijing was a prime topic of conversation.

The latest nuclear crisis on the divided Korean Peninsula dates back to 2002, when Bush administration officials said the North admitted it was secretly enriching uranium even as it suspended a parallel plutonium program to make nuclear bombs. The North has denied it made the admission, and U.S. intelligence officials now say they do not know the scope of the North's uranium programs.

In Pyongyang yesterday, officials from the North and South agreed to work on the first phases of the Feb. 13 accord, as well as on reuniting divided families, testing a pan-Korean rail link and preparing new shipments of aid to the North.

"The South and the North will work jointly to ensure a sound implementation of the agreement on denuclearizing and peace on the Korean Peninsula," the two sides said in a joint statement issued after four days of ministerial-level talks.

The Beijing deal calls for a phased end to all the North's nuclear programs in return for aid, energy and the prospect of full diplomatic relations with the United States and countries in the region.

But South Korean officials yesterday refused to restore full aid shipments until the North's main nuclear reactor facility had been shut down. Seoul suspended aid after the North's missile tests last summer, and Pyongyang responded by cutting diplomatic contacts and meetings of divided families.

The South agreed verbally to provide the North with rice and fertilizer, but did not specify the date of delivery or the amount to be shipped.

"We plan to provide rice and fertilizer at the level of previous years," South Korean Unification Minister Lee Jae-joung told reporters, "but we will do it in stages, following the necessary process."

In Washington, Mr. Song said he planned to coordinate closely with Washington as the nuclear deal moves ahead.

Some U.S. conservatives have criticized the deal, saying the North will pocket the promised aid and renege again on promises to end its nuclear programs. But Mr. Song said "speculation" about whether Pyongyang could be trusted was "rather futile," and the key will be convincing the North that its own best interests lie in denuclearization.

"Showing North Korea that the clouds hovering over it have a silver lining will help dispel its sense of insecurity so it may breathe comfortably in its nuclear-free future," he said. "In this case security is a subjective state of mind rather than an objective condition of being."

The International Atomic Energy Agency, the United Nations' nuclear watchdog, said yesterday its director, Mohamed ElBaradei, would be making a two-day visit to Pyongyang starting March 13 -- five years after the North expelled IAEA inspectors and resumed plutonium production for nuclear bombs.

The North's chief negotiator is also in the United States, preparing for unprecedented talks next week with U.S. officials on the opening of diplomatic relations. The talks are expected to take place next week.

·Andrew Salmon reported from Seoul.

S. Korea Refuses North's Request For Restored Aid (WP/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0140390

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

SEOUL, March 2 -- South Korea on Friday added pressure on North Korea to comply with an international disarmament agreement, refusing the impoverished nation's demand to restore full aid shipments until after its main nuclear reactor is shut down.

At the first high-level talks between the two Koreas since the North's underground nuclear test in October, the communist nation "agreed to make joint efforts for a smooth implementation" of its pledge last month to take initial steps toward dismantling its atomic program, according to a final statement.

The North and South also agreed to resume family reunions of relatives split by their border and planned test runs of railway lines between the countries.

North Korea and the International Atomic Energy Agency have agreed on March 13 as the starting date for a two-day visit by the agency's chief, Mohamed ElBaradei, U.N. officials said Friday. The officials asked for anonymity because they were not authorized to reveal specifics of the trip, which is expected to help alleviate some misgivings that the unpredictable regime might renege on its agreement to shut down its nuclear facilities.

This week's meetings in Pyongyang were part of the historic reconciliation launched between the Koreas since their leaders met in their first and only summit in 2000. The countries remain technically at war because the cease-fire that ended the 1950-53 Korean War has never been replaced by a peace treaty.

But attempts to bring the countries together have been complicated since 2002, when Washington accused North Korea of secret uranium enrichment efforts that the Bush administration said violated an earlier disarmament deal.

The situation deteriorated further last July when North Korea test-launched a series of missiles, prompting South Korea, one of the North's main sources of aid such as rice and fertilizer, to put the shipments on hold.

Relations worsened after North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear test. But a breakthrough came last month after a revival of six-nation nuclear negotiations -- including China, Japan, Russia, the United States and the two Koreas -- in which the North pledged to make moves toward abandoning its nuclear program.

Koreas Agree To Resume Reunions (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

South Korea and North Korea wrapped up high-level talks, agreeing to resume reunions of families separated by the Korean War and to test-run a cross-border train in the first half of this year. But the South said it would make a final decision on resuming humanitarian aid to the North only after Pyongyang began complying with the nuclear accord reached in the six-party talks last month and shutting down its main nuclear reactor. The North had pressed for an immediate resumption of aid during the ministerial talks, which resumed after a seven-month hiatus.

Pakistan Test-fires Short-range Missile (AP)

AP, March 3, 2007

Pakistan on Saturday successfully test-fired a short-range missile capable of carrying a nuclear warhead, the military said, two weeks ahead of peace talks with archrival neighboring India.

The launch of the Haft-II Abdali missile, which has a range of 120 miles, was conducted from an unspecified location inside Pakistan, the military said.

The Abdali is considered capable of being fitted with a nuclear warhead.

Pakistan and India have fought three wars since gaining independence from Britain in 1947. The two South Asian nuclear-armed nations often carry out missile tests.

India became a declared atomic power in 1974, while Pakistan carried out underground nuclear tests in 1998.

Relations between Pakistan and India have improved, however, since they began a peace process in 2004 to resolve all their issues, including Kashmir.

They will hold the fourth round of peace talks in Islamabad March 13-14.

Qaddafi Heralds A Changing Libya, But Within Limits (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

SEBHA, Libya, March 2 — Col. Muammar el-Qaddafi had just spent two hours on Friday arguing that Libya's form of government was the truest democracy, when the call went out to a small group of foreign correspondents for questions.

This correspondent asked how democracy was compatible with a system that puts so much power in one man's hands.

DOJ_NMG_0140391

Colonel Qaddafi's aides looked alarmed. The question was not translated and the event was over.

After decades of international isolation, Libya may be changing. But there are very clear limits.

A slightly newer and perhaps mellower version of Colonel Qaddafi was on display on Friday for the correspondents, as part of the celebration of the 30th anniversary of the system of government he instituted.

The man who once banned everything from Western music to teaching English in schools, who was condemned by Washington for support of terrorism, spoke of opening Libya to the world. "Undoubtedly Libya is part of this changing world dominated by globalization," he said during the discussion, itself a rarity. "Libya is riding this wave, taking this and that. Libya cannot row against the current."

Those are revolutionary words for a man who seized power in a coup 37 years ago. Seven years later, he announced the Declaration of the People's Authority, the foundation for a system that was designed to have every Libyan adult involved in governance of the nation through committee meetings.

Colonel Qaddafi is the same eccentric figure as always, dressed in elaborate Libyan robes jazzed up with striking colors and a modern flair. He still offers unusual ideas, like when he said all the nations of the world would someday meld into seven or eight blocs, and that all formal governments, parliaments, ministries and militaries would be dissolved. Only then, he said, would there be world peace.

Or when asked about women's rights. He said that women and men should have the same rights, but that women should not be made to do men's work because they are biologically different.

"If you say they are equal in rights and responsibilities, that's unfair for both," he said. "Do women have to be train drivers? Why do we let women have jobs that turn them into men? A pregnant woman or a breast-feeding woman, how can she drive the train or work in a factory? Unless we want to change them into men, they have different biological composition that doesn't allow them to take responsibilities of men."

In his 60s, Colonel Qaddafi comes across as a man thinking about his legacy, and how to retool a system of governance that has failed to adequately administer the state. Though it is the richest in North Africa because of its oil reserves, its schools, hospitals and infrastructure are in serious disrepair, according to consultants brought in to study the country and draft a plan for change.

So Colonel Qaddafi has begun to take steps that by all accounts were unthinkable just a few years ago. The discussion with him here, led by the television interviewer David Frost and including Western academics, was one such event. Colonel Qaddafi has rarely agreed to sit with a group of Western journalists.

He maintained a quiet, almost distant composure through much of the discussion. Occasionally he picked up a pen and jotted down notes, but he mostly spoke in a low voice. What has not changed, and what he made clear, is the core of what he believes.

The problem in Libya, he said, is not with his ideas, but with their implementation. He said it took many years for people to learn the duties and responsibilities of self-rule.

In his philosophy, people should rule themselves, not select, or elect, the people to rule them. He said he modeled his ideas after the way ancient Athens was governed, with collective meetings and unanimous participation. In the past, Colonel Qaddafi has described his role as a guide, a steady hand leading his people while they learn the duties of his version of self-rule. The word dictator, strongman, or even president is never used. He is called Brother Leader.

During the discussion his role in building Libya's so-called democracy never came up. But the panelists did tell him that unlike ancient Athens, with just 20,000 citizens, ruling a country the size of Libya, with five million residents, would not work according to his vision.

Sir Anthony Giddens, a British sociologist, told him that Libya would be better off combining bits of representative democracy with individual democracy. But that was not an idea he seemed willing to accept.

The Libyan advocates of change and the outside consultants are careful to focus on the small signs of change — like the panel discussion itself. Until the event started, organizers said they were afraid it would be canceled by Colonel Qaddafi's team.

But it went off and therein was evidence, they said, of change.

"He actually engaged in a dialogue," one of the participants said after the event was over.

'No Reward' For Non-nuclear Libya (BBC)

BBC.com, March 2, 2007

Libyan leader Muammar Gaddafi has said his country has not been given adequate compensation for its decision to renounce nuclear weapons in 2003.

Speaking to the BBC, Colonel Gaddafi said the failure by the West to reward Libya meant Iran and North Korea were reluctant to follow Tripoli's lead.

DOJ_NMG_0140392

He insisted there would be no return to the confrontation of the past, however.

Sanctions were lifted after Libya ended its nuclear weapons programme, and the US and UK have resumed diplomatic ties.

Libya was also removed from the US list of state sponsors of terror, a major step towards international rehabilitation.

Investment promise

However, Col Gaddafi says the West has not properly compensated his country because it has failed to transform its nuclear weapons programme into nuclear power.

Gaddafi: Libya 'let down' Speaking to BBC diplomatic correspondent James Robbins, Col Gaddafi said this meant the West had lost bargaining power with countries like Iran and North Korea.

"This should be a model to be followed, but Libya is disappointed because the promises given by America and Britain were not fulfilled," he said.

"And therefore those countries said 'we are not going to follow Libya's example because Libya abolished its programme without any compensation'."

Mr Gaddafi said that the US and Britain had a duty to help Libya develop civilian nuclear power plants.

"They said if you abolish your war programme we will help you to develop your nuclear abilities into peaceful ones. This has not happened."

Our correspondent says the Libyan leader may have been bargaining for foreign investment, but a return to hostility does not seem to be on the cards.

'International dictatorship'

Col Gaddafi spoke to the BBC as celebrations were taking place to mark the 30th anniversary of his declaration of Libya's unique system of "popular rule".

He also held a rare public debate with Western scholars, in which he criticised the control that nations with military and economic power held over poorer countries.

It was a pragmatic desire to avoid being destroyed by the "international dictatorship" of such powers that had persuaded Libya to improve its relations with the world, he added.

Col Gaddafi's remarks come as six major powers - the US, Russia, China, the UK, France and Germany - discuss possible further sanctions against Iran over its refusal to halt its nuclear programme.

US officials have said ambassadors to the UN could begin drafting a new resolution on Iran next week.

Meanwhile, North Korea last month agreed at six-party talks to take the first steps towards nuclear disarmament, in return for economic and fuel aid.

Pressure to find a solution to the nuclear issue increased after Pyongyang conducted its first atomic test in October.

Sudan President Commits To Peacekeepers (AP)

By Alexandra Olson, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 3, 2007

Sudan's president is sending a letter to Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon expressing his commitment to the deployment of several thousand U.N. peacekeepers to help end the violence in Darfur, Sudan's U.N. envoy said Friday.

The deployment would be the second step of a three-stage U.N. plan that would culminate in a 22,000-strong joint UN-African Union peacekeeping mission.

Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir has given conflicting signals about his commitment to the plan, and Ban asked him earlier this year to state his acceptance of the second phase in writing.

Al-Bashir's letter expresses his commitment but also raises "issues of operational, technical and legal aspects" of the proposal, Sudanese Ambassador Abdalmahmood Abdalhaleem told The Associated Press. He declined to elaborate.

Sudan agreed to the initiative in November. Al-Bashir reiterated his commitment in a Dec. 23 letter to former U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan. But last month, al-Bashir said U.N. troops were not required in Darfur because the 7,000-member AU force on the ground could maintain order. The Sudanese president has insisted the AU force needs only technical and financial support from the U.N.

Abdalhaleem said Ban would be receiving the letter "at any moment." Ban's office said the secretary-general did not have the letter but was told al-Bashir had written it.

"Sudan of course is committed to the support by the U.N. to AMIS," Abdalhaleem said, referring to the AU force by its acronym.

On Friday, the U.S. State Department called on both Sudan and the United Nations to speed up the deployment of the full joint AU-UN force.

DOJ_NMG_0140393

Spokesman Sean McCormack issued the appeal as U.S presidential envoy Andrew Natsios arrived in Sudan's capital, Khartoum, for a 10-day visit that will include stops in the western Darfur region and southern Sudan.

"We are pushing on the Sudanese — we as well as others — to make sure that those forces are able to deploy in the areas that they need to deploy to and push on the Sudanese to do everything that they can to stop the violence," McCormack said.

McCormack said the U.S. administration is not satisfied with the yearlong U.N. time frame for the deployment and that not enough countries are pledging troops for the mission.

"The timeline needs to be reduced," McCormack said. "This is too critical a humanitarian issue."

The first phase — a "light support" package adding some equipment, military officers and U.N. police to the AU operation — is nearly almost complete. The second phase is a "heavy support" package that includes the deployment of more than 3,000 U.N. military, police and civilian personnel.

Darfur's conflict erupted in 2003 when ethnic African rebels took up arms against the Arab-dominated central government, accusing it of neglect. More than 200,000 people have died and 2.5 million have fled their homes. The government is accused of unleashing militias known as the janjaweed, which are blamed for the bulk of the conflict's atrocities.

In a report Wednesday, Ban called on al-Bashir to "uphold his commitment" to the U.N.-AU peacekeeping plan.

He also urged countries to provide "urgent contributions of human resources and equipment" for the joint force and said the second phase would cost $287.9 million.

On Friday, European Union defense ministers offered support the joint mission. However, the EU has provided most of the financing for the AU force now in Darfur — some $530 million since 2004 — and the bloc's special peace support fund for Africa has run dry.

EU foreign ministers are expected to seek extra funding Monday from the EU aid budget and from the coffers of its 27 member governments.

Darfur Oil Seen As Curse Now, Blessing Later (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

While exploration may bring needed investment in Sudan, some say it only exacerbates the fighting

The Sudanese government is quietly escalating oil exploration inside the Darfur region, a step that has led to protests from rebel leaders in a volatile area where more than 200,000 people have been killed during three years of fighting.

Political and humanitarian experts say oil in Darfur could deliver much-needed development and investment to the region but that attempts to search for oil now may intensify the conflict by raising the stakes in an already war-torn area. The government has recently awarded three new oil concessions in the region.

Rebel leaders say oil exploration in Darfur should be postponed until a peace deal is signed by all parties and stability returns.

"We are still fighting for our lives and our country," said rebel commander Jar Neby, who represents a faction of the Sudan Liberation Army. "We need water right now, not oil. We can talk about these issues after peace comes."

Some political analysts believe that untapped oil reserves might have been an underlying factor in the Darfur conflict all along, explaining why a seemingly barren wasteland of western Sudan would spark such a bitter tug of war between government forces and rebels, eventually drawing the intervention of international players such as the United States, Libya and the United Nations.

"When you don't find a reasonable explanation, this is what you have to conclude," said Eltayeb Hag Ateya, head of the Peace Studies Institute at Khartoum University. "I believe there must be something else — oil or some natural resource — about Darfur."

Salih Osman, a human rights attorney from Darfur, said government suspicions about oil in Darfur explain why regime officials reacted so strongly to rebel attacks in the region, starting in 2003. "I fear this will only make matters worse," he said, referring to the newly expanded exploration.

The government is accused of arming Arab militias known as janjaweed to attack and destroy scores of Darfur villages over the last three years. Government officials deny supporting the janjaweed and blame rebels for the violence.

DOJ_NMG_0140394

A team of Middle Eastern oil companies, including Saudi Arabia-based Al Qahtani Sons Group and Ansan Wikfs, based in Yemen, agreed in November to spend $43 million for drilling rights to 125,000 square miles. The largely uninhabited area, known as Block 12a, is north of where much of Darfur's fighting is occurring.

The government's decision to offer new concessions in Darfur is part of an aggressive search for oil in the northern part of the country.

Since discovering oil in the 1970s, Sudan has become one of Africa's biggest producers. But most of the current production — worth an estimated $6 billion a year — is in the south, and a 2005 peace agreement with former southern rebels gives Sudanese there the right to break away from the rest of the country in 2011, taking much of the oil with them.

"There's a real scramble to find oil in the north," said a government oil official, who, like several others interviewed for this report, requested that his name be withheld because of the government's sensitivity about speaking publicly. "The likelihood that there is oil in Darfur is quite high."

The government awarded two smaller concessions east of Nyala, the capital of South Darfur state, to a Yemen-led joint venture. But attempts to find an investor for a concession encompassing much of the rest of North Darfur state have been complicated by the region's instability, officials said.

Due in part to U.S. investment sanctions imposed on Sudan in the 1990s, China National Petroleum Corp. is Sudan's biggest oil partner and purchases two-thirds of its oil. One of China's oil-producing concessions straddles Darfur, but officials said current production is occurring in the state of Western Kordofan, not in Darfur itself. Officials at China National declined to comment.

An oil industry consultant who works with several of Sudan's major oil companies, and who also spoke on condition of anonymity, said he believed that efforts to look for oil in Darfur are aggravating the conflict.

"The main reason behind Darfur is oil," he said. "This fighting in Darfur had been going on for generations. There is no other reason for this area to have blown like this."

Others are hopeful that oil might help resolve the region's crisis by bringing all sides together. The discovery of oil in southern Sudan eventually helped end the two-decade civil war when both sides realized that neither would be able to profit from the oil if fighting continued.

"They will see that it's better to share in the oil than to leave it for someone else," said Salah Wahbi, president of Advanced Petroleum Co., a Sudanese joint venture that has invested more than $30 million to explore in a southern Darfur oil concession. "Oil will bring a better life and will bring a better agreement."

Under a fragile peace accord signed by the government and one rebel group in May, Darfurians have the right to share in whatever oil wealth is discovered.

The increased exploration has not gone unnoticed by Darfur rebels. In late November, two rebel groups attacked a Chinese oil facility in Abu Gabra, located between the states of South Darfur and Western Kordofan, according to a United Nations report. Both rebels and government troops claimed victory in the clash.

U.S. officials have downplayed speculation about oil in Darfur. Andrew S. Natsios, the Bush administration's special envoy for Darfur, dismissed criticism by some Sudanese that the U.S. interests in Darfur might be linked to oil.

"We're unaware of any significant amount of oil in Darfur," Natsios told reporters recently. "It's a small amount down in the southeast corner."

Oil companies, however, have been expanding their exploration, despite security concerns that make drilling in Darfur dangerous. Wahbi, whose joint venture was the first to drill inside Darfur, said some parts of his territory, known as Block C, remain a no-go zone because of the fighting. The company recently got a government extension to conduct exploratory drilling because it has been unable to enter some areas.

"Our workers are foreign contractors, and we don't want to put them at risk," Wahbi said.

Before drilling, his company meets with local tribal leaders to explain their work, he said. To appease concerns, the company has built six water wells for local communities affected by the drilling and treated hundreds in the company's mobile health clinic.

The company started drilling in late 2004 and accelerated it in 2005 and 2006. So far, workers have hit only dry wells, but three wells recently showed evidence of oil in the past. Company engineers are now chasing the suspected path of the crude.

"Every day we are getting more information," Wahbi said. "We are getting closer." He noted that his concession is adjacent to some of Sudan's top-producing oil regions, controlled by China National and others.

Advanced Petroleum is unique among Sudan's oil ventures because it is the only concession that is owned entirely by Sudanese investors, including private companies and the state government in Khartoum. Previously, the joint venture included Swiss-based Cliveden Group, but the company sold its stake a year ago because of U.S. pressure over Darfur, Wahbi said.

Morocco To Present Sahara Autonomy Plan (AP)

By John Thorne, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 3, 2007

Morocco will present an autonomy plan for Western Sahara to the United Nations next month in hopes of ending a three-decade conflict that has stranded 160,000 refugees in the Sahara, a top Moroccan official said Friday.

The plan would give the disputed region a parliament, a chief of state, Cabinet ministries and a judiciary that would oversee day-to-day life, said Khalihenna Ould Errachid, King Mohamed VI's chief adviser on the territory.

Morocco, which took control of Western Sahara in the 1970s after Spain pulled out, says autonomy is the only way to end a conflict with the Polisario Front, an Algerian-backed independence movement. It first proposed autonomy in 2000.

The Polisario Front, though, insists on holding a referendum on independence. Morocco says a vote would be unworkable.

The stalled conflict has left refugees in bleak camps in the Algerian Sahara, poisoned relations between Morocco and Algeria, and inflicts heavy costs on Morocco, already struggling with widespread poverty and unemployment.

Last fall, key members of the U.N. Security Council made clear they wanted real progress on Western Sahara before the U.N. mission's current mandate runs out on April 30. The autonomy plan is expected to be presented at the U.N. in April.

"We can stay at an impasse, or seek a middle way that leaves neither winners nor losers — and that's autonomy," Ould Errachid said Wednesday in the first of two interviews this week.

A Western Sahara parliament could create laws — as long as they do not violate Morocco's national law, while regional courts would fall under the Moroccan legal system, he said.

The regional government would oversee areas like education, tourism and social services. Morocco would retain control of foreign relations, defense, finance and border control, he said.

Western Sahara would also keep Morocco's flag, currency and stamps. King Mohamed VI would continue to be recognized as the highest religious authority in the land.

Morocco currently subsidizes life for Western Sahara's 50,000 to 90,000 Saharawis and 200,000 Moroccan settlers. Under autonomy, the territory will be expected to pay its own way, Ould Errachid said.

Western Sahara boasts phosphates, fisheries and possible offshore oil, but the territory's disputed status has prevented their full exploitation. Last year, the European Union signed a fishing deal with Morocco allowing European fisherman to fish Western Sahara's waters.

Morocco and Mauritania split Western Sahara after its Spanish colonizers ceded them the territory in 1975. Full-scale war with the Polisario Front broke out in 1976, and Morocco took over most of Western Sahara after Mauritania pulled out in 1979.

The U.N. has said it upholds the principle of self-determination and that any solution to Western Sahara must be accepted by both Morocco and Polisario.

The U.N. brokered a cease-fire in 1991 and installed a mission to pave the way for an independence referendum. Morocco refused a 2003 U.N. peace plan, accepted by Polisario, that envisaged temporary autonomy followed by a referendum in which both Saharawis and Moroccan settlers would vote.

Will Freedom Bloom In The Desert? (NYT)

By Frederick Vreeland

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

Rome

A YEAR ago, unusually heavy rain storms destroyed half of the camps in Algeria where some 90,000 refugees from the disputed territory of the Western Sahara have been eking out a miserable existence for more than 30 years.

I have been involved in North African affairs for 40 years, and for most of that time the problem of the Western Sahara has envenomed relations among its neighbors and immiserated the Saharan population.

Thankfully, Morocco's young king, Mohammed VI, has devised a proposal for granting autonomous status to this region, and it behooves all members of the United Nations Security Council to support it. Here is a rare instance, in the post-9/11 world, in which a little encouragement from the United States and other nations could pay large dividends, fostering not only a final resolution for the region's refugees but also creating a stable North African peace for the first time in decades — a peace that would serve as a bulwark against Islamic extremism.

The Western Sahara, a Colorado-sized desert land on the Atlantic bordered by Algeria, Mauritania and Morocco, has deep roots in Moroccan history. It is here that the 11th-century Moroccans who founded the Andalusian empire, which stretched from Mauritania deep into Spain, originated.

DOJ_NMG_0140396

Spain colonized the territory in 1884, then abandoned it in 1976. Around that time, thousands of unarmed Moroccans streamed into the Western Sahara and effectively reclaimed it for their homeland.

But neighboring Algeria helped create and then lent armed support to the Polisario Front, a guerrilla group that resisted Moroccan rule. The group's putative aim is independence for the Western Sahara, but it is worth noting that Algeria would gain a great deal by dominating an area with phosphate reserves and an Atlantic coastline.

For many years there was fierce fighting, from which tens of thousands of families fled, and eventually came under the care of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. Though the violence concluded with a United Nations-brokered cease-fire in 1991, the Western Sahara's inhabitants remain caught in the unresolved conflict. Almost a quarter of the 400,000 Saharans, or Sahrawis, are living under deplorable conditions in Algeria, generally unable to leave the refugee camps, communicate with the outside world or maintain their traditional nomadic way of life.

While Morocco exercises control over the greater part of the Western Sahara and has an "open door" policy toward the refugees, the Polisario has made it virtually impossible for those Sahrawis living in the camps in southern Algeria to return. Holding on to the refugees is their strategy for "governing" these people, who exist solely on international assistance. Particularly troubling is the fact that the younger ones have never known life outside these bleak camps.

Enter Mohammed VI. Since assuming the throne seven years ago, the Moroccan king has brought about vital domestic reforms, including elevating and protecting the status of women, as well as establishing an independent commission to face up to Morocco's human rights record. In an effort to advance the Western Sahara issue, the king studied contemporary models of territorial conflict resolution to see which solutions proved viable and durable in similar situations around the world. He created an advisory council to gather the views of both Moroccans and the Sahrawi.

The result? After a year-long national discussion, Morocco is to propose, at the United Nations in April, a plan to establish the Western Sahara as an autonomous region under Moroccan sovereignty. Autonomy would provide effective self-determination for the Sahrawis, allowing for local decision-making and control over economic, social, linguistic and cultural issues. Successful autonomy regions like this exist elsewhere. The Trentino-Alto Adige region in Italy and the autonomous region of Madeira in Portugal are examples, as are Catalonia and the Basque Provinces in Spain. The creation of these quasi-states has unlocked longstanding disputes once thought resolvable only by force.

Mohammed VI is seeking a solution to the Western Sahara dispute based on common ground rather than conflict. His act of leadership is in everyone's interest. It is no secret that the young people in these horrible camps are prey for recruitment by Al Qaeda and local terrorist groups. Indeed, Algeria's most murderous terrorist group recently renamed itself Al Qaeda of the Islamic Maghreb, signaling its wider designs on the region.

This is why it is vital that the Security Council accept Morocco's proposal for an autonomous region and not be pushed into a debate for full Western Saharan independence. A weak independent state would likely morph into a terrorist-controlled one.

This is also why the United States must be forthright in its support for the Moroccan proposal. We would be aiding a modernizing, moderate Islamic country, and a strategic ally. More urgently and no less important, we would be helping the Western Sahara's people to regain their lost liberties and their right to peaceful existence.

8 Sentenced In Morocco For Plotting Terror Attacks (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

PARIS, March 2 — A Moroccan court on Friday sentenced eight Islamists to prison terms of up to 15 years for plotting terrorist attacks in France, Italy and Morocco, the government news agency in Morocco reported.

The eight included a Tunisian man, Muhammad Benhedi Msahel, who Moroccan prosecutors said was the leader of an Islamist cell in Milan with ties to North Africa's largest terrorist organization, the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat.

Counterterrorism officials point to Mr. Msahel as evidence that the Salafist Group is organizing militants across North Africa to bring the remnants of Al Qaeda into a new international force for jihad. In January, the group changed its name to Al Qaeda of the Islamic Maghreb.

European counterterrorism officials in particular are worried about the group because it is within easy striking distance of the Continent. Last year its leader, Abdelmalek Droukdel, singled out France as a target for attacks. United States officials are concerned because American interests have also been designated as targets.

Mr. Msahel and his colleagues were arrested in March last year after the arrest in Morocco in late 2005 of Anour Majrar, who told interrogators that he had visited the Salafist Group's leaders in Algeria with Mr. Msahel and an Algerian man, Amir Laaraj, who is still at large.

DOJ_NMG_0140397

Moroccan prosecutors charged Mr. Msahel and Mr. Majrar with being part of a terrorist network that was planning attacks on the Paris Metro, Orly Airport and the headquarters of France's domestic intelligence agency, as well as Milan's police headquarters and the Basilica of San Petronio in Bologna, whose 15th-century fresco depicts the Prophet Muhammad in hell.

More than a dozen people have been arrested in Algeria, France and Italy in connection with the case. Mr. Majrar was sentenced in February to seven years in prison. The people arrested in Algeria, Italy and France have yet to be tried.

Venezuela And Iran Strengthen Ties With Caracas-to-Tehran Flight (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, March 3, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela, March 2 — Iran is already Venezuela's closest ally outside Latin America, with ventures to produce oil and build cars and tractors together. Now, travelers between the countries can also take a weekly flight between Caracas and Tehran.

The flight, which was inaugurated here on Friday and includes a stop in Damascus, Syria, is operated in a code-share agreement by the Venezuelan state-controlled airline Conviasa and Iran's national carrier, Iran Air.

Officials at Conviasa said that the company would use a Boeing 747 on the route and that soon it would also make available a European-made Airbus 340.

Under President Hugo Chávez, Venezuela has tightened relations with Iran and expressed explicit support for its uranium enrichment program.

Mr. Chávez has also reached out to Syria, making plans to build a $1.5 billion oil refining complex there. He sees relations with Iran and Syria, both under United States sanctions, as a centerpiece of a foreign policy aimed at countering American influence around the world.

Mr. Chávez "is much loved in our country, and our people want to come here to get to know this land," Abdullah Zifan, Iran's ambassador to Venezuela, said when plans for the flight were announced last month.

Venezuela is considering extending its economic cooperation agreements to the military sphere. It is discussing a venture with Iran to produce remotely piloted aircraft that could be used for surveillance along the border with Colombia.

Iranian officials are already a staple of state television shows here, invited to discuss the country's array of agreements in Venezuela, including one to produce Peugeot-inspired Semand sedans at a plant that is expected to start commercial output near Caracas this month.

For Conviasa, the Tehran route will raise its international profile. The airline said in a statement that it would "offer excellent service at solidarity prices," although no one at Conviasa could immediately say what a ticket to Tehran would cost.

Haiti's Lost Boys (WP)

Port-au-Prince Prison Reflects Overwhelming Problems Facing Country's Children

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti -- In a small, walled courtyard ringed by coiled razor wire, a scrappy little boy punched and kicked at the humid air.

Mackenzy Sonson strutted one moment, cowered the next. Acted like a big man, then slipped into baby talk.

"I'm not tough," he said on a recent afternoon. Then he smacked a kid twice his size.

Mackenzy, better known as "Little Baron," lives in Cell C-4, back wall, bottom bunk, at Fort Dimanche, Port-au-Prince's children's prison. Cellmates dubbed him Baron because his dark black skin reminds them of Baron Samedi, the voodoo spirit who is believed to guard passage to the underworld. The "little" is obvious -- he says he's 8 years old.

This place where Little Baron is growing up, where he discovered Donald Duck cartoons and is learning to read, is a gallery of Haiti's woes. The boys warehoused at Fort Dimanche are the products of poverty, child abandonment, rampant homelessness and an educational system that has failed to enroll 1 million school-age children. Their plight reflects a country overwhelmed by the problems of its young -- more than 200,000 Haitian children have lost one or both parents to AIDS and 300,000 work as unpaid domestic servants in a system of bonded servitude, according to the U.N. Children's Fund.

Hardly any of the 120 boys at Fort Dimanche know when -- or if -- they will be released. Some were undoubtedly recruited to be child soldiers in gangs that lured them with food and shelter in return for help in kidnappings and robberies. Others are imprisoned here for years for minor crimes or are innocents nabbed in neighborhood sweeps by a notoriously corrupt police force, children's advocates say.

"This is where you see the total failure of the justice system," said Maryse Penette-Kedar, head of PRODEV, a foundation that is trying to improve conditions in the children's jail. "It's incompetence. It's total lack of management. People can't be in jail forever."

Haiti's dysfunctional criminal justice system offers no formal process for freeing child inmates, Penette-Kedar said. Those who have been formally charged are often accused of crimes as vague as "associating with bad people."

Some of the inmates of this hillside prison were as young as 6 when they arrived, although determining their true ages is an inexact science. The street kids who show up at the prison in Haiti generally come without birth certificates or parents; some don't even know their birthdays.

Penette-Kedar's organization -- backed in part by money from pop star Wyclef Jean's charitable foundation, Yele Haiti -- has begun a unique transformation of Fort Dimanche, hoping to make it Haiti's first child rehabilitation center. Young inmates who were once kept in lockdown 23 hours a day now get regular exercise and attend classes inside the prison.

Fort Dimanche, which means "Sunday Fort," sits on a craggy hillside in Delmas 33, a neighborhood of tightly packed cinder-block homes. The one-story children's wing, housing inmates up to age 17, is just steps away from a larger building where adult offenders are kept. There is always a line of visitors for the adult prison, but few come to see the children, most of whom are abandoned or orphaned.

The prison, for all its deprivations, can be a refuge from a hostile environment. Children have asked not to be released, Penette-Kedar said. A few parents have begged officials to imprison their children, even when they have not been accused of a crime, because they believe Fort Dimanche is safer than the streets. Several children were murdered by gang members shortly after being released because of suspicions that they gained their freedom by becoming informants.

But releases are few at Fort Dimanche, and a relentless stream of youngsters flows into the prison, the loud clang of metal gates signaling the beginning of an ordeal with no foreseeable end.

Little Baron's path to Fort Dimanche began on Port-au-Prince's airport road, where street children live amid the stench of rotting mountains of garbage. Like countless Haitian children, he was pushed into the streets by parents who couldn't afford to raise him, he says. By age 5, he was sleeping in the rusted carcasses of burned cars and picking through garbage heaps for food.

With no government social services to aid him, Little Baron gravitated toward "the big guys," his name for the young thugs who dominate the slums where he foraged. He became a kind of gofer, running errands that he won't talk about.

"I did favors," he said cautiously during a break between classes. "I did what I had to do to eat."

One of those favors -- he won't say which -- landed him a year ago at Fort Dimanche and Cell C-4. He shares the approximately 20-by-12-foot cell with 28 other boys, 13 of whom sleep on the concrete floor because there are not enough bunks. The cell has its own hierarchy -- one of the oldest boys at the prison, a lanky 16-year-old, decides who sleeps on the floor.

"Some of these big guys are rapists and kidnappers," Little Baron whispered. "They boss us around."

When the cell door latched shut one recent afternoon, the noise inside was deafening, and the nearby latrine cast a foul odor into the crowded space. Little Baron took a flying leap into his bunk, trailed by a skinny kid who caught up with him and pounded him in the ribs.

In the next bunk, 11-year-old Ricardo Exgentis broke into a rap song he'd written during an arts class.

"Life is not easy," Ricardo rapped in sing-songy Creole. "Separation. We don't know our brother, our sister. We living like dogs. That's bad for Haiti."

Ricardo, who was arrested for banditry and sent here more than two years ago, took his first shower at Fort Dimanche. Living on the streets, he washed only when he could afford a bucket of cold water. In prison, Penette-Kedar's group has taught him how to bathe properly and brush his teeth.

But the shower still feels new and strange to Ricardo. He says he feels uncomfortable being naked among all those boys and sometimes flees without rinsing off the soap.

Talking about prison life made him angry. Rapping offered an escape.

"Give me a chance, that way I'll be able to tell the truth," he sang. "I'm rapping for all the kids in prison. I'm rapping for the mothers that's trying to make something out of nothing."

Ricardo's rapping was drowned out by the wall-mounted television clicking on. Three boys climbed onto an upper bunk and leaned forward, entranced by the explosions and the rat-a-tat-tat of machine guns in an action movie featuring Asian film star Chow Yun-Fat.

Pierre Sonson, a pensive 10-year-old who is not related to Little Baron, raved about Chow's clothes. He and the other inmates wear hand-me-downs, some with unlikely provenances. The boy next to him was decked out in a "Girls Softball" T-shirt from Sonoma, Calif., wine country.

"They look clean, they look like they smell good," Pierre said of the actors. "I'd like to smell good."

DOJ_NMG_0140399

When the movie ended, Pierre and Jenson Germain, 11, talked excitedly about an upcoming holiday.

"There will be bands," Jenson said, his voice rising.

They smiled at the thought, but they were soon frowning. A tall boy with a knife scar on his face had butted roughly into the conversation. "You're not going to be released for the party," he said. "Face it, you're not going to have any fun."

Jenson, who has been imprisoned for nearly two years, gulped back what might have been a sign of weakness -- a tear. "I don't cry," he said a few minutes later.

Little Baron, tugging at his waistband, sidled up next to Jenson. The prison has no pants small enough for him, so he strings a shoelace through two belt loops and pulls it tight. Little Baron thrust his right foot into the air, imitating a karate kick he saw on television. His pants slipped to his knees. He and Jenson fell onto a bunk laughing.

Outside, a woman walked into the courtyard. This was a rare sight -- a mother visiting her son.

Yola Aeme settled onto a bench and stared wordlessly at her 16-year-old son, Antoine Menchy, who has spent a year and a half here. Aeme, 38, still seethes about the day her son was arrested. She was frantic when he didn't come home. No one had told her about the arrest.

"There's nobody I can see or talk to, no lawyer or anybody," Aeme said dejectedly. "I have no hope that they'll release him."

Antoine bunks next to a wisecracking 16-year-old with delicate, curled eyelashes named Rikensen Louis. Rikensen spends great chunks of his free time hunched over a pad of paper composing letters that he tries, always unsuccessfully, to persuade prison guards to relay to a judge.

"How you doing, Majesty?" Rikensen wrote recently. "I already spent 10 months in prison without knowing why would you think of me mister?"

Rikensen, who says he was imprisoned for stealing a radiator, stuffs his letters into a purple shirt. He always writes exactly the same words. Over and over. He's lost count of how many letters he has written.

When he gets mad, he throws out all the letters and vows to stop writing. But weeks pass with no sign of hope, he said, and soon he finds himself writing those same words all over again.

Chechnya Legislature Confirms Putin Pick (AP)

By Musa Sadulayev, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 3, 2007

Chechnya's parliament approved a widely feared former security chief as president of the war-battered Russian republic in a nearly unanimous vote Friday, a day after President Vladimir Putin nominated him.

The confirmation of Ramzan Kadyrov, which had been seen as a foregone conclusion, cements his rise to power. His nomination won 56 votes in the 58-member, two-chamber legislature, with two ballots ruled invalid.

Human rights groups allege that security forces under Kadyrov's control abduct and torture civilians suspected of ties to Chechnya's separatist rebels. Some observers suggest he was tied to last year's murder of Anna Politkovskaya, a journalist who had reported extensively on Chechnya's wars and sufferings. Kadyrov has denied any involvement.

Kadyrov also is credited with a reconstruction boom that he administered as the region's prime minister, under which the capital, Grozny, is being transformed from a moonscape of rubble and shattered buildings in a region devastated by two separatist wars since the Soviet collapse.

Kadyrov has been at the heart of a Kremlin strategy to crush continued rebel resistance and establish order in the mostly Muslim region. He turned 30 in October, the minimum age for president, and had been expected to seek the job.

He became acting president after last week's dismissal of Alu Alkhanov, who had increasingly criticized Kadyrov.

Kadyrov is the son of Chechnya's first pro-Moscow president, Akhmad Kadyrov, who was assassinated in 2004. The elder Kadyrov became president in 2003 in a Kremlin-conducted aimed at undermining rebels by creating the image of Chechens being allowed a high degree of self-determination.

As prime minister, the younger Kadyrov led a largely federally funded campaign to rebuild the region. Two wars in the past dozen years between Russian forces and separatist rebels who increasingly voiced militant Islamic ideology left much of the republic in ruins and its people gripped by fear and resentment.

Major offensives died down early this decade, but small clashes continue and rebels attack Russian forces with booby-traps and remotely detonated explosives.

Construction and repairs have transformed the capital, Grozny, and the second-largest city, Gudermes. Buildings have been plastered with banners praising Kadyrov and his late father, part of a personality cult he claims to oppose.

But prominent Russian groups boycotted a human rights conference in Grozny this week, saying that attending would lend his government legitimacy. Council of Europe human rights commissioner Thomas Hammarberg, who was at the conference, said Friday that Chechnya continues to be plagued by allegations of torture and by officials' failure to respond to families seeking information about missing relatives.

Hammarberg declined to comment when asked for his opinion on Kadyrov as president and he did not point to Kadyrov's forces as responsible for abuses.

Of the detainees whom he interviewed in Chechnya that complained of torture, "several of them pointed at the activities of the federal police," he said in Moscow.

He recommended that Chechnya set up a "truth commission" similar to those in Latin American countries to try to bring those responsible for abuses to light.

Analysts say Putin has entrusted Kadyrov with power in part because he is seen as the only person who can keep large numbers of former rebels under control. Many former rebels now serve in the police and security forces.

But his growing clout is also seen as a risk for the Kremlin, particularly after Putin steps down at the end of his second term next year. Some see Kadyrov's loyalty to Russia as closely tied to his relationship with Putin.

Kadyrov has repeatedly praised Putin but has criticized the Russian government and the state-run oil company OAO Rosneft, calling for greater economic freedom for Chechnya and for a larger share of its oil revenues.

Analysts say that with the power to foment new turmoil in fragile Chechnya and create serious problems for Russia, he could take a more demanding stance if his relations with the Kremlin become clouded.

The first war between rebels and Moscow's forces began in December 1994 and ended 20 months later with a humiliating Russian withdrawal after rebels fought them to standstill. Three years of de-facto independence followed, during which Chechnya became notoriously lawless, plagued by kidnappings and increasingly influenced by militant Islam.

Fighting resumed in 1999 after Chechen insurgents invaded neighboring Dagestan, apparently aiming to set up an Islamic caliphate, and after some 300 people were killed in apartment bombings that Russian authorities blamed on the rebels.

Chechen rebels have been involved in most of the terrorist attacks that have plagued Russia for more than a decade.

Chechnya's Reins In Strongman's Hands (LAT)

By David Holley

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

The legislature in Grozny approves pro-Moscow Ramzan Kadyrov as president.

MOSCOW — A Kremlin-backed strongman who has spearheaded efforts to pacify war-battered Chechnya through a mix of repression and economic reconstruction won legislative approval Friday as the southern region's president.

Ramzan Kadyrov, the son of a former president of the republic of Chechnya who was assassinated in 2004, previously was prime minister. He has been the most powerful figure in the region since his father's death. However, he turned 30, the minimum age for the top post, only in October. Russian President Vladimir V. Putin nominated him for the position Thursday.

Kadyrov expressed his appreciation and loyalty to Putin in televised remarks Friday, declaring that "there is support and understanding from the supreme commander in chief, and it only remains to serve him hand and foot."

Kadyrov won parliamentary approval with 56 out of 58 votes, the Russian news agency RIA Novosti reported.

During the first Chechnya war, from 1994 to 1996, Kadyrov and his father, Akhmad Kadyrov, joined separatist rebels who won de facto self-rule for the republic. But the two men switched to the pro-Moscow side when Russian forces returned to Chechnya in 1999, launching the second Chechnya war.

Ramzan Kadyrov headed the presidential security force at the time of his father's death in a bombing in the Chechen capital of Grozny. He subsequently built up a powerful personal militia that was composed largely of other former rebels granted amnesty after switching sides.

Human rights organizations have frequently accused Kadyrov's militia of human rights abuses including kidnappings, torture and murder, allegations that he denies. Russian federal forces in Chechnya also have been accused of such abuses against civilians and suspected separatists.

In recent years, pro-Russia forces have killed several top separatist leaders. The strength of the insurgency has faded even as Moscow has granted ever-greater autonomy to the pro-Kremlin Chechen government.

Putin dismissed former Chechen President Alu Alkhanov last month, paving the way for Kadyrov. While Alkhanov and Kadyrov denied there was a power struggle, they had engaged in increasingly open disagreements in recent months.

Dmitry Kozak, Putin's envoy in southern Russia, alluded to those differences in televised comments Friday.

"With Kadyrov's appointment, all those contradictions that had undermined the efficiency of the government in Chechnya have disappeared," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0140401

Alexei Malashenko, a Chechnya specialist at the Carnegie Moscow Center, said that despite questions about his commitment to human rights and democracy, Kadyrov has had some real achievements.

"Some called him simply a gangster, but Ramzan has managed to discharge three main obligations to the Chechen people," Malashenko said. "First, he established order in Chechnya, even though it is a totalitarian type of order. But before, it was not possible simply to walk around Grozny. Second, he promised amnesty to separatist fighters, and as a result most of them surrendered. Maybe 500 to 600 rebels remain, but they are not active right now. Third, Russian soldiers are not murdered anymore."

Speaking at a Moscow news conference Friday, Thomas Hammarberg, the European Union commissioner for human rights, praised the pace of reconstruction in Chechnya.

But Hammarberg said that Chechen and Russian authorities hadn't tried hard enough to provide information about people who disappeared during the fighting. About 2,600 people are officially counted as having disappeared, he said.

Hammarberg said that in his meetings with the Chechens, he stressed the issue of accounting for those who have disappeared and allegations that law enforcement officers torture suspects.

Courts in Chechnya place too much reliance on written confessions from defendants, and this creates an incentive for police to use beatings and electrical shocks to try to extract confessions, he said.

Prisoners he spoke with complained about their treatment immediately after arrest and during interrogation, the EU envoy said. "I'm convinced that much of what I heard has a real background, and that these kinds of illegal interrogation methods are used at a fairly wide scale."

Gangster President (WP)

The Washington Post, March 3, 2007

Meet Ramzan Kadyrov, Vladimir Putin's favorite Chechen criminal.

THIS WEEK Vladimir Putin delivered another clear message about the kind of state Russia is becoming. He did so by nominating as the new president of the republic of Chechnya a man named Ramzan Kadyrov -- an unspeakably savage and corrupt warlord. Mr. Kadyrov has done Mr. Putin a great service: Using his own militia -- gang might be a better term -- he has imposed order in the name of the Kremlin on most of the rebellious republic, allowing the Russian president to declare victory in the war he started more than seven years ago. The Chechen's reward is to be installed as official head of the republic's government, where he can be expected to promote a cult of personality, employ state resources for his personal aggrandizement and murder his opponents with impunity.

Mr. Kadyrov has already been pursuing this agenda for some time. He and his "kadyrovtsy" are feared throughout the shattered republic: They are known for grisly acts of torture, extortion, kidnapping, rape and murder. The heads of slain rebels are displayed in some villages as a warning against crossing the new leader. Opponents outside Chechnya aren't safe, either. One, Movladi Baisarov, was gunned down in November in the center of Moscow while police looked on. Another, the independent journalist Anna Politkovskaya, was murdered outside her apartment in October; Mr. Kadyrov is one of several suspected sponsors of her slaying. Mr. Putin has taken no action to clear up either case.

In one sense Mr. Putin's sponsorship of Mr. Kadyrov is a measure of his desperation to find a way out of the war he started, which killed some 80,000 Chechens, most of them civilians, as well as unreported thousands of Russian soldiers. The new president is not a very reliable puppet; a former rebel himself, he once said that his "hero" was Shamil Basayev, the Chechen terrorist who staged the bloody attacks on a Moscow theater and a school in the town of Beslan. Mr. Kadyrov has expressed interest in introducing elements of Islamic sharia law in Chechnya, whose population is Muslim. His loyalty to the Russian state is nominal. Only 30 years old, he is likely to evolve into a self-sustaining despot whom Moscow could dislodge only by force.

By installing him, Mr. Putin is telling the world that Russia has become a place where the most sadistic criminals can be political leaders, where the murder of opponents is openly sanctioned and where the only qualification that matters is loyalty to Mr. Putin. Luckily, perhaps, for the Russian president, George W. Bush and the other leaders of the Group of Seven democracies, who continue to treat Mr. Putin as a strategic partner, are doing their best to ignore that message.

Don't Go Cold On Turkey (WSJ)

By Mark R. Parris

The Wall Street Journal, March 3, 2007

Once again, a resolution has been introduced in the House of Representatives asserting that the forcible deportation and massacre of Armenians by the Ottoman Empire in 1915 was "genocide." But this time around the resolution, sponsored by Reps.

DOJ_NMG_0140402

Frank Pallone, Adam Schiff, George Radanovich and Joe Knollenberg (and over 170 co-sponsors), appears likely to pass. The result will be a train wreck with an important, longstanding American ally: Turkey.

It may never be the right time for one nation to pass legislation on another's history or morality, but there could be no worse time than now. It's a particularly sensitive moment in Turkish politics: A new president will be picked by parliament in late April (coinciding with Congress's likely decision on a resolution) and elections for a new parliament will follow by November. Based on current polling, Turkey by year's end could for the first time have a president, government, parliament and most municipalities under the control of a party -- Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan's ruling AK Party -- inclined to loosen the strict barriers set up by Ataturk between religion and state. One does not have to share secular fears of AKP's alleged "secret agenda" to Islamicize Turkish society to appreciate the strains this would generate in Turkish political life over the weeks and months ahead. Nor does it take much imagination to realize that, in such circumstances, Turkish politicians will compete with one another, should a resolution be passed, to show they cannot be pushed around by the U.S. Congress.

Turkish domestic politics isn't the only issue, however. This year will highlight the country's pivotal geography and relevance to U.S. strategic goals. As we struggle to find our footing in Iraq, for example, Turkey can either help or make our task much harder. Our forces in Iraq rely heavily on Turkey's Incirlik airbase for resupply. Turkish military intervention in the north, either to pre-empt cross-border terrorism by Turkish Kurdish PKK terrorists, or to stop Kirkuk from becoming part of the Kurdish federation, would complicate Gen. David Petraeus's already daunting assignment.

Then there is Iran. Will Turkey align itself with Washington and the West in efforts to ratchet up pressure against the Islamic Republic -- a major trading partner and ally against the PKK? Or will the Turks join Russia and others favoring a less-confrontational approach? And as the U.S. tries to forge a new alignment in the Middle East to roll back Iranian influence and restart Israeli-Palestinian talks, a Turkey that has both bulked up its influence in the Muslim world (particularly among Sunni Arabs) and kept its close relationship with Israel, will be an asset.

Turkey has quietly emerged as the prize in a new great game over who will develop and bring to world markets the vast oil and gas resources of former Soviet Central Asia. Experts know that Turkey will in the years ahead become one of the world's major energy hubs, supplied by new pipelines that will crisscross Anatolia. The question is whether this will happen according to Moscow's or Washington's vision of where those pipelines should run, and whose product should fill them. Ankara will likely make some of the key decisions this year.

Turkey goes into this defining year with its anchors to the West drifting or under strain. NATO, for decades the bedrock of Turkey's Western identity, particularly for its influential military, has lost luster as its mission has blurred. The European Union's ambivalence toward Turkey since formally beginning the accession process in October 2006 has soured many Turks on the project. Despite laudable garden-tending by senior officials on both sides, U.S.-Turkish relations haven't recovered the depth or breadth they had in the '90s; polls show anti-Americanism remains high in the Turkish "street." The winners have been Turkey's ultranationalists, whose vision of a Turkey that "goes it alone" and increasingly resorts to violence is chilling.

Some will interpret this analysis as realpolitik that simply postpones the moment when Turkey must deal with its pre-Republican history. That ignores the reality that Turks in growing numbers -- among them Nobel laureate Orhan Pamuk -- are speaking out in favor of a more candid debate on the events of 1915. Most fear their voices will be drowned out by the tsunami of nationalist outrage that a resolution will generate.

In the past, U.S. congressional leaders have repeatedly bowed to the findings of administrations of both parties that a genocide resolution would adversely affect vital American security interests. Given the equities America now has at stake in and around Turkey, those findings remain as valid as ever.

The U.S. has a lot of hard work to do in Turkey's neighborhood. In some cases, American lives will literally be at stake. Whatever the challenge we face in this troubled region, our success will be far more certain if we can work with Turkey, rather than having to work around it. The responsible choice for Congress's current leadership is to join their predecessors in concluding that passage of an Armenian genocide resolution does not serve American interests.

Mr. Parris, who was U.S. ambassador to Turkey from 1997 to 2000, is a visiting fellow at the Brookings Institution.

Risking Testy Justices and Faulty Justice

ADAM LIPTAK

What the Supreme Court says, goes. Usually.

But in a defiant decision two weeks ago, a federal appeals court in Washington conceded that it was ignoring parts of a 2004 Supreme Court decision on the rights of the men held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

That can make the Supreme Court testy, and it may help the detainees. Their lawyers plan to ask the court today to hear the case.

The Supreme Court has already twice reversed decisions about Guantanamo from the same court, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. Both times, the Supreme Court ruled for the detainees.

One more reversal will start to remind people of the Supreme Court's cross relationship with another appeals court. The justices have repeatedly rebuked the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, which hears appeals from inmates on Texas's death row, for dragging its feet in implementing Supreme Court decisions meant to limit the death penalty.

The Guantanamo cases are harder. On the one hand, the justices in the majority in the 2004 decision, Rasul v. Bush, certainly made statements indicating how they would decide a central issue in the new case, Boumediene v. Bush. But they made those statements in asides, in what lawyers call dicta.

They teach you in law school that only a decision's holdings count. Holdings are the narrow legal propositions on which decisions turn. Everything else -- all the observations and footnotes and erudition -- is dicta.

But the Supreme Court may be different, and judges on lower courts should probably listen to it with particular care. The court, after all, hears only a few cases, considers them thoroughly and, in painstaking and detailed decisions, often gives the lower courts broad guidance.

The dissenting appeals judge in the 2-to-1 decision in Boumediene, Judith W. Rogers, said her colleagues were thumbing their noses at the Supreme Court. She said they were "ignoring the Supreme Court's well-considered and binding dictum" concerning the historical roots and geographical scope of the prisoners' basic rights, and she cited a case from her own court that said that such statements "generally must be treated as authoritative."

The question sounds academic, if not impenetrable, but it matters. The Guantanamo docket has been moving with geological speed. If another Supreme Court reversal is inevitable, and if the court has already signaled how it will rule in Boumediene, it does the detainees a profound disservice for appeals court judges not to anticipate what the justices will do.

Almost three years ago, the Supreme Court ruled in Rasul that the detainees possessed an ancient and fundamental right -- the right to challenge the justness of their confinement in court by filing petitions for writs of habeas corpus.

In the crucial aside in Rasul, Justice John Paul Stevens, writing for the majority, said this right was not just a result of a law passed by Congress but was grounded in the Constitution. "Application of the habeas statute to persons detained at the base," he wrote, "is consistent with the historical reach of the writ of habeas corpus."

If that is right, a new law pushed by the Bush administration, the Military Commissions Act, could not have cut off the detainees' rights to habeas corpus. In a footnote, the appeals court majority basically acknowledged that. But it ruled that the Supreme Court's historical analysis was wrong and that Justice Stevens's dictum could be ignored. It upheld the new law.

Instead of looking to Rasul, which was recent and concerned Guantanamo, the appeals court justified its decision by citing a 1950 Supreme Court decision, Johnson v. Eisentrager. That case involved German citizens convicted of war crimes in China and held at a prison in Germany. The court ruled that they had no right to habeas corpus.

The court's reliance on Eisentrager was curious. Both Justice Antonin Scalia, dissenting in Rasul, and John Yoo, an architect of the Bush administration's post-9/11 legal strategy, have written that they understood Rasul to have overruled Eisentrager.

The Eisentrager court had, moreover, listed six factors supporting its conclusion that the German prisoners there had no habeas rights, among them that they were citizens of a country we had been at war with, that they had been tried and convicted by military tribunals and that they were imprisoned outside the United States.

All of these points, Justice Stevens wrote in Rasul, counted in favor of the Guantanamo detainees.

"They are not nationals of countries at war with the United States," Justice Stevens wrote, "and they deny that they have engaged in or plotted acts of aggression against the United States; they have never been afforded access to any tribunal, much less charged with and convicted of wrongdoing; and for more than two years they have been imprisoned in territory over which the United States exercises exclusive jurisdiction and control."

The detainees will ask the Supreme Court to put Boumediene on a fast track, and it may not be long until we hear from Justice Stevens again.

Appeals Court Upholds Dismissal of Abuse Suit

By ADAM LIPTAK

A German citizen who says he was kidnapped and abused by the Central Intelligence Agency cannot seek redress in court because his lawsuit would expose state secrets, a United States Court of Appeals ruled yesterday in Richmond, Va.

There is substantial evidence that the plaintiff in the suit, Khaled el-Masri, a German citizen of Lebanese descent, was subjected to the C.I.A.'s practice of extraordinary rendition, in which terrorism suspects are seized and sent for interrogation to other countries.

In June 2006, a report issued by the Council of Europe concluded that Mr. Masri's account of having been abducted and mistreated was substantially accurate. In January, a German court issued arrest warrants for 13 people it said were involved in the matter. Prosecutors would not identify the suspects.

The Central Intelligence Agency has never acknowledged any role in Mr. Masri's detention.

Mr. Masri said in his suit that he was seized by local law enforcement officials while on vacation in Macedonia on New Year's Eve in 2003. After 23 days, he said, he was handed over to C.I.A. operatives, who flew him to a secret C.I.A. prison near Kabul, Afghanistan.

In Afghanistan, Mr. Masri said, he was held in a small, filthy cell where he was drugged, beaten and interrogated. At the end of May 2004, he was released in a remote part of Albania.

In December 2005, Mr. Masri sued George Tenet, a former director of the C.I.A., three private companies, and employees of the agency and the companies. He said that Mr. Tenet and the C.I.A. operatives had violated the Constitution's due process clause, and that all of the defendants were liable under a federal law that allows some injury suits for violations of international laws prohibiting arbitrary detention and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment.

In May 2006, Judge T. S. Ellis III, of the Federal District Court in Alexandria, Va., dismissed the suit under the so-called state secrets privilege. The privilege can require courts to limit or dismiss suits that might disclose information harmful to national security. The decision yesterday, by the Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, affirmed that ruling.

"We recognize the gravity of our conclusions that el-Masri must be denied a judicial forum for his complaint," Judge Robert B. King wrote for a unanimous three-judge panel of the court. "The inquiry is a difficult one, for its pits the judiciary's search for truth against the executive's duty to maintain the nation's security."

Lawyers for the American Civil Liberties Union, which represents Mr. Masri, said there was enough public information about his ordeal to allow his suit to be adjudicated without endangering national security. The appeals court disagreed, saying that Mr. Masri could not win his case without exposing "how the C.I.A. organizes, staffs and supervises its most sensitive intelligence operations."

Furthermore, the court continued, the defendants "could not properly defend themselves without using privileged evidence."

Judge King gave examples of the problems the defendants would face. "If, for example, the truth is that el-Masri was detained by the C.I.A. but his description of his treatment is inaccurate, that fact could be established only by disclosure of the actual circumstances of his detention, and its proof would require testimony by the personnel involved."

Anthony D. Romero, the executive director of the A.C.L.U., said that the court's decision had been "truly unbelievable" and that his group was "very seriously looking at all the avenues before us" for an appeal to the full appeals court or to the United States Supreme Court.

"Actions like this are reminiscent of third world countries," Mr. Romero said. "It's just not tenable to have the C.I.A. unaccountable for its most egregious violations of human rights."

Prison attack spawns lawsuit; Two former inmates at the U.S. Penitentiary allege that prison officials were negligent.

ROBERT A. CRONKLETON, The Kansas City Star

Two former U.S . Penitentiary inmates have sued the government, claiming that Leavenworth officials were negligent when they placed a suspect in a prison homicide in the inmates' cell.

Albert C. McCoy of Washington, D.C., and his nephew Anthony McCoy, currently imprisoned at the U.S. Penitentiary in Coleman, Fla., say they were attacked by the inmate.

The lawsuit was moved Thursday to U.S. District Court in Kansas City, Kan. It was initially filed in Washington last August.

Albert McCoy seeks $800,000 in damages for personal injury. His nephew seeks $600,000.

Prison officials could not be reached for comment Friday.

Jim Cross, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Kansas, said that the office had not been served with a copy of the lawsuit.

The suit involves a Dec. 31, 2002, death at the penitentiary.

Albert McCoy claims that he was punched in the face by an unnamed inmate and that shortly thereafter, that inmate was killed -- stabbed 28 times.

According to the suit, prison officials found a trail of blood leading from the scene of the stabbing to the cell of another inmate. Officials placed that second inmate, as well as McCoy, in detention pending an investigation. Two days later, McCoy's nephew was placed in the same cell as McCoy.

Then, in August 2003, prison officials placed the second inmate in the same cell as the McCoys, despite their desire that he not be housed with them.

About 10 days later, the McCoys claim, the inmate stabbed Albert McCoy 25 times and Anthony McCoy five times.

During the attack, the inmate allegedly said that Albert McCoy had been "snitching on him," which McCoy claims was not true.

The McCoys claim officials knew or should have known that the attacks were foreseeable.

Government recovers on Stark violation for payments made by mistake and unjust enrichment

A home health agency (HHA) that submitted false claims to Medicare between 1999 and 2001 was liable to the government under theories of unjust enrichment and payments by mistake because the payments were made in violation of Stark II, which was enforceable prior to the issuance of final regulations in 2001.

Payments by mistake

The HHA accepted referrals from five physicians with whom it had financial relationships in violation of Stark. None of the arrangements satisfied the personal service arrangement exception. The physicians testified that they did not provide any legitimate advisory services as set forth in the agreements and were compensated for providing standard care to their patients or for doing nothing. The actual services performed were not specified in the agreement, not reasonably necessary, and exceeded fair market value.

Unjust enrichment

The HHA argued that the government should not recover under the unjust enrichment theory because the provider agreements between the HHA and the Medicare program constitute a contract for which there are various legal remedies available, such as breach of contract, administrative remedies under Stark II, criminal penalties and fines under the Anti-Kickback Act, and monetary damages under the False Claims

Act. Those remedies, however, arise under federal, not state, law. Breach of contract is not available because Medicare Provider Agreements create statutory, not contractual, rights. A showing of wrongful conduct, such as knowingly submitting a false claim, is required to establish guilt under the Anti-Kickback Act or liability under the False Claims Act; under Stark II, ". . . the United States is not required to pursue an administrative action before seeking an overpayment action under theories of unjust enrichment or payment by mistake." According to the court, judicial economy and legislative intent would not be served by requiring the government to pursue its legal remedies.

Vaccine controversy featured in novel by award-winning author Sarah Collins Honenberger

Inspired by an actual case, attorney-turned-author Sarah Collins Honenberger brings to light the reality of vaccine injuries and the controversies over the government's Vaccine Injury Compensation Fund in her new novel, White Lies: A Tale of Babies, Vaccines, and Deception.

Honenberger credits the widespread interest in this particular book to the subject matter—vaccine injuries and the recent medical link between childhood vaccinations and autism. Autism, classified by the National Institute of Health as an epidemic in December 2005, affects 1 in 166 children. The families of those children are filing for assistance to the same government compensation fund that figures in Honenberger's fictional version of real events involving one baby's seizures from the DPT vaccination.

"The manufacturers and the government made certain promises to the parents who were exposing their children to the risks in order to protect the general population from the disease. Then when the claims started coming in, they changed the statute so that it's harder to prove the link. It's like changing the rules after the cards are dealt." Honenberger, having practiced law for over twenty-five years, argues she is not advocating against vaccines. "Vaccines, properly tested and cautiously approved, reduce disease. But blind acceptance of a mandated vaccination schedule puts some children more at risk than others. Informed decisions and re-evaluations after an adverse reaction are a safer course."

Because White Lies is inspired by one mother's quest for the truth about her baby's seizures and brain damage, Honenberger hopes her book will help spread the word about vaccine-associated risks. "This mother is so upbeat despite all the bad things that happened to her. She was my inspiration. She still is. She's feisty and outspoken, a great advocate. When she finally gave me permission to tell the story, she hoped the book would encourage other families whose children had an adverse reaction to investigate before allowing a booster. And to go forward and file for assistance."

Cedar Creek Publishing, Honenberger's publisher, believes White Lies is more than an opportunity to raise awareness for vaccine injury issues. Publisher, Linda M. Layne, says, "Like a watercolor artist, Sarah has creatively blended a good book of fiction using a palette of true experiences and raw emotions that take you into the minds of the characters and to the heart of the events. It's a story of conflict and loss, hope and redemption for a grieving mother and her disillusioned attorney."

Honenberger's talent for writing fiction has netted her first place awards in The Antietam Review, New Millenium, SouthLit and The HooK. When she's not writing, she's teaching creative writing, judging writing contests, appearing on literary panels at book festivals, or editing manuscripts for other writers. Currently she's on tour and available to talk about her new book as well as writing about health-related political issues in fiction. To read more about White Lies and the author, see www.readwhitelies.com. White Lies is available at www.Amazon.com.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Privacy Board Approves Two US Surveillance Programs. The AP (3/6, Yen) reports, "A White House privacy board is giving its stamp of approval to two of the Bush administration's controversial surveillance programs — electronic eavesdropping and financial tracking — and says they do not violate citizens' civil liberties." The AP continues, "Democrats newly in charge of Congress quickly criticized the findings, which they said were questionable given some of the board members' close ties with the Bush administration. … 'Their current findings and any additional conclusions they reach will be taken with a grain of salt until they become fully independent,' said Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., who chairs the House Homeland Security Committee." The AP adds, "After operating mostly in secret for a year, the five-member Privacy and Civil Liberties Board is preparing to release its first report to Congress next week. … The report finds that both the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping program and the Treasury Department's monitoring of international banking transactions have sufficient privacy protections, three board members told The Associated Press in telephone interviews. … Both programs have multiple layers of review before sensitive information is accessed, they said." The AP notes, "The board's initial findings come as Congress is moving forward on measures to give the board more authority and make it more independent of the president. Created in late 2004, the panel was established as a compromise between Congress and the White House after a recommendation by the Sept. 11 commission. … Both conservative and liberal civil liberties groups have urged the members to aggressively review the eavesdropping program and have questioned whether board members would stand up to the president if he were flouting the law."

Study Said To Show Need For Redefinition Of Torture. The AP (3/6, Kole) reports, "Prisoners who endure poor or degrading treatment suffer much of the same long-term psychological distress as do captives who are tortured, suggests a study published Monday." The AP continues, "The study was based on interviews with victims of ill treatment and torture while imprisoned in the former Yugoslavia, and experts said the findings underscored the need for a broader definition of torture. … 'What is the basis for the distinction between torture and other cruel and degrading treatment? Science should inform this debate,' the study's lead author, Metin Basoglu of the Institute of Psychiatry at King's College in London, told The Associated Press in a telephone interview. The study was published in the Archives of General Psychiatry." The AP adds, "Steve H. Miles of the University of Minnesota's Center for Bioethics, who was not involved in the study, said the findings 'show that the severity of long-lasting adverse mental effects is unrelated to whether the torture or degrading treatment is physical or psychological.' … 'The wrongness of these inflicted harms is compounded by the fact that most abused prisoners, including those in the present war on terror, are innocent or ignorant of terrorist activities,' Miles said." The AP notes, "The Bush administration has said the U.S. uses legal interrogation techniques — not torture — to gain information that could head off terror attacks. It insists that the U.S. complies with the U.N. Convention Against Torture. … Yet Washington's definition of torture, as interpreted by the U.S. Justice Department after reports of American abuses at Guantanamo Bay and in Iraq and Afghanistan surfaced, is fairly narrow. … It excludes mental pain and suffering created by acts that do not cause severe physical pain, such as blindfolding, hooding, forced nudity, isolation and deprivation of sleep or light, the researchers said, citing a Dec. 30, 2004, Justice Department memo. The document also contends that for an act to be considered torture, there must be proof that it inflicts 'prolonged mental harm.' … 'The implications of such a narrow definition of torture have raised serious concerns in the human rights community,' said the study. 'These findings suggest that physical pain per se is not the most important determinant of traumatic stress in survivors of torture.'"

AFP (3/6, Daly) reports, "Researchers who evaluated the mental health of soldiers and civilians tortured during the 1990s Balkan wars found that victims of psychological abuse were just as likely to suffer from post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) and depression as victims of classic physical torture methods. … The researchers also reported that the torture victims rated some techniques such as stress positions, isolation, sleep deprivation and blindfolding as distressing as most physical torture methods." AFP adds, "In 2003, lawyers for the US Justice Department and a Pentagon working group report on detainee interrogations made the case for a narrow definition of torture that excludes procedures such as blindfolding and hooding, forced nudity, isolation and other psychological manipulations. … The Justice Department memorandum argued that the scope of the term torture should be limited to those acts which could be shown to result in 'prolonged mental harm,' according to the study. … The development followed allegations of human rights abuses at US detention facilities in Iraq, Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. … However, the authors of this paper said that based on their analysis of the experiences of torture victims from the modern Balkans conflict, the US appears to be drawing a distinction without a difference."

High Court Hears Guantanamo Detainees' Request For Rights Guarantees. The AP (3/6, Sherman) reports, "Lawyers for Guantanamo detainees held more than five years without charges asked the Supreme Court Monday to step in a third time to guarantee that they can challenge their confinement in U.S. courts." The AP continues, "The detainees want the justices to hear their case and issue a decision before the Court ends its term in early summer. … 'Not only are these questions of paramount legal importance, but the extreme and worsening plight of the Guantanamo detainees make them questions of great humanitarian urgency as well,' lawyers for the detainees wrote in court papers urging the justices to decide the case." The AP adds, "The Court has twice ruled that foreigners imprisoned at the U.S. naval base in Cuba can pursue their cases in American courts, rejecting Bush administration arguments. … The latest Supreme Court appeal follows a federal appeals court ruling last month that limited detainees' legal rights. The 2-1 decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit upheld a key provision of the Military Commissions Act, which President George W. Bush pushed through Congress last year to set up a Defense Department system to prosecute terrorism suspects. Now, detainees must prove to three-officer military panels that they don't pose a terror threat. … Separately, the justices said they would not grant quick review in the cases of two other Guantanamo detainees who have been designated by the Pentagon to face criminal charges in front of a military tribunal."

WPost Calls Gitmo Prosecutors' Criticism Of Defense Lawyer "Disturbing." The Washington Post (3/6, A18, 690K), in an editorial, writes, "Cully Stimson…was the Pentagon official in charge of Guantanamo Bay prisoners who had to leave his post after suggesting that private law firms shouldn't be representing detainees. Now the Pentagon's chief Guantanamo prosecutor, Air Force Col. Morris Davis, has gotten into the attack-the-defense-lawyers act, this time complaining about the conduct of a military lawyer assigned to defend Australian David Hicks. … Hicks's outspoken military lawyer, Marine Maj. Michael Mori, has spent a good deal of time in Australia helping stir up public support for his client, and he has been unsparing in his criticism of the military tribunals." According to the Post, "Davis's unsubtle effort to quiet Maj. Mori may be even more disturbing than Mr. Stimson's remarks: It's not likely that private law firms are going to be intimidated out of representing their clients, but military lawyers who have to fear for their careers might think twice before zealously representing their clients."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

New York Officials Seek Extension Of Terrorism Risk Insurance Act. The New York Times (3/6, Cardwell, 1.16M) reports New York officials "urged Congress yesterday to renew" the Terrorism Risk Insurance Act "set to expire at the end of this year that they said allowed the city's economy to recover and grow in the years after the Sept. 11 terror attack. The program, created…in 2002 and extended in 2005, was devised when insurers began excluding terrorism from their property policies after Sept. 11, 2001. Under its terms, the federal government would pay most of the cost of losses from a foreign terror attack, up to a total of $100 billion a year. In seeking its renewal, the officials told the House Subcommittee on Capital Markets, Insurance and Government Sponsored Enterprises at a hearing in Manhattan that without it, the city's robust development engine could sputter to a halt." Sen. Charles Schumer "said the cycle of pending expiration and renewal had created a damaging 'fear pattern' among insurers." Mayor Michael Bloomberg "also spoke in support of continuing the program, saying it was crucial to the city's overall economic health."

Senate To Vote On Union Rights For TSA Workers. The Washington Post (3/6, D4, Barr, 690K) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The Senate plans to vote today on whether to extend union rights to federal airport screeners, a fundamental question that confronted Congress when it created the Transportation Security Administration after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks." However, the Post adds, "the administration is holding firm. Yesterday, at a Senate subcommittee hearing, Kip Hawley, head of the TSA, rejected proposals by [sponsor Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.)] and Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) that would provide bargaining rights for transportation security officers, popularly called security screeners. The proposals, Hawley said, pose 'a serious negative security impact.'" The Post notes, "Providing bargaining rights would allow unions to take grievances to outside arbitrators to review management decisions 'after the fact' and 'sets up a morass of wasted time that detracts from the focus on security,' Hawley said." The Post adds, "Aides to President Bush have said they will recommend a veto of the bill implementing the 9/11 panel's recommendations if it includes union rights for screeners. Senate Republicans hope to sustain the veto, noting that 36 GOP senators," signed "a letter to Bush objecting to the union provision."

WSJournal Accuses Democrats Of Putting "Big Labor" Ahead Of National Security. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A18, 2.04M) editorializes that the two most recent examples of "favors that Democrats in Congress are doing for Big Labor" are "especially notable because they'd benefit unions at the expense of national security. First up is Senator Jim DeMint's (R., S.C.) proposal to bar certain convicted felons from working in ports." DeMint offered the amendment last year and it was removed by Democrats "under the cover of a House-Senate conference. … Mr. DeMint was back trying again last week, and every Senate Democrat once again voted for his amendment. However, they also voted for a separate amendment from Hawaii's Daniel Inouye that would allow future Administrations to delete the DeMint requirements." The Journal continues that "Democrats also keep trying to impose collective bargaining rights for all 43,000 screeners at the Transportation Security Administration. Congress expressly denied such organizing ability when it created TSA in 2001, on the sensible grounds that union work rules would compromise security."

ACLU Calls For Repeal Of Real ID. Anthony D. Romero, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union, in an op-ed in USA Today (3/6, 12A, 2.27M) writes, "Real ID should be repealed, especially after the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) released its vague and evasive regulations last week. Rather than answer the hard questions and provide solid guidance, DHS told the states to find solutions by 2010, effectively passing the hot potato to the next administration." Romero continues that the act was "attached…to a must-pass Iraq war/tsunami relief bill. No hearings. No debate." Had it been exposed to "democratic scrutiny," Real ID would have been seen as "an unfunded mandate that violates the Constitution's 10th Amendment on state powers, destroys states' dual sovereignty and consolidates every American's private information, leaving all of us far more vulnerable to identity thieves." Furthermore, "Real ID is not a solution that can stop terrorism. Clever and resourceful 'terrorists' will always find ways to get IDs."

USA Today Says Security Trumps Real ID Concerns. In an opposing editorial, USA Today (3/6, 12A, 2.27M) notes that seven of the 9/11 terrorists had Virginia state licenses, "although none lived there. … Real ID has produced much howling about the costs, the likely hassles at state motor vehicle departments and the potential threat to privacy. All are valid concerns. But the fact is that driver's licenses are the nation's principal form of ID. As long as that's the case, they need to be credible."

WAR NEWS:

House Democratic Caucus Increasingly Divided Over Iraq. The Washington Post (3/6, A1, Weisman, 690K) reports, "Senior House Democrats, seeking to placate members of their party from Republican-leaning districts, are pushing a plan that would place restrictions on President Bush's ability to wage the war in Iraq but would allow him to waive them if he publicly justifies his position. Under the proposal, Bush would also have to set a date to begin troop withdrawals if the Iraqi government fails to meet benchmarks aimed at stabilizing the country that the president laid out in January." The plan "is an attempt to bridge the differences between anti-war Democrats, led by Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.), who have wanted to devise standards of troop readiness strict enough to force Bush to delay some deployments and bring some troops home, and Democrats wary of seeming to place restrictions on the president's role as commander in chief." The Post adds, "The legislative jujitsu in the backrooms of Capitol Hill underscores the difficulties the Democrats face in confronting the issue that helped them regain control of Congress -- Iraq."

Meanwhile, The Politico (3/6) reports Speaker Nancy Pelosi "is facing a full-blown revolt from liberal House Democrats over the $98 billion Iraq supplemental bill, according to Democratic insiders. Anywhere between 50 to 75 Democrats are now threatening to vote against the bill because it doesn't go far enough toward ending the war, including setting a date certain for withdrawal of U.S. combat forces from Iraq, said the sources." Pelosi and Democratic leaders "are expected to postpone markup of the Iraq bill in the House Appropriations Committee by at least a week in order to buy time to resolve the matter." Liberals "are unhappy with the current proposal being discussed by…Murtha…and the Democratic leadership, which would prevent…Bush from sending more troops to Iraq unless they are certified as being properly equipped, trained and rested to take on combat missions." The Politico adds that "as happens so often in politics, if you move too far in appeasing one group, you then alienate another, which is what's happening here."

Roll Call (3/6, Pierce) offers a different picture of Democratic opinion on the supplemental, reporting "both liberal and conservative Democrats signaled that they might be willing to be team players if leaders accommodate them in small ways." Roll Call adds, "As of Monday evening, the chances of committee action on a bill this week were slipping away and it was unclear whether House Democratic leaders would include language, first proposed by" Murtha, "to restrict in some way the president's ability to deploy troops to Iraq unless he publicly acknowledges that he is sending troops into combat without meeting certain readiness requirements." However, "one House Democratic leadership aide indicated that the bill most likely would include a provision requiring the president to report to Congress on whether the benchmarks he set out for the Iraqi government are being met." And "there were other indications Monday that House Democratic leaders were considering language requiring the president to seek Congressional approval for any military action against Iran."

E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (3/6, A19, 690K) that "this week could well determine whether Democrats splinter or find a new strategy on Iraq based on the unhappy but realistic assumption that -- unless Bush suddenly opens himself to new approaches -- the fight to change course in Iraq is likely to go on all this year, and perhaps into the next. … Democrats and the left face a testing time. For some in the antiwar movement, failing to end the war right now is immoral. But as Murtha suggested, a short-term strategy to end the war can't work. This is a long struggle, and those engaged in it need to battle for the long term."

White House To Ask For More War Funds. The AP (3/6, Taylor) reports, "The White House is ready to ask Congress for more money for…Bush's plan -- already hotly debated -- to send 21,500 new combat troops into Iraq." The move "would pay for support personnel and otherwise update last month's request for the Iraq war. It probably will draw criticism from Democrats who say the Pentagon had low-balled estimates of the costs of Bush's plan for improving security in Baghdad and Anbar province. The latest request could come as early as Tuesday, modifying last month's $93.4 billion request for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan through Sept. 30. … The request probably will come to about $2 billion. It will be accompanied by equal-sized reductions elsewhere in the larger request, which contained money for two next-generation Joint Strike Fighters and a V-22 tilt rotor aircraft."

Gallup Poll Finds Only 28% Think US Will Win Iraq War. USA Today (3/6, 2.27M) reports, "A new USA TODAY/Gallup Poll shows deepening pessimism on Iraq, even as many Americans are reluctant to limit money or troops for the war effort. Only 28% say the United States will probably or definitely win the war, down from 35% in December and the lowest since the question was first asked in September 2005. The share of people who now call the war a mistake is 59% -- the same as September 2005 and the highest level in the 58 times the question has been asked since the war began." In addition, "six in 10 people said they want Congress to set a timetable to withdraw all U.S. troops by the end of 2008. Three-quarters said Congress should require that US troops come home if Iraqi leaders don't keep pledges to reduce violence, and that US troops have at least a year's stay in the USA between deployments to Iraq. The mandatory break is part of a plan by" Murtha.

Democrats Said To Face Tough Political Endgame In Iraq. Jonah Goldberg, editor at large of National Review Online, writes in USA Today (3/6, 13A, 2.27M), "There's a deep irony to the Democratic Party's dilemma over Iraq. For 30 years, the party's left-wing base has reflexively proclaimed every foreign policy challenge 'another Vietnam,'" and now they are "behaving as if Iraq is Vietnam all over again. But it is only now dawning on the Democrats that the Vietnam War wasn't exactly their finest hour." Goldberg adds, "The Democratic pickle is exquisitely simple: In the past election, they ran as the anti-war party and promised to bring the war to a close, but, like the dog who finally catches the car fender, they're at a loss about what to do now. As Virginia's Rep. Jim Moran says of his fellow Democrats, they 'want to make sure this is still…Bush's war,' but the only way they can end the war is to take possession of it. The Democratic base thinks that'd be fine. But, one gets the sense, someone in the party's leadership understands that might be a problem." If Bush's "surge is successful, odds are Americans will think it was all worth it. If, on the other hand, the Democrats are successful at ending the war in defeat, it's not at all clear Americans will see our loss as the unambiguous triumph Kennedy remembers in Vietnam. Nor is it clear they'll congratulate Democrats for securing a sure defeat rather than chancing a possible victory."

As Security Crackdown Continues, Suicide Bomb Kills 20 In Baghdad. The CBS Evening News (3/5, story 4, 2:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported that in Iraq yesterday, "a suicide car bomb went off in an area of the city known for its bookstores. At least 20 Iraqis were killed in the explosion which left bloody papers scattered everywhere." Meanwhile, "the security crackdown in Baghdad is now entering a new phase. US and Iraqi forces have been moving into the section known as Sadr City, home to two million people, and controlled by a radical Shiite militia."

NBC Nightly News (3/5, story 2, 2:50, Engel, 9.87M) said "Sadr City has been one of the most dangerous neighborhoods in all of Baghdad, completely out of government control. Today I went in with US forces trying to take it back. Soldiers from the 82nd Airborne today mounted up. And braced for what has been a no go zone for American forces. Sadr City. The last time US troops entered this Shiite slum of two million 2 1/2 years ago, they battled the Shiite militia, the Mahdi Army, for weeks. What the soldiers found today surprised them, no resistance. … The big question is, are they just regrouping, waiting to return?"

NBC Nightly News (3/5, lead story, 4:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "We have brought this broadcast back to Iraq for these next several days to see up close and once again the conflict that is quickly becoming the story of our times. And the story here, it is plain to see, is changing. There was violence here in Baghdad today, but the war we found at an outpost to the west of here today was different." The attack in Baghdad "comes during a period of change here. There are now pockets of relative peace where there had been awful ongoing violence." NBC Nightly News (3/5, story 8, 3:20, Williams, 9.87M) later reported, "Retired Army General, four-star General that is, Wayne Downing is with me on this trip, just as he was with me in Iraq for the initial invasion." Gen. Wayne Downing said, "One of the things that is striking is you didn't see a lot of children out waving, you didn't see people out working like that. So, I think that reflects the fact than not only the US forces are cracking down, but we saw a lot of Iraqi police and Iraqi army. They are right now breaking the grip of Al Qaeda. That is an Al Qaeda area that we were in today."

The Los Angeles Times (3/6, Berthelsen, 850K) says the suicide bombing "was the latest to underscore the difficulty faced by US and Iraqi forces as they try to stem sectarian violence here, and it raised questions about how long certain factions, such as Shiite Muslim militias, would continue to comply with the new security plan before taking revenge." Also, "around the capital Monday, police found the bodies of 25 men who had been shot to death, a number higher than in recent days and approaching the pre-crackdown average." The Times adds, "Since the operation was launched Feb. 13, it has seen some success in reducing such death squad killings, which are believed to be the work of Shiite militias."

The New York Times (3/6, Wong, Habeeb, 1.16M) reports, "The bombing was the latest of a half-dozen major blasts aimed at civilians in the capital in the three weeks since the Iraqi government and American military announced the start of a new Baghdad security drive. The number of gunshot killings attributed to sectarian death squads appears to have dropped as militia leaders have ordered their followers to lie low. But deadly bombings have continued with ferocity." The Times adds, "American officials have said they are still struggling to tamp down the bombings and intend to bring thousands of additional troops into Baghdad in the next two months."

The Washington Post (3/6, A10, Raghavan, 690K) reports, "For many victims, the attack brought questions about the effectiveness of a new security crackdown that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has already declared a success. Nearly three weeks after its launch, the number of violent attacks has dipped, but bombings continue to plague Baghdad." The Washington Times/AP (3/6, Frayer) runs a similar report.

Nine US Soldiers Killed In Iraq Bombings Today. The AP (3/6) reports, "Nine U.S. soldiers died in two separate incidents north of Baghdad, the military said Tuesday. Six soldiers were killed when a bomb exploded near their vehicles during a combat operation Monday in Salahuddin province, the military said in a statement. ... In another incident the same day, three more soldiers were killed by a roadside bomb in Diyala province, another statement said. ... All nine were assigned to Task Force Lightning."

US Focuses On "Microfinance Projects" In Effort To Stimulate Iraqi Economy. USA Today (3/6, 5A, Dorell, 2.27M) reports, "As U.S. military and civilian officials try to help Iraq's economy rebuild, they are placing a new emphasis on small businesses," and "through grants and loans -- often for a few hundred dollars each -- they're trying to stimulate job growth and eventually improve Iraq's security. So-called microfinance projects have proved more efficient at creating jobs than large-scale, multibillion-dollar reconstruction efforts, says Eric Nigh, executive director of the Iraqi-American Chamber of Commerce and Industry." USA Today adds, "Large infrastructure projects, such as power plants, required enormous spending on workers' security, says Ra'ad Omar, chief executive of the chamber. He said Iraqi contractors tended to invest their profits in real estate abroad rather than reinvest them at home. Many owners of larger Iraqi companies eventually left the country because of security issues."

Gogdanos Says US Soldiers Should Be Assigned To "Protecting Cultural Property." Matthew Bogdanos, a colonel in the Marine Reserves and an assistant district attorney in Manhattan, writes in the New York Times (3/6, 1.16M) that "it's a pretty tough sell to ask people to care about a bunch of old rocks with funny writing." But "the plunder of Iraq's 10,000 poorly guarded archaeological sites not only deprives future generations of incomparable works of art, but also finances the insurgents. … And what if Americans understood that our failure to appreciate the importance Iraqis place on their history has added to the chaos faced by our troops?" Bogdanos adds, "The lesson for the United States is that we must never again cede the moral high ground on cultural issues like this one. In advance of any future military action, we should assign units the task of protecting cultural property. And all troops scheduled to deploy overseas should receive cultural awareness training; the Archaeological Institute of America has already conducted some seminars at Camp Lejeune in North Carolina."

US Strike Accidentally Kills Nine Civilians. The CBS Evening News (3/5, story 5, :25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "In Afghanistan, for the second day in a row, civilians were caught in the crossfire as NATO forces targeted militants. A NATO air strike north of Kabul last night killed nine people, including four young children. The bombs destroyed their family's mud brick home. The US military says the strike was meant to target insurgents who had attacked an American air base."

DOJ_NMG_0140418

The New York Times (3/6, Gall, Wafa, 1.16M) reports "a local representative of the provincial council, Suraya Bahadur, who comes from Nejarab district, where the bombing happened, condemned it. 'I condemn both the suicide attacks and the rocket attacks by the enemy of Afghanistan, and also I condemn these type of mistakes,' by American and NATO forces, she said. 'We never want our civilian people to be killed.'" John Sifton, "a senior researcher at Human Rights Watch, which is based in New York, also expressed concern about the level of force." The Washington Post (3/6, A10, Witte, 690K) and Washington Times/AP (3/6, Shah) also report the story.

UN Official Says Afghanistan Could Have Record Opium Crop. The New York Times (3/6, Gall, 1.16M) reports, "Afghanistan's opium harvest could be bigger than last year's record crop, with nearly half of the provinces showing an increase in planting this year, the director of the United Nations Office for Drugs and Crime said here Monday." His office "released an assessment of winter planting trends, which shows an increase in 15 provinces, no change in 6 provinces, and a decrease in 7 provinces. Six of Afghanistan's 34 provinces have no poppies, the study said."

New Intelligence Sparks Renewed Effort To Catch Bin Laden. ABC News' online blog "The Blotter" (3/6, Ross) reports, "Armed with fresh intelligence, the CIA is moving additional man power and equipment into Pakistan in the effort to find Osama bin Laden and his deputy Ayman al Zawahri, US officials tell ABC News. 'Reports that the trail has gone stone cold are not correct,' said one U.S. official. 'We are very much increasing our efforts there,' the official said." ABC adds, "People familiar with the CIA operation say undercover officers with paramilitary training have been ordered into Pakistan and the area across the border with Afghanistan as part of the ramp-up. … Although never publicly acknowledged, Pakistan has permitted CIA teams to secretly operate inside Pakistan."

DOJ:

Rep. Wilson Says She Complained About Dismissed US Attorney. In a day of fast-moving developments in the widening controversy over the dismissal of several US Attorneys, media coverage focused on several aspects of the controversy. The AP (3/6, Kellman) reports, "The probe into the Bush administration's firings of U.S. attorneys intensified Monday as lawmakers ordered two more ousted officials to tell their stories and the Justice Department said Republican Sen. Pete Domenici had complained repeatedly to the attorney general about one prosecutor." The AP continues, "A second lawmaker from New Mexico, GOP Rep. Heather Wilson, acknowledged that she, too, had complained to the same prosecutor about the slow pace of an investigation. Like Domenici, she denied pressuring the U.S. attorney in her state." The AP adds, "The administration has said eight prosecutors were told to leave, all but one for performance-related reasons. However, Democrats have suggested ever more pointedly that politics was behind many of the dismissals, and the Domenici revelation fueled that idea. … Six of those fired, meanwhile, issued a stiff defense of their conduct and implied that they had had differences with Justice Department officials in Washington. … 'We leave with no regrets, because we served well and upheld the best traditions of the Department of Justice,' the group said in a joint statement released in advance of a Tuesday hearing by a House subcommittee." The AP notes, "The Justice Department, besieged by charges of cronyism, acknowledged that lawmakers — both Republican and Democratic — had complained about several of the eight. … One, David Iglesias of New Mexico, was the subject of four phone calls from Domenici to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and his deputy questioning whether the prosecutor was 'up to the job,' department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said. … It's unclear whether Iglesias was aware of the senator's calls to the Justice Department, but he knew of Domenici's interest in his work. Domenici said over the weekend that he had called the prosecutor in October 2006 to ask about the progress of a probe into an alleged Democratic kickback scheme. … Iglesias has said he received calls from two lawmakers — he has not named them publicly — who inquired about the case. He said that he felt pressured by them to rush indictments before the November elections."

USA Today (3/6, Johnson) reports, "Congressional inquiries into the Bush administration's dismissal of eight federal prosecutors deepened Monday, as the House Judiciary Committee announced it would seek subpoenas for two more of the prosecutors." USA continues, "The panel now plans to hear from as many as six of the ousted prosecutors today, and several of them are likely to also appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee. Both panels are investigating whether the administration unfairly dismissed the eight prosecutors — who serve at the pleasure of the president — as political retaliation for their investigative activities. … The House panel's announcement said it would seek testimony from former U.S. attorneys Daniel Bogden of Nevada and Paul Charlton of Arizona. Previously scheduled to testify today were former U.S. attorneys H.E. 'Bud' Cummins of Arkansas, David Iglesias of New Mexico, Carol Lam of Southern California and John McKay of Washington state." USA adds "Administration officials, including Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, have said that all but one of the firings were related to the prosecutors' performance. Last month, McNulty told the Senate panel that Cummins was removed so he could be replaced by an ex-aide to White House political director Karl Rove. … Since then, the Senate panel has disclosed that Justice had issued generally favorable evaluations of all of the fired prosecutors. And Iglesias, the former U.S. attorney in New Mexico, has said that before he was dismissed in December he was contacted by two unidentified members of Congress who asked about the status of corruption probe looking at Democrats."

The Financial Times (3/6, Masters) reports, "Brian Roehrkasse, DoJ spokesman, said Mr Domenici had complained four times to top officials there about Mr Iglesias but never mentioned the corruption investigation. … 'Any suggestion that any US attorney was removed to inappropriately interfere with any investigation is plainly wrong and ill-conceived,' he said. 'These decisions were based on the individual concerns of each US attorney about their overall performance . . . [including] ineffectively prosecuting departmental priorities areas, failure to follow departmental guidelines or just an inability to lead.'"

ABC News (3/6, Wolf) reports, "The topic of conversation between Iglesias and Domenici was a corruption investigation Iglesias was conducting into an alleged kickback scheme involving New Mexico Democrats. … But the substance of that call is up for debate. Domenici, who admits to placing the call, said he was just interested in the timeframe for any potential indictments stemming from the investigation." ABC adds, "Iglesias, however, has said he felt violated by the call and sensed pressure to bring indictments sooner than he wanted to -- before the November election. The indictments never came. And last week Iglesias was fired by the Department of Justice. … Justice Department spokesmen have said Iglesias was among the attorneys let go because of poor performance."

Gonzales Defends Dismissals. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A4, Perez) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, facing criticism for the firing of eight U.S. attorneys, defended the action as appropriate but said the Justice Department handled the situation poorly. … 'We could have rolled out the decisions more smoothly,' he said in an interview. But he also rejected accusations from Democrats and other critics that the prosecutors were fired for failing to follow the Bush administration's political agenda. … 'To think we made these changes to retaliate or because they didn't carry out certain prosecutions?' he said. 'That did not occur here. I stand by the decision to make the changes.'" The Journal continues, "The tempest has been the latest imbroglio for the Justice Department and Mr. Gonzales, a longtime Bush friend and former White House counsel who has defended the administration's often-controversial law-enforcement programs, from domestic surveillance to the treatment of enemy combatants. … Part of the problem is the Justice Department's contention that the Dec. 7 dismissals were performance related, which came after initial suggestions that the moves were normal turnover. That switch has prompted protests from some of those let go. Some have taken to referring to the firings as the "Pearl Harbor Day Massacre." And some of have said they wouldn't have protested the moves otherwise. … Internal Justice Department documents, reviewed by The Wall Street Journal, show evaluations offering positive reviews for all the prosecutors' work as recently as last March. Mr. Gonzales said the written reviews were among several factors the department used to evaluate prosecutors, which include numbers and types of prosecutions and management issues. … Mr. Gonzales denied any political motivation for the moves. 'I made recommendations to the president' that the changes be made, he said. 'Ultimately, these are presidential appointees.'"

Wilson Complained About Pace Of Iglesias Probes. The Washington Post (3/6, A1, Kane, Eggen) reports, "Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.) acknowledged yesterday that she contacted a federal prosecutor to complain about the pace of his public corruption investigations, as the Senate ethics committee signaled that it had opened a preliminary inquiry into a similar communication by her state's senior senator, Pete V. Domenici (R)." The Post continues, "Wilson denied allegations from former New Mexico U.S. Attorney David C. Iglesias that she pressured him to speed up a political corruption investigation involving Democrats in the waning days of her tight election campaign last fall. … 'I did not ask about the timing of any indictments and I did not tell Mr. Iglesias what course of action I thought he should take or pressure him in any way,' Wilson said in a statement to The Washington Post. 'The conversation was brief and professional.'" The Post adds, "Iglesias…is expected to tell Congress today that Wilson and Domenici were trying to sway the course of his investigation. Domenici acknowledged Sunday that he called Iglesias about the corruption case but said he did not pressure him. The telephone calls to Iglesias by Domenici and Wilson appear to put them in conflict with congressional ethics rules that bar contacts with federal agency officials during most active investigations." The Post adds, "Iglesias and three other ousted prosecutors are scheduled to appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee this morning. The same group and two others are slated to testify in the afternoon before a House Judiciary subcommittee. … The Senate Ethics Committee released a statement yesterday evening declining to address the allegations against Domenici, but it said that anytime a legitimate complaint is filed against a senator, a preliminary inquiry is begun. The statement, from the chairwoman, Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), and Sen. John Cornyn (Tex.), the committee's ranking Republican, noted that preliminary inquiries can lead to wider investigations." The Post notes,

"Wilson said in her statement that many of her constituents had complained about "the slow pace of federal prosecutions" in corruption cases and that one unidentified constituent told her that 'Iglesias was intentionally delaying corruption investigations.' … Wilson also said she was trying to help Iglesias. 'If the purpose of my call has somehow been misperceived, I am sorry for any confusion. I thought it was important for Mr. Iglesias to receive this information and, if necessary, have the opportunity to clear his name.' … Wilson said Iglesias's dismissal occurred 'without input from me.' Justice officials said they are not aware of any contacts by Wilson about Iglesias. But they said Sunday that Domenici complained about him to Gonzales three times in 2005 and 2006 and spoke to Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty in the first week of October 2006."

Democrats Say DOJ Withholding Information On Dismissals. The Washington Times (3/6, Pfeiffer) reports, "Congressional Democrats say half a dozen former federal prosecutors were fired by the Bush administration for political reasons, and they're accusing the Justice Department of withholding information related to the dismissals. … 'Eleven months after the firings, we still haven't gotten straight answers from the Department of Justice, which changed its own story this weekend and admitted the firings weren't based on job performance,' said Rep. Linda T. Sanchez, California Democrat and chairman of the House Judiciary subcommittee on commercial and administrative law." The Times continues, "Both the House and Senate Judiciary committees will hold hearings today with the six former prosecutors. … Supporters of the administration's policy say the firings were not done improperly. U.S. attorneys have four-year terms, but can be removed or replaced at any time, and for nearly any reason, according to federal law. … 'We ought to not lose sight of the fact that president has the power to replace them,' said Sen. Arlen Specter, the ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee. 'He doesn't have to have a reason. If it is a bad reason, that is different.' … The Pennsylvania Republican added he would listen to the Democrats' accusations of improper firings." The Times notes, "Democrats have specifically cited the case of former prosecutor Carol Lam of San Diego, who prosecuted former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, California Republican. Cunningham resigned from office last year after pleading guilty to bribery charges in connection to a case involving military contractors. Cunningham received an eight-year sentence. … Mrs. Lam, who was appointed by Mr. Bush in 2002, was fired after the Justice Department issued a request for her dismissal in January. According to the Justice Department, Mrs. Lam was fired for not aggressively pursuing the prosecution of border crimes. … The other five former U.S. attorneys scheduled to testify today include Daniel Bogden of Las Vegas, Paul K. Charlton of Phoenix, Bud Cummins of Little Rock, Ark., David C. Iglesias of Albuquerque, N.M., and John McKay of Seattle."

DOJ Official Said To Have Threatened Dismissed US Attorney. McClatchy Newspapers (3/6, Taylor) reports, "A high-ranking Justice Department official told one of the U.S. attorneys fired by the Bush administration that if any of them continued to criticize the administration for their ousters, previously undisclosed details about the reasons they were fired might be released, two of the ousted prosecutors told McClatchy Newspapers." McClatchy continues, "While the U.S. attorney who got the call regarded the tone of the conversation as congenial, not intimidating, the prosecutor nonetheless passed the message on to five other fired U.S. attorneys. One of them interpreted the reported comments by Michael Elston, the chief of staff to Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, as a threat." McClatchy adds, "Justice Department officials denied that the conversation with the U.S. attorney ever took place, and Elston said he called several of the fired U.S. attorneys but never made any such comments. … 'I had no conversation in which I discussed with any U.S. attorney what they should or should not say to the media regarding their removal,' Elston said. … The two prosecutors who described the call demanded anonymity because, they said, they didn't want to antagonize the Justice Department further." McClatchy notes, "Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse criticized McClatchy for running the story. 'It is unfortunate that the press would choose to run an allegation from an anonymous source from a conversation that never took place,' he said." McClatchy adds, "According to one of the fired U.S. attorneys, Elston made the comments during a telephone conversation after Democrats began questioning whether the administration was attempting to purge more independent-minded Republican appointees in order to replace them with more partisan candidates. … According to the former U.S. attorney, Elston made a 'pointed comment that indicated that somehow anyone who talked might become more embarrassed if the story continued on.'"

DOJ Official Who Told US Attorneys Of Dismissal Quits. The New York Times (3/6, Johnston) reports, "The Justice Department official who told seven United States attorneys in December that they were being dismissed said Monday that he was resigning." The Times continues, "Michael A. Battle, director of the Executive Office for United States Attorneys, said in a statement that his departure was unrelated to the dismissals, but Democrats said he appeared to be a casualty of the uproar over the firings. … Mr. Battle, formerly a United States attorney in Buffalo, is not believed to have played a significant role in the decision to remove the United States attorneys, although Justice Department officials said he had accepted it." The Times adds, "Mr. Battle said in his statement that he had been planning to leave the agency since last June. … But Democrats in Congress said the timing of his departure, on March 16, appeared unusual."

The Hill (3/6, Schor, Crabtree) reports, "The circumstances surrounding Battle's departure add to questions Democrats plan to ask about whether politics played any role in the firings of seven U.S. attorneys, some of whom were pursuing public-corruption cases against GOP lawmakers. The House and Senate Judiciary committees will hold hearings featuring the testimony of several of the fired U.S. attorneys today to investigate the matter." The Hill continues, "A Department of Justice staffer said only that the public-affairs office planned to send out a statement about Battle's resignation; it did not do so by press time yesterday. … House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) and Judiciary Subcommittee on Commercial and Administrative Law Chairwoman Linda Sánchez (D-Calif.) vowed to 'do everything in their power to unearth the facts surrounding Battle's resignation.' … 'The wheels seem to be coming off the Bush administration's increasingly hollow defense of its decision to fire eight U.S. attorneys,' Sánchez said. 'The administration's explanation of Mr. Battle's apparent resignation is as murky as everything else they have told us about this case.'"

Former Maryland US Attorney Says He Was Pressured To Resign. The New York Times (3/6, Lichtblau) reports, "The former federal prosecutor in Maryland said Monday that he was forced out in early 2005 because of political pressure stemming from public corruption investigations involving associates of the state's governor, a Republican. … 'There was direct pressure not to pursue these investigations,' said the former prosecutor, Thomas M. DiBiagio. 'The practical impact was to intimidate my office and shut down the investigations.'" The Times continues, "Mr. DiBiagio, a controversial figure who clashed with a number of Maryland politicians, had never publicly discussed the reasons behind his departure. But he agreed to an interview with The New York Times because he said he was concerned about what he saw as similarities with the recent firings of eight United States attorneys. … As in those cases, there are conflicting accounts of the circumstances that led to Mr. DiBiagio's ouster. The Justice Department disputes his version. … His office had been looking into whether associates of Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. had improperly funneled money from gambling interests to promote legalized slot machines in Maryland. Mr. DiBiagio said that several prominent Maryland Republicans had pressed him to back away from the inquiries and that one conversation had so troubled him that he reported it to an F.B.I. official as a threat. … But he said that the Justice Department had offered little support and that that made it 'impossible for me to stay.'" The Times notes, "Several current and former officials in the Baltimore office said Mr. DiBiagio voiced concerns in 2004 that the corruption inquiries were jeopardizing his career, a view that they shared. … The Justice Department rejected Mr. DiBiagio's explanation. An official in the department, David Margolis, said he told Mr. DiBiagio in 2004 that he had to leave because 'we had lost confidence in him.' … Mr. Margolis said the prosecutor's harsh management style had caused resentments in the office that ran 'wide and deep' and called 'an absolute fairy tale' the idea that Mr. DiBiagio's departure was tied to the gambling case or any other investigation."

Testimony Could Spark Ethics Probes. Roll Call (3/6, Van Dongen) reports, "A pair of Judiciary panel hearings today featuring testimony from at least four U.S. attorneys who were summarily fired by the Justice Department could spark the first major ethics probes of the 110th Congress." Roll Call continues, "The star witness at this morning's Senate Judiciary hearing and this afternoon's House Judiciary session will be ousted U.S. Attorney for New Mexico David Iglesias, who has told various media outlets that two New Mexico lawmakers contacted him in mid-October 2006 to inquire about the pace of an ongoing corruption probe of local Democrats. … Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) already has admitted to, and apologized for, making a phone call to Iglesias in mid-October. But Domenici denied doing anything improper, saying in a statement over the weekend that 'at no time in that conversation ... did I ever tell [Iglesias] what course of action I thought he should take on any legal matter.'" Roll Call adds, "On Monday, ethics attorneys off Capitol Hill said that Domenici's behavior involved seriously suspect activity and could result in Senate Ethics Committee action, a major investigation by the Justice Department or even an independent counsel. … 'Having been in Washington for 35 years, I'm sure we're headed to a full-blown obstruction investigation of some variety that will involve not only the Members of Congress but the Justice Department itself,' said Stan Brand, a former House general counsel who now works at Brand Law Group. … 'This isn't some rulemaking, this is serious stuff and I don't know where it ends or what the outcome is, but it's going to have to be investigated,' Brand added." Roll Call notes, "The Domenici revelations further fuel Democratic charges that there has been improper political interference by the Bush administration in judicial proceedings. They say at least seven U.S. attorneys were unfairly fired for political reasons and are set to be replaced with political cronies. The Justice Department maintains that the seven — with the exception of Bud Cummins III, the ex-U.S. attorney for Eastern Arkansas — were dismissed for 'performance based' reasons. … 'More than any other Justice Department officials, U.S. attorneys must be above reproach,' said Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), who will chair today's Senate Judiciary hearing. 'Today's revelations call into serious question whether they allowed such independence in this administration.' … Schumer also questioned the timing of the imminent departure from the Justice Department of Mike Battle, the director of the executive office of U.S. attorneys. … 'This raises another question about a subject where there are already too many unanswered questions,' Schumer charged."

The Los Angeles Times (3/6, Serrano) reports that "a left-leaning congressional watchdog group on Monday called for a Senate ethics investigation into Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) for allegedly interfering with the work of the U.S. attorney in his state. That would be a violation of Senate rules. And the Justice Department revealed Monday that Domenici telephoned Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales or his deputy four times in the last two years to complain about the U.S. attorney in New Mexico, David Iglesias, and whether he was 'up for the job.'" The Times continues, "The Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, which characterizes itself as progressive, filed a formal complaint Monday against Domenici, asking the Senate Select Committee on Ethics to investigate. 'He appears to have violated the prohibition on contacting agencies based on political considerations,' said the watchdog group's executive director, Melanie Sloan. … But others wonder if it isn't the Democrats who are playing politics. … William B. Canfield, a conservative lawyer and a former Senate ethics committee staffer, said that Domenici, a senator since 1973, would be 'too sophisticated a guy to have said anything to suggest he was improperly leaning on the U.S. attorney.' … 'U.S. attorneys probably take phone calls from members on a regular basis,' Canfield added. 'And there's nothing in the ethics rules in the Senate that says you can't make calls for a status report on where an investigation is going.'"

Yang Says Her Departure Was Unrelated To Dismissals. The Hill (3/6, Crabtree) reports, "A former U.S. attorney for Los Angeles, Debra Wong Yang, dismissed questions about the timing of her departure, which occurred about a month before several other U.S. attorneys were fired late last year." The Hill continues, "Wong Yang was heading up the investigation into Rep. Jerry Lewis's (R-Calif.) ties to a lobbying firm and the millions of dollars in contracts the firm's clients received from Congress. Wong Yang, the first Asian-American woman to serve as a U.S. attorney, left her post with Justice to become a partner at Gibson, Dunn and Crutcher, the law firm representing Lewis. She will co-chair the firm's crisis-management practice group, along with Washington, D.C., partner Theodore B. Olson, a former Bush administration solicitor general. … Wong Yang said her departure was a personal decision based on financial concerns and the fact that she is a single mother, and had nothing to do with the firings of other U.S. attorneys. She also said her departure would not affect the case against Lewis in any way, noting that the Justice Department said it would have allowed her to stay in the position 'as long as I wanted to.' … 'The investigation [into Lewis] would never be delayed or affected in any way because of my departure,' she said. 'We had 260 attorneys in that office.'"

Issa To Testify About Lam Dismissal. The North County Times (3/6, Bennett) reports, "U.S. Rep. Darrell Issa will testify Tuesday at one of two congressional hearings addressing the firing of former San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam and a handful of other U.S. attorneys." The Times continues, "The hearings come in the wake of pressure from Democrats who have raised questions about whether the recent sacking of Lam and the other U.S. attorneys was politically motivated. … Issa has been one of the chief critics of the Yale-educated Lam, who left her post on Feb. 15 after being asked to resign in December. Issa criticized Lam for what he saw as a failure to prosecute illegal immigrant smugglers." The Times adds, "Issa said Monday that Lam lost her job because she failed to fulfill part of her mandate. … 'Clearly she needed to be fired for not implementing policy over a long period of time,' the Vista Republican said during a telephone interview. Issa's 49th District covers much of northern North County and Southwest Riverside County. … Starting in early 2004, Issa and other Republican members of Congress began sending letters to Lam and the attorney general's office complaining about the job she was doing. … Issa, who will testify before a House panel, said he takes 'maybe one twentieth' of the credit for Lam's dismissal, adding that he believes that California Democratic U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein also played a role. … On Monday, Issa's office sent to the North County Times a copy of a June letter from Feinstein to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in which Feinstein expressed concerns about the low rate of human smuggler prosecutions by Lam's office. … A spokeswoman for Gonzales said privacy issues prevented her from talking about performance review details but confirmed Issa's position that the San Diego office had the lowest number of prosecutions of any U.S. attorney's office on the Southwest border. … The spokeswoman, Tasia Scolinos, also said the performance reviews Feinstein referred to evaluated the U.S. attorneys' offices as a whole and 'not necessarily ... the U.S. attorneys themselves.'"

Formerly Low-Profile Iglesias Now At Center Of Controversy. The Albuquerque Tribune (3/6, Gisick) reports, "Low-profile during his five years as New Mexico's U.S. attorney, David Iglesias now finds himself at the center a growing national controversy." The Tribune continues, "Although no member of the New Mexico delegation sits on the two congressional committees that will interview Iglesias and other dismissed U.S. attorneys Tuesday, Republicans are expected to ask tough questions about Iglesias' tenure. … Democrats say they believe Iglesias and other federal prosecutors were political victims, and want to know more."

DOJ_NMG_0140423

The Tribune adds, "In a written statement this weekend, Domenici apologized for his October phone call to Iglesias, then said he had been concerned for several years about the slow pace of prosecutions. … 'New Mexico needed a new U.S. attorney,' Domenici concluded."

More Commentary. The Washington Post (3/6, A18) editorializes, "When members of Congress call, people listen -- especially if those people are political appointees who owe their positions in part to support from the lawmaker at the other end of the line. That is why the phone calls made to David C. Iglesias, the since-replaced U.S. attorney in New Mexico, by home-state Republicans Sen. Pete V. Domenici and Rep. Heather A. Wilson are so troubling. The Senate and House ethics committees have a duty to investigate." The Post continues, "Mr. Iglesias should have reported the lawmakers' phone calls to the Justice Department in Washington, as protocol dictates. He is to testify on Capitol Hill about the calls today. That may be illuminating. But more urgent is for the Justice Department to stop hiding behind vague assertions of 'performance-related issues' and explain, finally and clearly, why Mr. Iglesias and seven other U.S. attorneys were dismissed."

In a piece posted on Slate.com (3/6), Dahlia Lithwick writes, "The U.S. attorneys purge scandal is heating up. The House and Senate have convened hearings for Tuesday, promising an orgy of named names and pointed fingers. Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., now admits what he once denied: that he may have had a hand in the removal of New Mexico's U.S. attorney. And the senior Justice Department official who personally canned the U.S. attorneys has just announced the date of his resignation. … But as the political scandal spreads, the question at its heart gets less and less public attention: Who changed the Patriot Act to make it easier to replace U.S. attorneys without oversight, and how did it happen with nobody looking?" Lithwick continues, "U.S. attorneys are well aware that they serve at the president's pleasure, but new wording in the Patriot Act made it worth the president's while to fire a big, fat lot of them and hire a group of new ones. And while certainly half the scandal is that the Justice Department did that—let eight U.S. attorneys go, seemingly for no reason—we seem to have forgotten that even without the mass firings, this law had been changed in the sneakiest way imaginable. … On Feb. 6, when the Senate held hearings on the issue of prosecutorial independence, former judiciary committee Chairman Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., proudly claimed to have been as clueless as the rest of us. Denying New York Democratic Sen. Charles Schumer's claim that he or his staff had 'slipped the new provision into the Patriot Act in the dead of night,' Specter asserted, 'The first I found out about the change in the Patriot Act occurred a few weeks ago when Sen. [Dianne] Feinstein approached me on the floor.' … Specter added that he only looked into how the provision was altered after Feinstein told him about it. As he explained, 'I then contacted my very able chief counsel, Michael O'Neill, to find out exactly what had happened. And Mr. O'Neill advised me that the requested change had come from the Department of Justice, that it had been handled by Brett Tolman, who is now the U.S. attorney for Utah, and that the change had been requested by the Department of Justice because there had been difficulty with the replacement of a U.S. attorney in South Dakota.'" Lithwick adds, "Thus, at least according to Specter, O'Neill had merely been following orders from the Department of Justice when he snuck new language into the Patriot Act that would consolidate executive branch authority. … Now, it's not necessarily outrageous that Sen. Specter didn't know what his subordinate slipped into the legislation. … But this was not some minor technical amendment. It was a substantial enhancement of executive power. So, Specter now finds himself in an exceedingly strange position: His staff either lied to him or misled him about what he acknowledges to be a significant legal change."

In a column for the Washington Post (3/6, A19), Eugene Robinson writes, "So this is what accountability looks, sounds and feels like. It's been so long -- since George W. Bush moved into the White House -- that we hardly recognize what used to be a commonplace phenomenon, as much a part of Washington's behavioral DNA as megalomania and mendacity." Robinson continues, "This administration's nonchalance about its most grievous transgressions has been stunning, and the only inference that fits the facts is that the people running our government don't really believe in government at all. They certainly haven't taken it seriously." Robinson adds, "Before Gates arrived, it was awfully difficult to get fired by this administration for failing to do your job. Brown hardly counts, since he never should have been hired in the first place. Donald Rumsfeld presided over the Iraq war mess for years before his policies were essentially rejected by the American people last November. Generally, though, incompetence has not been a firing offense. … Political incorrectness, on the other hand, seems to be more than enough to get you shoved aside. … In December, the Justice Department fired eight U.S. attorneys -- top federal prosecutors -- in New Mexico, Arizona, Nevada, California, Washington and Arkansas. The administration acknowledges that one of the prosecutors, Bud Cummins of Little Rock, was ousted so his job could be given to a former aide to White House political czar Karl Rove. Hey, what's wrong with that? … Another of the fired prosecutors, David C. Iglesias, said he was being pressured by two members of Congress to speed up a criminal investigation that involved a Democratic legislator. The pressure came last fall, before the midterm election, Iglesias said. Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) admitted on Sunday that he called Iglesias and asked about the investigation, saying he was looking for 'an idea of what time frame we were looking at' -- but he denies pressuring Iglesias. … The White House acknowledges that complaints from members of Congress factored into the decision to fire the prosecutors, who say they had no prior indication of unhappiness with their performance."

The Los Angeles Times (3/6) editorializes, "Last month, Deputy Atty. Gen. Paul J. McNulty assured the Senate Judiciary Committee that none of the removals were designed to thwart ongoing investigations or to punish prosecutors for investigating public corruption. At the same hearing, McNulty said that the firings were 'performance related.' Yet some of the dismissed prosecutors had received positive evaluations. This seeming contradiction needs to be cleared up, not just by Congress but by the Justice Department's inspector general. … That said, we continue to oppose a proposal by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) that would return to federal judges the power to appoint interim U.S. attorneys. The bill is grounded in a suspicion that the Bush Justice Department wants to install cronies in U.S. attorneys' jobs indefinitely and without Senate confirmation — a claim the administration denies and must now refute with prompt presidential nominations subject to Senate confirmation." The Times adds, "Even after being approved by the Senate, a U.S. attorney — like a member of the Cabinet — is an officer of the executive branch who under our system of government can be removed by the president at a moment's notice. Congress has no business asking whether such dismissals are wise, but it has every right to determine whether they are intended to thwart or politicize the administration of justice. That question should be the focus of today's hearings."

The Houston Chronicle (3/6) editorializes, "The unprecedented dismissal of eight top U.S. prosecutors at the behest of the White House late last year finally is getting the attention it deserves. House and Senate judiciary committees are preparing to question the ousted U.S. attorneys." The Chronicle continues, "There are indications the purge was anything but the routine bureaucratic shuffle claimed by Justice Department spokesmen. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' deputies gave conflicting explanations as to why the officials were forced to resign. … All of the ousted attorneys are Bush appointees, with good records as prosecutors. McNulty testified at a congressional hearing that the shake-up occurred because of performance-related issues, but he was mistaken. Most of the attorneys' personnel evaluations turned out to be highly complimentary." The Chronicle aedds, "The most innocuous explanation for the mass firing is that White House officials simply wanted to create vacancies so cronies could burnish their resumés during the closing years of Bush's presidency. … Considering that at least one of the dismissed prosecutors was highly effective in bringing corruption cases against high-ranking Republicans, partisan revenge probably played a role in some of the firings. … Getting rid of dedicated federal prosecutors in order to dispense their jobs as short-term plums places patronage above justice. If some government attorneys were dismissed in order to derail or speed up investigations for partisan gain, such conduct borders on the criminal."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

High Court Turns Down Ebbers Appeal. The AP (3/6) reports, "The Supreme Court turned down an appeal Monday from former WorldCom chief Bernard Ebbers, who is serving a 25-year prison sentence for fraud and conspiracy." The AP continues, "The justices rejected without comment Ebbers' bid for review of his 2005 conviction based on his contention that he was denied a fair trial. … Ebbers argued in court papers that the trial judge improperly allowed prosecutors to use testimony from witnesses who had been given immunity, but denied immunity to potential defense witnesses. … The judge also instructed jurors that they could find Ebbers guilty if they believed he suspected a crime was being committed but intentionally looked the other way." The AP adds, "A federal appeals court upheld the conviction last year, acknowledging that Ebbers' sentence for a white-collar crime was longer than sentences routinely imposed by many states for violent crimes. The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said Ebbers' actions to hide WorldCom's financial problems were substantial and had cost investors dearly. … Ebbers was convicted for his role in the massive fraud that drove Clinton, Miss.-based WorldCom into bankruptcy in 2002."

Canadian Holding Company Pleads Guilty In Hollinger Fraud Case. The AP (3/6, Robinson) reports from Chicago, "A private Canadian holding company used by former media baron Conrad Black to control the Hollinger International newspaper publishing empire pleaded guilty Monday to defrauding Hollinger." The AP continues, "Toronto-based Ravelston Inc. entered its plea to a single count of mail fraud as lawyers for Black and the federal government prepared to start jury selection March 14 for his racketeering and fraud trial. … Black, 62, and three other former Hollinger executives are charged with plundering $80 million from Hollinger, mainly by selling off hundreds of community newspapers across the United States and Canada." The AP adds, "Black allegedly received sizable payments from the buyers in exchange for signing agreements not to compete with them by starting or buying newspapers in markets where the ones sold by Hollinger were circulating. … Prosecutors say the non-compete money should have gone to Hollinger shareholders and not into the pockets of Black and other executives. … Black and the three other executives have pleaded not guilty and vowed to fight the charges." The AP notes, "Ravelston had been trying for weeks to plead guilty, but the company was blocked until last week in a Canadian court from going ahead with the plea. … Black owns 65.1 percent of Ravelston and had sought to block the plea. But the company is in receivership and the receiver, who is responsible to the creditors, won permission from a Canadian court last week to go ahead and plead guilty."

Prosecutors Face Deadline In Stock Option Backdating Cases. The San Jose Mercury News (3/6, Wolverton) reports, "Federal prosecutors investigating the backdating of stock options are bumping up against a legal deadline that will probably affect when they file charges and what charges they bring." The News continues, "Under federal law, prosecutors typically have five years to bring charges of securities fraud. For many of the backdating cases, that time window could be closing, because the misdating of stock options largely ended in 2002 thanks to new regulations. … 'It's a prevailing issue in most of the cases,' said one Bay Area defense attorney, who asked not to be named. Added the attorney, who is a former federal prosecutor, 'Is the government under pressure (to make decisions) sooner rather than later? The answer is yes.'" The News adds, "The five-year deadline also means that the government could soon lose the chance to file charges on some of the most egregious instances of backdating. … There are ways around the deadline issue: The government can attempt to pause the clock, for instance, or file charges related to the backdating (for example, conspiracy or lying to prosecutors) if not on the backdating itself. But prosecutors can't get the clock to stop permanently, and the related charges could well be easier for defendants to challenge and can carry lighter penalties. … 'There's some room for creativity,' said another former federal prosecutor, who also asked not to be named. 'But they don't want to risk that. They want to go with the most solid theory they have.'" The News notes, "The U.S. Department of Justice investigated alleged backdating at Brocade Communications Systems for 18 months before moving to indict former Chief Executive Greg Reyes. Indictments of officials at other companies could take a fraction of that time, in part because of concern about this legal ticking clock. … Indeed, the pace of the overarching backdating investigation appears to have quickened. In recent days, federal prosecutors secured a guilty plea from a former executive at Monster Worldwide in a backdating case and are reportedly close to bringing similar charges against the former general counsel of McAfee. Take-Two's former CEO also recently pleaded guilty to backdating in New York state court. … Luke Macaulay, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Francisco, declined to say whether the government felt pressured by the five-year deadline or if it would prompt quicker actions in outstanding cases. … 'It's something we're aware of,' said Macaulay, whose office has been handling the lion's share of the backdating investigations. 'It's something we take into account in the final analysis of how we are investigating and prosecuting cases.'"

Judge Declares Mistrial In Seidman Fraud Case. The Wall Street Journal/AP (3/6, C4) reports, "A judge declared a mistrial in a $170 million fraud case against accounting firm BDO Seidman LLP after an attorney for the Portuguese bank suing the firm mentioned the suicide of one of the company's executives, against the judge's orders. … Miami-Dade County Circuit Judge Jose M. Rodriguez agreed with BDO Seidman that it couldn't receive a fair trial." The AP continues, "A lawyer for Banco Espirito Santo SA last week mentioned the suicide while questioning a witness. The judge had prohibited references to the suicide, in an order issued before the trial began. … In a 2004 lawsuit, Banco Espirito Santo accused BDO Seidman of failing to uncover the fraud at a former partner of the bank, E.S. Bankest LLC. The bank said BDO Seidman, hired to audit Bankest's books, failed to find signs of the fraud beginning in the late 1990s in part because the firm had financial ties to another Bankest partner." The AP adds, "The Big Four accounting firms typically settle high-stakes cases. Those actions often involve damage claims that run to the billions, rather than millions, of dollars. But BDO, along with fellow second-tier firm Grant Thornton LLP, are often willing to risk a trial. … A lawyer representing BDO Seidman, Mark Schnapp, argued that the jury would associate the suicide with the uncovering of fraud at the financial-services firm, a connection that was never suggested."

RIM To Restate Earnings Amid Options Backdating Probe. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A3, Vascellaro) reports, "In the latest fallout from the stock-options backdating scandal, Research in Motion Ltd. said it made widespread accounting errors in issuing some 3,000 improperly dated options grants going back to the 1990s and would take a roughly $250 million restatement." The Journal continues, "Co-Chief Executive Jim Balsillie, a recipient of some of the grants improperly accounted for, stepped down as chairman of RIM. He and co-CEO Mike Lazaridis, who also received options, agreed to pay about $4.25 million each 'to assist RIM in defraying costs' from the board probe and restatement, the company said. … Though some executives have repaid some gains from backdated shares, no executives have made such payments in the unfolding backdating scandal." The Journal adds, "RIM, the maker of the popular BlackBerry hand-held device, said all options granted before late February 2002 and approximately 321 grants made between that time and August 2006 were improperly accounted for. The 321 grants represent approximately 63% of the grants made by the company after Feb. 28, 2002. Correcting the accounting likely will cut earnings up to the end of RIM's fiscal year 2006 by $250 million, a much larger restatement than investors had expected. In September, RIM indicated it would have to restate between $25 million and $45 million in results. The company didn't name a new chairman. … RIM posted $382 million in net income on $2.1 billion in revenue in its most recently reported fiscal year, ended March 4, 2006. RIM said the announcement yesterday came after a seven-month probe by a special board committee. … RIM said an informal investigation is continuing by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Ontario Securities Commission. … The improprieties identified by the board included the practice of backdating options -- that is, pretending they were issued at an earlier time than they actually were, when RIM's share price was lower. Such backdating can increase the payoff for recipients by setting an artificially low strike price, increasing the gain when the options are exercised. About 140 companies are under investigation for backdating."

Blackberry Ousts Chairman, Restate Earnings. The Washington Post/Bloomberg (3/6, D3, Fournier, Heiskanen) reports, "Research in Motion, maker of the BlackBerry e-mail phone, will restate earnings by about $250 million and said James Balsillie will give up his post as chairman following a review of its stock-options grants." Bloomberg continues, "Research in Motion did not find intentional misconduct by its executives, according to a statement released by the company, based in Waterloo, Ontario. The restatements, which are not yet complete, cover more than three years of results dating back to 2004." Bloomberg adds, "The adjustment exceeds an earlier prediction by Research in Motion, which forecast in January that restatements would cut past earnings by more than $45 million. In concluding its options probe, the company said Balsillie would remain co-chief executive as it separates the roles of chairman and chief executive to upgrade corporate governance. … Research in Motion is one of at least 200 companies that have disclosed internal or federal investigations into options. Investigators are trying to determine whether companies inflated the value of employee options by backdating or timing the grants to coincide with days when the stock price was low."

McAfee Chooses EMC Official As New CEO. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A3, Vara, Lublin) reports, "McAfee Inc., trying to move past fallout from a federal investigation of its stock-options grants and revive its growth, named EMC Corp. executive David DeWalt as its new chief executive." The Journal continues, "The hiring of Mr. DeWalt, EMC's head of world-wide customer operations, comes as McAfee tries to stabilize its executive bench after a string of financial debacles, including probes into improperly dated stock-options grants. Mr. DeWalt, a 42-year-old software industry veteran, will be the Santa Clara, Calif., security-software maker's fourth CEO in six years. … George Samenuk, McAfee's last permanent chief executive before Mr. DeWalt, resigned in October after an internal probe found accounting irregularities related to stock-options grants. Last month, a Securities and Exchange Commission complaint claimed that Mr. Samenuk had known about a change to a 2002 stock-option grant made in his favor by a subordinate. The complaint charged Kent H. Roberts, McAfee's former general counsel, with fraud for his alleged role in manipulating options and followed a criminal indictment of Mr. Roberts. Mr. Samenuk hasn't been charged." The Journal adds, "Mr. DeWalt, who starts at McAfee on April 2, is expected to clean up the mess. The company plans to restate several quarters of past financial results in the wake of the stock-options problems. Interim chief Dale Fuller, the board member who temporarily replaced Mr. Samenuk, will remain on the board. Chuck Robel will remain chairman. … Mr. DeWalt joins McAfee as the security-software industry enters a more difficult phase after years of go-go growth. McAfee's antivirus software for home users and companies was once in demand as computer users sought to protect themselves against viruses and worms. But new threats like 'phishing' have displaced the old ones, leaving McAfee and other security-software makers scrambling to catch up. Priorities have also shifted at businesses, where security officers are focused on new problems like keeping corporate data from getting lost or stolen. McAfee recently launched products to fight phishing and data leakage, but those areas are already crowded."

New York AG Names New Attorney In Grasso Case. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, C7, Lucchetti, Koppel) reports, "New York Attorney General Andrew Cuomo named lawyer Benjamin E. Rosenberg to be his chief trial counsel, a role that will include handling high-profile cases such as the long fight against former New York Stock Exchange Chief Executive Dick Grasso." The Journal continues, "Mr. Rosenberg, a partner with law firm Dechert LLP, will start in the state's law-enforcement office Monday, said a spokesman for the attorney general's office. His salary will be $140,000. Mr. Rosenberg, 48 years old, worked on several high-profile white-collar cases while at Dechert, said the attorney general's spokesman." The Journal adds, "The attorney general's office won a partial summary judgment in the Grasso case last year, but Mr. Grasso is appealing. A decision on the appeals is expected in coming months, and if Mr. Grasso loses, he may have to give $100 million or more of his compensation back to the NYSE, where he worked for decades. Mr. Grasso has been fighting the case and has said he did nothing to warrant giving back part of his pay package. … Mr. Cuomo's predecessor, New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer, brought the case. Mr. Spitzer harshly criticized Mr. Grasso for collecting a pay package of $187.5 million while at the NYSE, which at the time was a not-for-profit company under New York state law."

Libby Jury Remains Focused On Cooper Conversation. The Washington Post (3/6, A3, Leonnig, Goldstein, 690K) reports jurors "in the perjury trial of I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby indicated yesterday they remain focused on whether Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff lied to the FBI about a July 12, 2003, conversation with Matthew Cooper, then a reporter for Time magazine." In a note "to the presiding judge late yesterday afternoon, jurors asked three questions about how they should decide whether Libby is guilty of making a false statement to investigators about his conversation with Cooper. After sending the note, the jury concluded its ninth day of deliberations without reaching a verdict." During that time, the jury "has sent U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton five questions about Libby's statements to the FBI regarding his conversation with Cooper."

The New York Times (3/6, 1.16M) reports the jury "suggested on Monday that some of its members were deeply uncertain about one of the five felony charges. Before the jurors departed at the end of their ninth day of deliberations, they sent a note to Judge Reggie B. Walton asking for clarification of Count 3, in which Mr. Libby is charged with giving a false statement to an agent of the Federal Bureau of Investigation." In the discussions Judge Walton "had with both sides' lawyers, it appeared that the jury was asking whether its members might consider Mr. Libby's testimony to the grand jury in March 2004 to help determine whether he made a false statement in his F.B.I. interview six months earlier."

FBI Investigating Wal-Mart Technician Who Tapped Phone Conversations. The Financial Times (3/6, Birchall) reports the FBI "is investigating the activities of a Wal-Mart 'technician' who was fired by the retailer after it learnt that the employee had been intercepting electronic messages transmitted by people outside the company. A company spokeswoman said the employee had used personal equipment to intercept all text messages sent 'within a few miles' of Wal-Mart's Bentonville headquarters, and had collected messages containing certain key words, without giving more details.

The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A4, McWilliams) reports, "Federal investigators are probing a Wal-Mart Stores Inc. employee's electronic interception of telephone conversations and text messages of other employees and outsiders, including a New York Times Co. reporter. People familiar with the issue said the criminal probe targets an employee who was searching for the identities of those who had leaked embarrassing company memos to the newspaper and others. Wal-Mart has been the subject of articles by the Times and others for its health-care, wage and benefit policies. The U.S. attorney for Western District of Arkansas confirmed it has begun a probe after being notified by the Bentonville, Ark., retailer of the recordings and electronic interceptions. Deborah Groom, first assistant U.S. attorney, declined to say whether it had subpoenaed records or interviewed employees of the world's largest retailer. Mona Williams, a Wal-Mart vice president, said the retailer fired two employees of its computer-systems department as a result of a nearly two-month internal review. One was a manager, who was dismissed yesterday. A third employee, also a computer-systems unit manager, was disciplined but not fired for 'failure to carry out management duties,' Ms. Williams said." Williams "confirmed agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation were carrying out the probe for the U.S. Attorney's office."

The New York Times (3/6, Creswell) reports, "the United States attorney's office for the Western District of Arkansas and the Federal Bureau of Investigation are assessing the actions of the employee and others inside Wal-Mart to determine whether federal and state laws were broken and whether they have jurisdiction in the matter, according to spokesmen for the investigators' offices. Wal-Mart said the technician was not authorized to monitor and tape the conversations between members of its media relations staff and Michael Barbaro, a retail reporter for The Times. The company did not say what led the technician to make the recordings or why Mr. Barbaro's conversations were the target. Over the last year, Mr. Barbaro has written dozens of articles about Wal-Mart, including some that were based on internal company documents that were given to him by union-financed groups that were critical of Wal-Mart's business practices."

The Washington Post (3/6, D3, Mui) reports, "A spokesman for the FBI did not return several phone calls or respond to an e-mail asking whether an investigation was underway."

The AP (3/6) reports, "FBI officials in Washington said Monday the agency is reviewing the information 'to determine if there was a violation of federal law and if the FBI has jurisdiction.'"

Newark Employee Accused Of Defrauding Cisco Systems. The AP (3/6, Robertson) reports, "A computer technician working for the city of Newark, N.J., was arrested on charges he defrauded technology giant Cisco Systems Inc. of more than $10 million by cheating one of the company's programs for replacing broken or defective parts. Michael Kyereme, 40, of Piscataway, N.J., was arrested Friday on a charge of mail fraud and made his initial appearance in Newark federal court on Monday, according to the FBI. He will remain in custody at least until a bail hearing Thursday. Kyereme worked as independent contractor for Newark, assisting city employees when their computers needed troubleshooting, the FBI said. … According to the criminal complaint, Kyereme ordered about 280 parts from Cisco since August 2002 _ some worth more than $250,000 _ and made false claims that they were replacements for Cisco parts in the city's computer system that were 'dead' or 'not responding.'"

Rhode Island Prosecutor Heads To New Orleans To Fight Crime. In a story distributed by Scripps Howard News Service (DC) (3/6, Stanton), the Providence Journal reports, "Federal prosecutor Richard Rose makes presentations at schools on a regular basis. He has T-shirts and runs through the names of those killed by gang violence in Providence." The Journal continues, "During the past few years, Rose has made a program called Street Smarts his mission as the anti-gang coordinator for the Rhode Island U.S. Attorney's office. He has spoken to more than 3,400 schoolchildren about the dangers of the streets, relating his own experiences as a fatherless black youth growing up in Providence. … Now Rose, the man best known for prosecuting ex-Providence Mayor Vincent A. Cianci Jr., is headed to New Orleans, where death is a near-daily occurrence in the wake of Hurricane Katrina in 2005." The Journal adds, "Rose, 48, is part of a federal task force of prosecutors and agents from throughout the country who will spend the next six months in the Crescent City, combating the escalating gun violence. He is among the second wave of federal reinforcements in a program that began last year. On Wednesday, Rose will report for duty at the U.S. Attorney's office there. … 'We've got to take the cowboys off the streets,' said Rose, in an interview last week. 'They had 161 murders last year, in a city of 200,000. Two weeks ago they had seven shootings in nine hours, five of them fatal -- that's a whole year for us!' … Katrina overwhelmed the city's law-enforcement structure, he noted. Floodwaters destroyed evidence and rendered courtrooms useless. Outside of the relatively safe tourist districts, criminals flooded lawless streets, emboldened by the chaos. Rose cried with his daughter as he watched television footage of refugees streaming across a bridge 'like survivors in a B-movie where the nuclear bomb is dropped.'"

Death Of Peacemaker Jeopardizes Boston Gang Truce. USA Today (3/6, Hampson) reports from Boston, "Two hooded strangers walked out of the darkness at the end of the street. … Jahmol Norfleet and his sister Teah, standing in front of their apartment house that night last November, stopped talking. On Holworthy Street, an unfamiliar face could mean danger — even since Jahmol, a leader of the notorious H Block gang, helped arrange a truce four months earlier in the city's bloodiest street war." USA continues, "In the 18 months before the truce, about two dozen people were shot. Jahmol himself was an inch from death; there was a crease where the bullet grazed his scalp. After that he took a gun to school, got busted and spent a year in jail. … Then the gangster turned peacemaker. At a secret summit, H Block and its rival gang, Heath Street, agreed to a truce. When word finally leaked out, Boston was enthralled. Perhaps the truce could spread across the city, maybe even across a nation where gang violence was helping jack up the crime rate for the first time in 15 years." USA adds, "So as the two strangers came down Holworthy, Teah would recall, she fought the impulse to run. After all, it was peacetime. Suddenly, the guys reached under their sweatshirts, pulled out pistols, charged through the parked cars and opened fire. … When it was over, Jahmol lay dead on the sidewalk. … The next day, Mayor Thomas Menino praised the young man for trying to 'change his neighborhood from a place of violence to a community of peace.' But now, three months after his death, it's unclear whether the gang truce is a national model, or even if it still exists." USA notes, "America has had street gangs almost as long as it's had streets. But gangs are turning up in more places, including towns, suburbs, even agricultural areas — 'spreading like a virus,' according to Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. … Kevin O'Connor, an associate deputy U.S. attorney general, said at a conference on gangs last month that there was 'a resurgence of gang violence in several U.S. cities.' The Justice Department is surveying about 20 communities to determine how bad the problem is. … The National Youth Gang Center estimates the national number of gang members rose to 760,000 in 2004, the most recent year figures are available, up from 731,000 two years earlier. Los Angeles alone has about 40,000 gang members; the police say violent gang-related crime rose 14% last year. … Law enforcers are trying many strategies — midnight basketball leagues, gun buybacks, neighborhood sweeps, 'start snitchin' ' campaigns. None has approached the success a decade ago of what Newsweek hailed as 'the Boston Miracle.' … In the mid-1990s a coalition of law enforcers, social workers and inner-city black ministers imposed a gang cease-fire with a carrot-and-stick promise to gangsters: Keep fighting and face tighter probation checks, arrests on outstanding warrants, federal prosecution; stop and have a chance at a summer job, tutoring, a break in sentencing."

Unresolved Corruption Probes Leave Officials In Limbo. The Arizona Republic (3/6, House) reports, "There has been a long list of recent Justice Department investigations announced or leaked to the media targeting current and former members of Congress. … In many of those cases, the public has been left for months, or longer, to wonder about whether lawmakers will be charged or what, if anything, the investigations revealed. That air of uncertainty, which may never be wiped away, could ultimately tarnish reputations or destroy careers. … That includes the so-called preliminary inquiry and assessment launched last fall by Paul Charlton, then U.S. attorney in Arizona, regarding activities of Rep. Rick Renzi, R-Ariz., and former Rep. Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz., respectively." The Republic continues, "In the months since, nothing has surfaced about either case. Both Renzi and Kolbe have denied wrongdoing. Meanwhile, Justice Department officials in Phoenix and Washington, after initially confirming the existence of both inquiries, have declined to give additional comment. At times, the Phoenix and Washington offices don't seem to have a handle on who is in charge, referring inquiries about the matters to each other. … Charlton, who left office in January, recently declined to comment. … Charlton was one of half a dozen top prosecutors forced out of office last year by the Justice Department. Some lawmakers say the move was related to investigations of politicians. Hearings will be held in Washington today." The Republic adds, "Meanwhile, potential targets wait to learn the status of the investigation. … Ex-Rep. J.D. Hayworth, R-Ariz., was linked in published news accounts in January 2006 to at least four other members of Congress reportedly under federal investigation in Virginia in connection with the influence-peddling scandal surrounding convicted former D.C. lobbyist Jack Abramoff. … Hayworth, who lost his re-election bid in November, has denied wrongdoing. Only one of the five lawmakers cited, former Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, has been convicted in the Abramoff scandal. … There has been no word since about where the inquiry involving Hayworth has led. … And there probably won't be, federal officials say. … 'A lot of that is up to the discretion of the U.S. attorney. In some cases, they issue a statement clearing them,' said Bill Carter, a Justice Department spokesman in Washington. … 'In some cases, they say nothing at all,' Carter said. 'Or they send a letter to the individual, if requested.'"

Challenges To Death Penalty On The Rise. The National Law Journal (3/6, Jaksic) reports, "A perfect storm of problematic executions, wrongful convictions and recent court rulings against the practice of lethal injection has led a growing number of states to challenge the death penalty through lawsuits and legislative action. … Adding still more to the momentum are a public backlash against the cost of capital cases and the development of more effective defense techniques, such as mitigation specialists who humanize death row inmates." The Journal continues, "Eleven states have halted some or all executions -- including Florida and Maryland in December -- and more lawmakers have been speaking out against the death penalty. … Last month alone, Maryland's governor urged legislators to replace the death penalty with life without parole, North Carolina's governor said executions should be halted until issues surrounding lethal injection are solved and Montana's Senate voted to abolish the death penalty." The Journal adds, "Court decisions have also continued to come down, such as a Delaware judge granting class action status on Feb. 22 to all death row inmates based on a case challenging lethal injection. Jackson v. Danberg, No. Civ. 06-3000-SLR (D. Del.). 'It's probably the strongest momentum since the death penalty was reinstated in the mid-1970s,' said John Holdridge, director of the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) Capital Punishment Project, which advocates against the death penalty." The Journal notes, "The Death Penalty Information Center recently listed the following 11 states as those that have stopped some or all executions: Arkansas, California, Delaware, Florida, Maryland, Missouri, New Jersey, North Carolina, Ohio, South Dakota and Tennessee, according to Richard Dieter, executive director of the nonprofit Washington, D.C.-based organization, which opposes capital punishment. … North Carolina's officials were in talks last week in hopes of resolving the situation, and the state's attorney general hinted on March 1 that a solution may be imminent. The executions have stopped either through government-issued moratoriums or judges' rulings, and have had varying effect."

Russian Expert's Son, Wife Say He Was Not Robbed During Attack. The Washington Post (3/6, B2, Rich) reports, "The assailants who shot an expert on Russian intelligence in Prince George's County last week did not, as law enforcement sources said, take his wallet, the victim's adult son said yesterday, showing the billfold to a reporter. The disclosure, which contradicts a report in The Washington Post yesterday, adds to the allegations and theories about the shooting, which left Paul Joyal, 53, critically wounded in his driveway Thursday night. During a brief interview at the family's home in the Adelphi area, Alex Joyal said his father was in critical but stable condition. … The timing of the shooting -- four days after Paul Joyal said on 'Dateline NBC' that the government of Russian President

Vladimir Putin was responsible for the poisoning death of former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko -- raised the possibility that Joyal might have been targeted in retaliation for his comment." The post notes that "several news outlets, including The Post, have cited anonymous law enforcement officials as saying that the shooting appeared to have occurred during a botched robbery. The claim that a wallet and briefcase had been taken from Paul Joyal was seen as offering additional support for the theory that he was targeted in a robbery or perhaps a failed carjacking. A source in The Post's report said yesterday that the wallet and briefcase were initially thought to have been taken but that the wallet was found in Joyal's car. The location of the briefcase was unclear last night."

The Washington Post/AP (3/6, Manning) reports, "The wife of an expert on Russian intelligence who was shot last week challenged reports Monday that her husband had been robbed. In a brief interview at the couple's suburban Washington home, Elizabeth Joyal said reports that Paul Joyal's wallet and briefcase were taken were false. She didn't know of any motive for Thursday's shooting outside their home in what she said was a normally safe area. 'We really have no idea what the reason was,' said Elizabeth Joyal, but added that 'it could easily have been a random act of violence.'"

Gibbons Did Not Clear Legal Defense Fund With House Committee. The AP (3/6, Riley) reports, "A legal defense fund set up for Nevada Gov. Jim Gibbons in November, when he was dealing with brewing legal cases including a woman's claim he assaulted her, wasn't sanctioned by a House Committee even though Gibbons was still a congressman. But representatives of the governor, who now has two high-priced lawyers handling an FBI probe into his associations with a longtime friend who's a wealthy federal contractor, say the fund was created properly. They add that the fund shouldn't run afoul of a state law limiting contributions during legislative sessions. Gibbons spokeswoman Melissa Subbotin said Monday that a U.S. House committee's approval of the defense fund wasn't sought in November because Gibbons, a Republican who served five terms in the House, was seeking election to a state office and not a federal office. … Attorneys Don Campbell of Las Vegas and Abbe Lowell of Washington, D.C., currently are helping Gibbons deal with FBI questions about his associations with Warren Trepp. Gibbons has denied that he accepted payments or gifts from Trepp in exchange for helping the wealthy Reno software contractor get defense contracts while Gibbons was a member of Congress."

Ford Returns To Memphis Council Following Grand Jury Subpoenas. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (3/6, Aaronson) reports, "City Councilman Edmund Ford will take his seat at the dais today for the first time since Memphis Light, Gas and Water Division president and CEO Joseph Lee admitted the politician received special treatment. But Ford's actions as a public official -- including during his tenure as chairman of the council committee that oversees MLGW's spending and budget -- are key to elevating the utility scandal to criminal charges. The crux of the case: Federal prosecutors need to prove that Ford used his position on the City Council to benefit MLGW improperly in exchange for leniency on his more than $16,000 in debt to the city-owned utility. … The federal investigation of MLGW became public following the delivery of grand jury subpoenas to the utility in mid-February. On Feb. 22, vice president of customer operations Alonzo Weaver and Gloria Washington, a top assistant to Lee, testified before the grand jury. Five days later, on Feb. 27, Lee responded to his grand jury subpoena. … If the government can document quid pro quo, prosecutors' law of choice could be the Hobbs Act, a federal code that prohibits bribery and extortion, among other crimes, affecting interstate commerce. As a utility company, MLGW engages in interstate commerce. The Hobbs Act allows crimes usually prosecuted in state courts -- from robbery to racketeering -- to be brought to U.S. District Court, which has strict penalty guidelines and no opportunities for parole.

Spending On Los Angeles Anti-Gang Initiative Questioned. The Los Angeles Times (3/6, Mcgreevy, Winton) reports, "Los Angeles has spent $100 million over the last decade on a gang-prevention program, even though it doesn't track how many youths it keeps out of gangs and has been repeatedly criticized for not adequately coordinating with schools and police." The Times continues, "Unlike anti-gang efforts in other cities that have been held up as models by the federal government, L.A. Bridges lacks a system for determining whether its clients are involved in gangs, so there is no way of knowing whether the program actually works. … The program has come under growing scrutiny at City Hall as L.A. and federal authorities have launched a new gang crackdown. Critics point out that in 2006, gang crime increased 15.7% over the year before, according to LAPD statistics." The Times adds, "Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa has vowed to increase funding for intervention programs, saying the gang crackdown can't focus solely on law enforcement. But he is limiting funding of L.A. Bridges through September while officials try to assess its effectiveness. … Supporters acknowledge that L.A. Bridges needs to do a better job of working with other agencies, but they maintain it provides a valuable community service and would be more effective if the city expanded it. … The city spends $14 million annually on Bridges, which essentially screens and gives money to community organizations that do the actual intervention. Bridges I is a gang prevention program that provides after-school tutoring, counseling and other services to students from 27 middle schools. Bridges II offers job training to gang members in the hope that employment will get them out of gang life. The contracts range from $227,000 to $1.7 million."

Some Dispute Benefits Of Sex Offender Therapy. The New York Times (3/6, Goodnough, Davey) reports from Atascadero, CA, "During five years of psychotherapy at a treatment center here for sex offenders who have finished their prison terms, Bill Price, a pedophile who admits to 21 victims as young as 3, has constructed a painstaking plan for staying straight. … A requirement of his treatment, the plan catalogs on five single-spaced pages the tactics Mr. Price has learned to stop molesting." The Times continues, "There are 42 so far, including avoiding places where children congregate, abstaining from alcohol, shunning the Internet and sniffing ammonia whenever he has a deviant thought. … 'It was just like a hunt for me,' Mr. Price, 59, a former Sunday school teacher, said of his sexual crimes. 'I kept choosing children because they were easier prey; they were easier to deal with than women.'" The Times adds, "Treatment plans like Mr. Price's, known as relapse prevention, have been a cornerstone of efforts to reform sex offenders for the past 20 years. Yet there is no convincing evidence that the approach works, or that others do either. … Similar to aspects of Alcoholics Anonymous, relapse prevention has sex offenders own up to wrongdoing and resign themselves to a lifelong day-to-day struggle with temptation. But one of the few authoritative studies of the method, conducted in California from 1985 to 2001, found that those who entered relapse prevention treatment were slightly more likely to offend again than those who got no therapy at all. … Clinicians who work with sex offenders cling to relapse prevention nonetheless, and its durability speaks volumes about the troubled, politically fraught science of treating sex offenders. Not only is relapse prevention of questionable value, but so are the tests to gauge whether sex offenders in treatment still get inappropriately aroused, the drugs used for so-called chemical castration and the methods of predicting risk of reoffending." The Times notes, "Treatment methods have become particularly topical as thousands of sex offenders are confined or restricted beyond their prison terms under civil commitment laws on the books in 19 states. The laws have been found constitutional in part because they aim to provide treatment if possible; New York legislators announced last week that the state would soon allow civil confinement. … On average, the civil commitment programs cost four times more than keeping sex offenders in prison. But too little research has been conducted into how to treat sex offenders, experts say, putting psychotherapists and others working in civil commitment centers at a distinct disadvantage."

US Probing Counterfeit Wine Sales. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A1, Wilke) reports, "Federal prosecutors have uncorked a criminal investigation into counterfeit-wine sales, sending subpoenas to rare-wine collectors and to some of the world's leading auction houses, including Christie's in London and Zachys in New York." The Journal continues, "A federal grand jury in New York has begun hearing evidence in the case, and the art-fraud unit of the Federal Bureau of Investigation has conducted interviews, according to people who have been contacted in the course of the probe." The Journal adds, "The criminal investigation is focusing, among other things, on whether auction houses, collectors or importers knowingly sold counterfeit wines despite doubts about their authenticity, those close to the case said. Such sales could be prosecuted under federal fraud statutes. … The inquiry comes as wine sales are booming amid a broader surge in the market for luxury goods. Backed in part by robust profits on Wall Street, collectors and speculators increasingly are paying $1,000 or more per bottle, especially for the rare Bordeaux vintages of France. … That's raised new fears about counterfeiting, which is beginning to threaten confidence in the market for rare wines -- except those sold directly from wineries. Wine Spectator magazine recently estimated that as much as 5% of rare vintages sold privately or at auction today may be fake." The Journal notes, "The criminal investigation began in December, after several collectors began pressing auction houses and wine merchants to take some measure of responsibility for the alleged sale of counterfeit wines. The collectors included Russell Frye, a wealthy software entrepreneur, and William Koch, president of closely held Oxbow Corp., a global mining and energy concern. His billionaire brothers control Koch Industries, a $25 billion business empire. … Mr. Koch filed a civil suit last year in federal court in New York, alleging that a German wine merchant, Hardy Rodenstock, forged bottles of wine he claimed had belonged to Thomas Jefferson and had been discovered in a bricked-up cellar in Paris. Mr. Rodenstock also claimed to have other extremely rare wines, including a cache belonging to Czar Nicholas II of Russia, Mr. Koch alleged. "

Taxpayers Footing Legal Bills For Former FBI Agent In Mob Case. The New York Daily News (3/6, Sherman) reports, "Taxpayers are footing part of the mounting legal bills for an ex-FBI agent accused of helping a Brooklyn Mafia boss commit four murders, the Daily News has learned." The Daily News continues, "The Justice Department is helping fund retired agent Lindley DeVecchio's defense, which has cost more than $450,000 since his indictment last year by the Brooklyn district attorney's office. … 'It's an expensive litigation,' said DeVecchio's lawyer Douglas Grover, who declined to comment further." The Daily News adds, "A highly informed source confirmed the Justice Department contributions, saying, 'It's on an hourly rate. Not a top New York City rate, more like a federal public defenders' rate.' … It could not immediately be determined how much the department is paying. … 'There is a process in place by which employees or former [FBI] employees who are the subject of civil litigation or criminal charges can apply for coverage of their legal costs. The recommendation is forwarded to the Department of Justice, where a final determination is made,' FBI spokesman John Miller said. … In a case that rocked New York law enforcement, DeVecchio, 66, was indicted last year for providing information on informants and mob rivals to Colombo family boss Gregory Scarpa before the murders."

Opportunistic Scammers Flock To Midwest Casinos. USA Today (3/6, 3A, Keen) reports, "Casinos sprouting across the Midwest are attracting sophisticated cheaters from Las Vegas, Atlantic City and overseas who believe they can scam new, unseasoned staff, gambling officials say." USA continues, "Cheating is often discovered only when casinos' books don't add up, making it difficult to nab culprits, says Joe Diaz of the Iowa Division of Criminal Investigation. … 'We've had people coming in from out of state trying to take advantage of inexperienced staff or a staff that hasn't got all the bugs worked out,' he says. Most casinos' security staffs are aided by state or local police." USA adds, "Joe Massa, general manager of Iowa's Riverside Casino & Golf Resort, knew scammers might target his casino, which opened in August. He hired experienced pit and security staff, he says, and hasn't detected any out-of-state cheaters. … Nevertheless, casinos in Iowa — where a half-dozen have opened since 2000 — and other states allegedly have been hit by out-of-state cheats: … Three gamblers from the East Coast, including one from Atlantic City, were charged in Osceola, Iowa, with using shaved coins to trick slot machines into awarding credits. … A casino in Joliet, Ill., was targeted by a team that included a Nevadan. They were charged with using fake cash vouchers to steal $50,000. … Indiana, with help from the FBI and IRS, is investigating international cheaters. … 'They have gone from site to site, and they seem to prey on riverboats or smaller venues,' says Ernest Yelton of the Indiana Gaming Commission. 'They perhaps believe that we are less sophisticated.'"

NYTimes Blasts NYPD Theft Sting. The New York Times (3/6) editorializes, "The New York Police Department has been going fishing. Not content to nab criminals when they break the law on their own, the department has been planting unattended bags in subway stations to see who might take them, at which point waiting officers pounce." The Times continues, "As NY1 News reported last week, 220 people were arrested last year in the sting, known as Operation Lucky Bag. In dismissing one of these cases, a Brooklyn judge said the police 'do not need to manipulate a situation where temptation may overcome even people who would normally never think of committing a crime.' This program bothers us for that and many other reasons and should be discontinued immediately." The Times adds, "Civil libertarians have argued that the program is entrapment. That is a legal distinction for the courts to decide, but it certainly looks like that to a layperson. It is clearly a poor use of resources. People wandering off with lost property ranks far down the list of law enforcement priorities. … There is also the question of whether the sting does actual harm. In an era of terrorism, where the police have to rely on the help of average people to notice anything suspicious — including apparently abandoned bags — the last thing New York needs are cynical operations that encourage mistrust between the police and subway riders. … And of course, there is the effect on neighborliness. It is remarkable how many people in this city are willing to track down the owners of lost cellphones, wallets or bags. Arresting good Samaritans is bad enough, but encouraging them not to help in the future through this kind of overly aggressive policing is a downright shame. The best thing to do with this misbegotten program would be to end it."

Book Examines Savage DC Murder. The Washington Post (3/6, B1, Cauvin) reports, "It took Kevin Flynn just over a year to put away the man who killed Diane Hawkins and her 13-year-old daughter, Katrina Harris. … It has taken him almost 14 years to put to paper the story of that night in 1993 when Norman Harrell took the lives -- and the hearts -- of Hawkins, who was his ex-girlfriend, and her daughter." The Post continues, "Homicides were everyday occurrences in the District then. The city was in the clutches of a crack war and its impulsive, impersonal violence. But the slayings of Hawkins and Harris were different. They were personal, savage. … And they seized Flynn, then a 36-year-old homicide prosecutor who had just become a father, like no other case had -- or has." The Post adds, "The crime scene at the house in Northeast Washington was like nothing he had ever seen, the killer's rage so evident. Hawkins's heart was left adrift among her innards; her daughter's was gone. … And the sons and daughters, sisters and cousins Flynn first encountered at D.C. Superior Court were like no family he had met. Angry as they were, the victims' family shared a faith in God and a belief in the law and in Flynn himself. …

Indeed, after the jurors had listened to him, even after they had convicted Harrell in the summer of 1994, Flynn found himself with more to say -- about Hawkins, her daughter, the incredible strength of the family they left behind and himself. … Many drafts -- and many murder cases -- later, Flynn's book, 'Relentless Pursuit,' arrived in stores this month. … It is a true-crime memoir by a prosecutor who took on the biggest trial of his career in the midst of his own family crisis. On the opening day of the trial, his father learned that lung cancer had spread to his brain and that he probably had only months to live. … It is also the story of how, in his own time of need, Flynn says he found a measure of comfort in the company of a family that was wrestling with painful emotions that have never gone away."

CIVIL LAW:

Radio Broadcasters Agree To Pay $12.5 Million Payola Fine. The Los Angeles Times (3/6, Puzzanghera) reports, "Four of the nation's largest broadcast radio companies have agreed to pay a combined $12.5 million to settle a federal investigation into 'pay-for-play' practices and will provide thousands of hours of free airtime to local musicians and independent record labels, sources familiar with the agreement said today." The Times continues, "Details of the settlement are being worked out and the Federal Communications Commission still must approve it. Under terms of the agreement, Clear Channel Communications Inc., CBS Radio Inc., Entercom Communications Corp. and Citadel Broadcasting Corp. would pay one of the largest fines ever levied by the FCC. The companies allegedly received money, airline tickets, clothing and other gifts from major record companies to play certain songs. … The under-the-table payments, known as payola, have been illegal since a series of pay-for-play scandals in the early days of rock 'n' roll in the 1950s. Any payment in exchange for airtime must be disclosed by broadcasters." The Times adds, "The $12.5-million fine to be paid by the four companies is in line with settlements two of the companies reached with former New York Attorney General Elliott Spitzer. CBS Radio agreed to pay $2 million in October and Entercom agreed to a $4.45 million fine two months later. … But the proposed FCC fine pales in comparison to big settlements Spitzer got from major record companies. Universal Music Group, for example, agreed last year to pay more than $12 million to settle payola allegations. The FCC's jurisdiction, however, is limited to broadcast radio stations."

The AP (3/6, Dunbar) reports, "The settlement was reached at the same time as a separate deal designed to lead to more airtime for smaller record companies and their lesser-known artists as well as local musicians." The AP continues, "The American Association of Independent Music, a group of independent record labels, has received a commitment from the same four broadcasters for the free airtime, the officials said. … In addition to airplay, the broadcasters and the independent labels have also negotiated a set of 'rules of engagement' that will guide how record company representatives and radio programmers interact. … The free airtime would be granted to companies not owned or controlled by the nation's four dominant music labels — Sony BMG Music Entertainment, Warner Music Group, Universal Music Group and EMI Group."

The Washington Post (3/6, D1, Babington) reports, "The four broadcast conglomerates, which together own more than 1,500 stations, have agreed to pay hefty fines and to provide air time for local artists and independent record labels, government and industry officials said yesterday. The negotiated settlement is meant to end a probe into the practice of what is known as 'payola,' in which large record companies quietly give cash or other benefits to radio station employees who agree to play music by the companies' artists. … 'This is the largest collective fine in the history of American broadcasting,' said Jonathan S. Adelstein, one of the five members of the Federal Communications Commission. 'It wipes payola off the radio dial,' he said, and gives lesser-known musicians a chance to reach a wider audience."

The Washington Times (3/6, Rowland) reports, "The monetary settlement with the FCC is part of a consent decree that has yet to be voted on by the full commission, sources said. It was reached at the same time broadcasters committed to providing 8,400 half-hour segments of airtime to small record labels and unsigned artists. … Broadcasters do not admit fault under the FCC deal, which calls for stricter oversight of their interactions with record labels. Some of the new requirements would include a limit on gifts from record companies; a special hot line for employees to report violations; and a fleet of compliance officers to monitor stations, which would list all items of value received from record companies in a database. … Of the four broadcasters involved, Clear Channel and CBS Radio own stations in the Washington area."

The New York Times (3/6, Leeds) reports, "If approved, the settlement would rank as the biggest penalty ever imposed at one time by the F.C.C. — at least until the agency levies another proposed fine, $24 million, against Univision, the Spanish broadcasting giant, which is accused of sidestepping its obligations to supply educational programming for children." The Times adds, "The F.C.C. started formal investigations of the radio companies last year after disclosures that radio programmers accepted gifts, luxury trips and other enticements surfaced as part of an inquiry led by Eliot Spitzer, then the New York attorney general. … Mr. Spitzer reached a series of settlements with the four major music conglomerates — the Universal Music Group, Sony BMG Music Entertainment, the EMI Group and the Warner Music Group — totaling more than $30 million. CBS Radio and Entercom settled cases with Mr. Spitzer's office for a combined $6.25 million. … The settlement with the F.C.C. comes at the same time as a separate arrangement in which the broadcasters agreed to devote more time to playing artists who are not signed to contracts with the four big record companies."

Fewer Congressional Constraints On Drug Prescriptions Urged. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (3/6, A19), Dr. Scott Gottlieb, who was deputy commissioner of the FDA from 2005 to 2007 and is a resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, writes, "Inside the federal agencies that oversee parts of the health-care system, there is a palpable view that doctors can no longer be trusted to do the right thing. … The Food and Drug Administration, Medicare and even the Justice Department all believe they cannot rely on many doctors to heed safety warnings, wisely weigh new medical information, or follow treatment approaches that maximize health benefits or lower costs. So in recent years, these agencies have hatched rules that dictate when treatments should be delivered and even how they can be administered -- especially when it comes to new drugs." Gottlieb adds, "The result is increasing federal regulation of medical practice that constrains health-care providers and limits the choices patients have. It might get worse. New legislation offered by Sens. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.,) and Michael Enzi (R., Wyo.,), intended to make drugs safer, would raise this regulatory burden by reducing a physician's discretion to exercise clinical judgment and erecting barriers that will exacerbate disparities in access to care. … The legislative proposal extends the FDA's ability to restrict which physicians can prescribe a medicine, and which pharmacies can dispense it, through risk-management plans that would accompany the approval of many new drugs. These 'RiskMAPs,' as they are called inside the FDA, already guide the use of about 30 marketed drugs as part of 'voluntary' arrangements with drug companies. … Right now, pharmaceutical companies propose the plans to better balance the risks and benefits of their drugs, in order to secure FDA approval. But these plans impose burdens, especially on patients who already face difficulty obtaining the specialist care that many RiskMAPs require for the dispensing of new drugs. Thus the FDA and the pharmaceutical industry have mostly confined RiskMAPs to drugs with unpredictable and potentially deadly risks, such as anaphylaxis or rapid organ failure." Gottlieb adds, "That sense of restraint is lifting. New proposals by Congress and the Institute of Medicine advocate RiskMAPs for mitigating a wider set of less-serious problems and to constrain the off-label prescribing of new drugs, even though such prescribing is the standard of care for many diseases. The proposals are gaining traction. Once the FDA is granted the authority to simply impose these RiskMAPs on drug companies, there will be a lot of political pressure on the agency to constrain prescription writing in the name of drug safety. … The solutions to any of the health-care problems that government is trying to mitigate will not rest in Washington's constraining 'fixes,' but with these organs of medicine working with agencies to promote practice standards and safety measures that do not sacrifice medical autonomy and patient choice."

FBI To Probe Teen's Death At Maryland Juvenile Facility. The Baltimore Sun (3/6, Garland, Dechter) reports, "On the same day the state medical examiner ruled that the death of a student at the Bowling Brook Preparatory School was a homicide, the FBI said it is conducting an independent investigation into the incident." The Sun continues, "At a joint news conference Monday in Westminster, federal officials said their investigation into the death of 17-year-old Isaiah Simmons was ordered last week by the Justice Department. Local officials said they would present evidence already gathered by the Carroll County sheriff to a grand jury to determine whether criminal charges should be brought in Maryland. … Simmons died Jan. 23 after being physically restrained for three hours by counselors at Bowling Brook, a privately run residential program for juvenile offenders." The Sun adds, "Officials stressed that the medical examiner's ruling of a homicide -- meaning the death was the result of actions by another person or people -- does not necessarily mean a crime was committed. That will be decided by the grand jury next month, said David P. Daggett, Carroll County deputy state's attorney. … Kevin R. Lewis, the assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Baltimore office, said at the press conference that federal authorities began monitoring the Simmons' case several weeks ago at the request of the sheriff's office. … Last week, the U.S. Department of Justice asked the FBI to formally launch a separate investigation to determine whether federal civil rights laws were violated, Lewis said. … The investigation will 'be starting right away,' he said, and the results will be reported to the Justice Department. … An FBI spokeswoman, Michelle Crnkovich, stressed that the investigation is not an indication that the federal government lacks confidence in Carroll County's probe. … 'Absolutely not. We have every confidence in them,' she said."

DOJ To Monitor Elections In Four California Cities Today. The Fresno Bee (3/6) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department said Monday it planned to monitor municipal elections in four Southern California cities to ensure they comply with federal voting law." The Bee continues, "Federal observers on Tuesday will visit polling places in Azusa, Gardena, Paramount and Rosemead. … Last year federal investigators visited polling places in the region and determined that Azusa and Paramount failed to fully translate election materials into Spanish, as they are required to do under the federal Voting Rights Act. Authorities also said Rosemead failed to offer all voting materials in Spanish, Chinese and Vietnamese." The Bee adds, "The Voting Rights Act requires cities to provide election materials in any foreign language that is spoken by a substantial number of people within their boundaries. … Azusa, Paramount and Rosemead each signed federal consent decrees last July requiring them to fix flaws in their election procedures. … Gardena, which has a large non-English speaking population, said on its Web site that it planned to provide ballots and polling place officials who can speak in English, Spanish, Japanese, and Korean."

The Torrance (CA) Daily Breeze (3/6, Maddaus) reports, "The Department of Justice won't say why polling in the South Bay community will be receiving special attention on Tuesday. … The U.S. Department of Justice will monitor Tuesday's election in Gardena to ensure that the city complies with the federal Voting Rights Act. … In announcing the decision Monday, federal authorities did not explain why Gardena had been selected for special attention." The Breeze adds, "The other three cities chosen for election monitoring — Azusa, Rosemead and Paramount — are all subject to federal consent decrees related to ballot translations. But Gardena, which prints ballots in English, Spanish, Japanese and Korean, has not been cited for translation problems in the past. … 'It's not a sign of censure,' said Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson. 'It's routine. We want to do this to ensure compliance with the law.' … Federal observers will be on hand at polling places in the city throughout the day. An attorney from the Civil Rights Division will coordinate the office's activities."

DOJ To Tour Washington Jail. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (3/6) reports, "Justice Department officials are expected to spend the next few days in Seattle as part of an ongoing federal investigation, touring the King County Jail and interviewing staff members." The P-I continues, "In October, the department sent a letter to King County officials announcing that it would be investigating the main jail in downtown Seattle. Primary concerns were occurrences of sexual misconduct by corrections officers, suicides, and controlling the spread of infectious diseases. … Federal investigators made their first visit in December. A final report could take six months to a year."

KING 5 Seattle (3/6) reports, "Jail Director Reed Holtgeerts told KING 5 News he welcomes the investigation and has already begun providing the requested documentation into jail safety and procedures. Holgeerts is meeting this afternoon with the Department of Justice and union representatives for corrections officers and others who work in the jail. … 'The message has been sent very clearly that there is zero tolerance (for sexual misconduct),' said Holgeerts. 'If we find it, you're gone and you're going to be charged.'" KING 5 adds, "During a KING 5 investigation in the fall of November, 2005, corrections officers said that they were being exposed to serious diseases such as MRSA (Methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus Aureus) and that the jail wasn't doing enough to prevent the spread of the highly contagious disease. Some guards told KING 5 they had contracted MRSA and passed it on to their spouses and children. … The American Civil Liberties Union toured the jail late last month and says that while some improvements have been made, more needs to be done to stop the spread of MRSA."

Los Angeles Police Object To Financial Disclosure Requirement. CBS 2 Los Angeles (3/6) reports, "Up to 600 Los Angeles Police Department anti-gang and narcotics officers have threatened to retire or transfer to other units if they are required to provide personal financial information, as mandated by a federal consent decree, police union representatives said Monday." CBS 2 continues, "Los Angeles Police Protective League officials are considering a lawsuit to block the disclosure requirement, which was imposed following the Rampart Division corruption scandal, in which gang officers were caught stealing drugs and framing suspects." CBS 2 adds, " The U.S. Justice Department's consent decree with the city requires future gang officers disclose their finances so supervisors might more easily tell if they were illegally profiting from police work. … 'We have seen the LAPD repeatedly allow gang members and others to manipulate the system to target officers,' Bob Baker, president of the league said. … 'We have little confidence that information will be safeguarded once it has been released,' Baker said. 'The simple fact is that the financial disclosure rules that the LAPD is about to implement open the Pandora's box, once somebody's financial information is available and public, there is no way to turn back and make it private again.' … In May, U.S. District Judge Gary Feess extended the five-year consent decree for another three years."

Suit Accuses Akin Gump Of Age Bias. The Legal Times (3/6, Schwartz) reports, "The old guard has been getting its dander up. First there was Sidley Austin, where partners are challenging the firm's mandatory retirement policy. … Other lawyers have followed, and just last week one Washington attorney filed suit in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia alleging that he was fired from one of the city's largest firms because he was too old." The Times continues, "Donald Gross, who is in his 50s, says he was let go from Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld in October 2004, not even a year and a half after he was hired as senior counsel in the Korea practice. Before his termination, Gross alleges that his practice group's head, Sukhan Kim, 'reiterated to him that Akin Gump was terminating him not because of any defects in his performance, but because he was "too senior" because of his age and, therefore, "not a good fit."' … Pillsbury Winthrop Shaw Pittman partner Christine Kearns, who is representing Akin Gump, says the firm treated Gross fairly. 'The firm certainly denies the allegations of age discrimination,' she says." The Times adds, "Gross' case differs from some of the other suits that allege more systemic problems or forced retirements. But it paints a picture of the trouble an older attorney had acclimating to life in a law firm."

NYPD Officers Testify To Grand Jury About Killing Of Unarmed Black Man. The New York Times (3/6, Baker, Moynihan) reports, "Two of the five police officers involved in the killing of Sean Bell, an unarmed black man who died in a hail of 50 police bullets, testified yesterday before a grand jury in Queens that is weighing evidence in the case." The Times continues, "The two officers, Detective Paul Headley and Officer Michael Carey, testified voluntarily without immunity from prosecution in the case, officials said. Union officials and lawyers for the men said they had been eager to talk about what occurred on Nov. 25, when they and their colleagues opened fire on Mr. Bell's car outside the Club Kalua strip club in Jamaica, Queens." The Times adds, "Yesterday's events were noteworthy because city police officers who are the focus of grand juries sometimes stay silent about their roles in such shootings. And the first public appearances by the officers — more than three months after the shooting of Mr. Bell — made for a day filled with emotions. … In the morning, Detective Headley, 35, was surrounded by about a dozen people, including his lawyer and union officials, when he strode toward the office building in Queens where the grand jury is seated. He wore a blue suit, stepped confidently and appeared to be at ease. He testified for about two hours and then left the building about 2:30 p.m., again surrounded by supporters. … Officer Carey, 26, arrived later, about 3:30 p.m., also wearing a business suit but appearing tenser as he kept his expression fixed, his eyes set straight ahead. He testified, then left the building about 5:20 p.m. with supporters, including Patrick J. Lynch, the president of the Patrolmen's Benevolent Association, by his side." The Times notes, "Separately, each officer declined to discuss his testimony. But union officials and their lawyers spoke for them. 'My client is relieved that he had the opportunity to answer the questions the grand jury posed to him,' said John Arlia, the lawyer for Detective Headley. 'He is relieved he had the opportunity to speak to them and tell his version of the events.' … Stephen C. Worth, the lawyer for Officer Carey, said, 'This officer stood there and answered all of their questions.' He said his client testified for about an hour and a half."

LAPD Officers Charged In Beating Of Teen. The Los Angeles Times (3/6, Hong) reports, "A 41-year-old LAPD officer was charged today with unlawful use of force and filing a false police report for allegedly choking and punching a 16-year-old boy in the Central Division station in December." The Times continues, "Officer Sean Meade's actions were recorded by a hidden camera that had been installed after some chairs at the station had been vandalized. Police Chief William Bratton and Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa both expressed outrage at the incident. Bratton immediately called for the arrest of Meade." The Times adds, "Department sources who viewed the video said it appears to show Meade choking the boy, then removing his handcuffs and challenging him to a fight. … The teenager was arrested on suspicion of a curfew violation in Chinatown, and Bratton said the attack was without provocation. The boy was picked up about 1:30 a.m. while walking with a teenage girl. Police called the girl's parents, who picked her up, then took the boy to Central Division."

High Court Upholds Colorado Redistricting Map. The AP (3/6, Yost) reports, "The Supreme Court on Monday ruled against Colorado voters challenging a congressional redistricting plan favorable to Democrats." In a unanimous decision, "the justices said that three Republican voters were not entitled to sue in an effort to replace a redistricting plan ordered by a court with one passed by a Republican-controlled state legislature. The three voters were joined by a former Democratic state legislator who often voted with Republicans."

"Don't Ask, Don't Tell" Policy Comes Under New Scrutiny. The Christian Science Monitor (3/6, Lubold, 59K) reports, "'Don't ask, don't tell' – the 14-year-old policy that keeps openly declared gays from serving in the military – is coming under new scrutiny." Although "overturning it remains an unlikely prospect in the near term, given the political explosiveness of the issue," the "needs of war – and a fresh push by gay advocates in the courts and Congress – is pushing the policy back into the limelight." An annual "poll begun in 2003 by the independent Military Times newspapers has shown a yearly increase in support for homosexuals serving openly in the military. Nevertheless, in its latest poll, only 30 percent of a sampling of 6,000 of subscribers approved of the idea."

Transgender Professor Charges Evangelical College With Gender Bias. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, B1, Sataline) reports, "For 15 years, John Nemecek was a respected business professor and associate dean at Spring Arbor University, an evangelical college in Michigan. But after he started wearing makeup and earrings and asked friends to call him Julie, he was demoted, then fired, and told that his womanly appearance violated 'Christian behavior.'" The Journal continues, "Prof. Nemecek is contesting the dismissal under federal discrimination laws, presenting a test in a growing clash between religious and employee rights. The case is the latest of a number of conflicts pitting two constitutional principles against each other: the freedom of religious organizations to operate without government intrusion versus the rights of workers to be free of discrimination based on race, religion, sex or nationality." The Journal adds, "Prof. Nemecek's complaint to the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, scheduled to be heard today, charges that the university, which is affiliated with the Free Methodist Church of North America, violated federal and state civil-rights laws by ordering the professor to groom and dress like a typical male. The school also violated Michigan's law protecting the disabled, the complaint says, because it allegedly treated Prof. Nemecek as if he had a disability that prevented him from doing his job. Spring Arbor declined to comment on the specific allegations in the EEOC complaint. … Since Congress passed the Civil Rights Act in 1964, courts have recognized that churches enjoy a 'ministerial exception' allowing them to discriminate to uphold their beliefs. This right is recognized when it comes to selecting clergy, such as allowing Catholics to exclude women priests, but courts have not settled on the sweep of this exception -- and whether it would cover teachers of secular subjects at religious institutions, says Eugene Volokh, a professor at the University of California Los Angeles School of Law. … Civil-rights groups said they have received a growing number of complaints from gay and transgender employees dismissed for religious and other reasons. … Federal courts have also issued mixed decisions on whether people changing their sex are protected by civil-rights laws, disagreeing over what constitutes discrimination based on sex. … Prof. Nemecek's lawyer is basing her argument on a 1989 U.S. Supreme Court opinion. The justices found that Price Waterhouse engaged in gender stereotyping by illegally denying Ann Hopkins a partnership because of her 'macho' behavior. … That ruling formed the backbone of a 2004 decision in U.S. District Court in Cincinnati. The judge ruled that Salem, Ohio, illegally fired a transsexual firefighter because the U.S. Civil Rights Act protects someone who does not 'act and/or identify with his or her gender.'"

Conservative Professor Settles With Community College Over Firing. The Washington Times (3/6, Richardson) reports from Denver, "Anson Rohr is known as an outspoken critic of global terrorism. Ordinarily, that wouldn't be enough to get a person fired. … But Mr. Rohr says that's what happened after he hung an anti-terrorism poster at his work space, urged a religion professor to present a balanced view of Islam and generally made no secret of his conservative views at Front Range Community College." The Times continues, "After he was fired last year from his job as an administrative assistant, Mr. Rohr sued college officials for violating his free-speech rights. Last week, he agreed to accept an undisclosed financial settlement. … In return, Mr. Rohr, 50, is prohibited from working again at the Westminster, Colo., college. Although he misses the flexible schedule and paycheck, he said, saying goodbye won't be a problem." The Times adds, "Mr. Rohr, who was employed at the college for five years, has a long history of conservative dissent. … He wrote letters to the campus newsletters responding to left-wing articles. He criticized an anti-war presentation at the college. He sent an e-mail to a religion professor asking for information about a course on Islam after hearing that the course presented an unbalanced view. … The last straw, however, was his decision to hang a poster at his desk depicting a scene from the school massacre at Beslan, Russia, where Muslim terrorists killed 334 students and adults in 2004. The print showed a man carrying a dead child. … A faculty member, Julie Voss, saw the poster and wrote an e-mail to administrators asking for its removal, saying she was 'deeply offended,' according to court documents." The Times notes, "Dean of Instruction Therese Brown called Mr. Rohr and ordered him to remove the picture, but he refused, citing his First Amendment rights. He also argued that other college employees were permitted to display signs with political messages. … Mr. Rohr, who had regularly received positive job reviews, said he hung up on the dean after she continued to berate him. She denied the accusation in court documents."

DOJ, FBI Praised For Reopening Civil Rights Cold Cases. The Richmond Times-Dispatch (3/6) editorializes, "An adage teaches that justice delayed is justice denied. In the case of those killed during the fight for civil rights in the mid-20th century, the tardy justice promised by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller is important nonetheless." The Times-Dispatch continues, "Spurred by a string of successful prosecutions of murders dating to the civil-rights era, the Department of Justice and FBI announced they will open investigations into 12 additional unsolved cases. In all, Gonzales and Mueller expressed an interest in 40. To individuals who up to this point 'have quite literally gotten away with murder,' the FBI director spoke with clarity: 'You've not gotten away with anything. We're still on your trail.'" The Times-Dispatch adds, "Every murder is heinous, and all perpetrators should answer for their crimes. Yet those killed in the cases the DOJ and FBI have reopened often died only because they had dark brown skin. These victims deserve the special attention Washington will now focus on them. Society deserves the attention, too. The prosecutions serve a penitential function. … If the individuals who committed these crimes are still alive, they should be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law, no matter how elderly the assailants or their conspirators. This rights a specific wrong, and it sends a proper message about the rule of law to the communities these crimes were calculated to intimidate. In these instances justice delayed is justice served."

NYTimes Praises Crist's Proposal To Restore Felons' Voting Rights. The New York Times (3/6, 1.16M) editorializes, "Florida is notorious for running elections badly, but its new governor is trying to fix one of the state's most unjust and undemocratic practices. He has called for tearing down the barriers that prevent as many as 950,000 ex-offenders from voting. The United States stands alone in the free world when it comes to laws that strip convicted felons of the right to vote -- sometimes for life -- even after they complete their sentences and go on to crime-free lives. … Gov. Charlie Crist has a better idea: automatically restoring voting rights to felons who complete their sentences. … That's an excellent proposal."

ANTITRUST:

Intel Says Emails Related To AMD Antitrust Case May Be Lost. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, B5, Clark) reports, "Intel Corp. said it may have lost many internal emails that it is obliged to produce for rival Advanced Micro Devices Inc. and other plaintiffs in high-profile antitrust litigation. … The disclosure -- which could further complicate AMD's antitrust suit against Intel -- comes as AMD warned that it expects to miss its first-quarter revenue target amid an intensifying battle with Intel, its far larger competitor." The Journal continues, "An Intel spokesman said it couldn't yet estimate the number of missing emails, expressing optimism that it will be able to recover most of them. Richard Horwitz, a lawyer representing Intel, wrote the judge overseeing the litigation that the company 'very much regrets this happened.'" The Journal adds, "AMD sued Intel in June 2005, accusing the company of using a variety of improper tactics to maintain a monopoly in sales of microprocessors that provide the calculating power for most personal computers and server systems. Private antitrust suits on behalf of Intel shareholders followed. Intel has insisted that its tactics are fair and legal. The AMD suit against Intel was filed in U.S. District Court in Delaware. … The wide-ranging cases touch on Intel's dealings with many computer makers, retailers and other companies. Chuck Mulloy, the Intel spokesman, said the company has already produced 17 million pages of documents to plaintiffs as of last week. … Mr. Horwitz's letter, and a court filing by AMD, point to a series of foul-ups in saving documents. Among other things, Intel continued to operate a system that automatically deleted employees' emails every 35 days. Employees designated as likely to have relevant documents were asked to identify and move them to avoid the automatic document purge. The company in October 2005 also began creating backup tapes of emails once a week from those employees as a last resort if there were lapses in individuals' data-retention efforts."

CNET News.com (3/6, Krazit) reports, "AMD was quick to respond to Intel's disclosure. 'Through what appears to be a combination of gross communication failures, an ill-conceived plan of document retention and lackluster oversight by outside counsel, Intel has apparently allowed evidence to be destroyed,' AMD said in a filing Monday with the U.S. District Court in Delaware." CNET adds, "The day after AMD filed suit, Intel preserved the data on its network, and later sent notices asking about 600 employees to retain specific information, the company said in its letter to Farnan. However, it did not instruct those employees to preserve e-mails from their 'sent' folders, and since Intel automatically erases e-mails older than a few weeks or months--depending on the employee--those messages could be gone. … The company also failed to send document-retention notices to employees identified in 2006 as additional targets for the document-retention policy, despite having put them on such a list. And despite having preserved data on its network after the complaint was filed, the company has identified "a small number of backup tapes" in its Munich offices that were erased." CNET notes, "Intel thinks it can assemble some of the missing documents by combing through other documents it has already preserved, said Chuck Mulloy, an Intel spokesman. For example, sent e-mails likely received a reply that was preserved in the sender's inbox, or other Intel employees on the list might have been copied on the sent e-mail and it would have appeared in their inbox. … Also, many of the e-mails in question might have been preserved on weekly backup tapes set up in October 2005 to capture documents from several hundred employees. However, not all the employees on the list were migrated to a special e-mail server set up for that purpose, and some of the tapes have been 'recycled,' Intel said in its letter."

Alltel Reportedly Shopping Itself To AT&T, Others. The San Antonio Express-News (3/6, Nowlin) reports, "Wireless communications provider Alltel Corp. reportedly is shopping itself to AT&T Inc. and other potential buyers, but it's unclear how likely it is to reach a deal, analysts said." The Express-News continues, "Alltel, based in Little Rock, Ark., has talked with AT&T, Verizon Communications Inc. and private equity firms about a buyout, the Wall Street Journal reported Monday. Talks for a sale of the nation's fifth-largest wireless carrier still are in early stages, the paper said, citing people familiar with the negotiations. … However, Alltel's $22 billion market value could be a significant obstacle to the deal, analysts said. Based on the company's current stock price, a bidder would need to spend $30 billion or more to close a transaction." The Express-News adds, "AT&T also could have other reservations about buying Alltel, experts said. … The nation's largest phone company has expanded aggressively with a string of big buyouts. However, AT&T closed its $86 billion takeover of BellSouth Corp. late last year amid intense regulatory scrutiny and may not think another big deal would pass antitrust review. … What's more, Alltel uses a different wireless technology than AT&T, meaning the acquiring company would need to replace equipment and handsets to convert customers to its system. … Even so, analysts said, a takeover of Alltel isn't without appeal for AT&T and its largest wireless rival, Verizon. Many expected Alltel to seek a buyer once it spun off its landline phone business last year."

Memo Shows Microsoft Threatened To Abandon Macintosh Office In 1997. Computerworld (3/6) reports, "Microsoft Corp. threatened to dump the Macintosh version of Office 10 years ago during talks with Apple Inc. because the move would 'do a great deal of harm' to its rival, according to a memo made public in a recently-settled antitrust case." Computerworld continues, "The 1997 memo from Ben Waldman, at the time the head of Microsoft's Macintosh development group, to then-CEO Bill Gates, urged Mac Office 97's release. The suite, which in June 1997 had not yet reached beta, was eventually released as Office 98 in March 1998. … But Waldman understood that the next Mac Office was a stick that could be used against Apple. 'The threat to cancel Mac Office 97 is certainly the strongest bargaining point we have, as doing so will do a great deal of harm to Apple immediately. I also think that Apple is taking this threat pretty seriously,' Waldman said in his e-mail to Gates." Computerworld adds, "Less than six weeks after Waldman's e-mail, Microsoft and Apple announced a deal under which the former bought $150 million of Apple stock. As part of the pact, Microsoft promised to release the next version of Office and was allowed to bundle Internet Explorer with the Mac OS. The two companies also agreed to a patent cross-licensing deal. … At the time, Apple was struggling. Steve Jobs had returned to the company only months before, and share prices were at all-time lows. The Microsoft-Apple agreement was seen by many as a bail-out of Apple by its long-time rival. … Later, the U.S. Department of Justice included the bundling of Internet Explorer among the charges it brought against Microsoft in its antitrust case. 'Microsoft, by threatening to cease development of its Office for Macintosh productivity suite, coerced Apple into making Internet Explorer the default browser on all Macintosh operating systems and to disadvantage competing browsers,' the federal agency charged in 1998." … Waldman also wrote in the memo -- which was revealed in the recently-settled Iowa antitrust case against Microsoft -- that keeping Mac Office alive was a good idea because the suite's users could be used as guinea pigs to test new features."

CreditSuisse Upgrades Value Of CME, CBOT Stocks. The AP (3/6) reports, "Shares of Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc. and CBOT Holdings Inc. jumped Monday, as a CreditSuisse analyst upgraded the two commodities exchanges." The AP continues, "Analyst Howard Chen upgraded both stocks to 'Outperform' from 'Neutral.' CBOT, which operates the Chicago Board of Trade, accepted an $8 billion buyout offer from CME in October. Shareholders will vote on the deal April 4. Chen said the future CME Group Inc. will benefit from recent market volatility due to its diverse products." The AP adds, "CME is the world's largest exchange trade, while CBOT is the main U.S. bond market. The Department of Justice is reviewing the deal."

EU Gives Antitrust Nod To Areva's Bid For Repower. Bloomberg (3/6, Mcgee) reports, "Areva SA, the world's biggest maker of nuclear power plants, won European Union antitrust approval for its 600 million-euro ($786 million) bid for German wind turbine-maker Repower Systems AG." Bloomberg continues, The European Commission, the EU's Brussels-based antitrust regulator, announced the approval today after reviewing the transaction under a simplified procedure. … Suzlon Energy Ltd., India's biggest builder of wind turbines, on Feb. 9 offered 1.02 billion euros ($1.34 billion) for the German company, or 20 percent more than Areva's earlier bid. Repower's management is 'interested' in the offer, Suzlon said March 2. Alstom hasn't raised its price." Bloomberg adds, "Tulsi Tanti, Suzlon's chairman, is 'quite confident' that the bid will be successful, he said on a conference call last week. The offer is being made together with Martifer, a unit of Portuguese builder Mota-Engil SGPS SA that already owns a quarter of Repower. Areva would be a 'fitting strategic partner,' the German company said on Feb. 19 without endorsing either offer."

DaimlerChrysler Keeping Deal Options Open. The Financial Times (3/6, Reed, Simon) reports, "For the three weeks since DaimlerChrysler raised the prospect of decoupling the Detroit end of the US-German carmaker, merger talk, fevered rumours and even conspiracy theories have proliferated in an industry that has seen no large-scale tie-ups or dramatic partings since General Motors and Fiat severed their alliances in 2005." The Times continues, "The Stuttgart group's revelation that, after nine years, 'all options are on the table' for Chrysler was accompanied by the disclosure of a $1.4bn (€1.07bn, £728m) loss at the US unit last year - and the decision was not sudden. People familiar with the situation have told the Financial Times that DaimlerChrysler made the announcement on its lawyers' recommendation, be-cause of advanced talks on Chrysler's future." The Times adds, "JPMorgan Chase had already been advising on options that are said to include a sale in full or part, or a flotation. It also emerged that the bank had contacted several private equity houses, which are in discussion with others including Wolfgang Bernhard, former Chrysler chief operating officer, about a possible consortium bid. … Perhaps most intriguingly, Fritz Henderson, GM's chief financial officer, has assembled a task team to explore a possible alliance between the world's largest carmaker and its crosstown rival. According to people close to the process, DaimlerChrysler has considered the idea of accepting a stakeholding in GM as payment for part or all of Chrysler. … If implemented, the solution would be financially expedient for the cash-strapped GM. It would also be politically smart for DaimlerChrysler, which would not want to be seen as having dumped its US unit unceremoniously."

Microsoft Blasts Google Over Copyright Policy. The Financial Times (3/6, Gapper) reports, "Microsoft on Tuesday launches a fierce attack on Google over its 'cavalier' approach to copyright, accusing the internet company of exploiting books, music, films and television programmes without permission." The Times continues, "Tom Rubin, associate general counsel for Microsoft, will say in a speech in New York that while authors and publishers find it hard to cover costs, 'companies that create no content of their own, and make money solely on the back of other people's content, are raking in billions through advertising and initial public offerings'. … Mr Rubin's remarks, presaged in an article in Tuesday's Financial Times, come as Google faces criticism and legal pressure from media companies over services allowing users to search online for books, films, television programmes and news. Viacom, the US media group, instructed YouTube, which Google owns, to remove 100,000 clips of copyright material." The Times adds, "The Authors Guild and a group of publishers backed by the Association of American Publishers have separately sued Google for making digital copies of copyrighted books from libraries without permission. … Mr Rubin will tell the AAP's annual meeting that Google's decision to take digital copies of all books in various library collections, unless publishers tell it not to, 'systematically violates copyright, deprives authors and publishers of an important avenue for monetising their works and, in doing so, undermines incentives to create'. … He will say Google is breaching copyright law because it has 'bestowed upon itself the unilateral right to make entire copies of copyrighted books'. Google thinks it is acting legally because it publishes only 'snippets' of copyrighted works unless it has the publisher's permission. "

Citigroup Seeks Control Of Nikko Cordial. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A10, Morse) reports, "Citigroup Inc. was poised to announce a tender offer to acquire more than 50% of Nikko Cordial Corp., a person familiar with the situation said. The prospective deal, which could be valued at as much as $5 billion, would be the biggest acquisition of a Japanese brokerage company by a foreign company. … Though the sides were close to an agreement, terms of a deal hadn't been finalized, the person said." The Journal continues, "Such a move would come as Tokyo-based Nikko Cordial looks to shore up its business, which has been hurt by an accounting scandal that erupted last December. An internal investigation by the brokerage firm, Japan's third-largest by revenue, revealed that it had inflated its earnings for two years, prompting an exodus of clients. … The Tokyo Stock Exchange is considering whether to delist the company." The Journal adds, "In a statement, Nikko Cordial said 'negotiations [with Citigroup] are being carried out from various perspectives.' … New York-based Citigroup and Nikko Cordial have long-standing ties. Citigroup recapitalized Nikko Cordial in 1998 and the two companies formed a joint venture investment bank, Nikko Cititgroup Ltd., which handles mergers-and-acquisitions advice and equity and debt underwritings. Citigroup still owns a little less than 5% of Nikko Cordial."

Blackstone Purchases Madame Tussauds Chain. The Washington Post (3/6, D3, Cho) reports, "Private-equity giant Blackstone Group said yesterday that it had created the world's second-largest theme park group, behind Walt Disney Co., with its $1.9 billion buyout of Madame Tussauds waxworks museums." The Post continues, "Madame Tussauds will be managed by Merlin Entertainments Group, which is controlled by Blackstone. The combined company said it will operate 50 theme parks throughout the world, including Legoland, Sea Life and the London Eye. They drew more than 30 million visitors in 2006, second only to Disney's parks." The Post adds, "The move by Blackstone is part of an aggressive push into the theme park business that began two years ago with its acquisition of Merlin, an international theme park company, for $187 million. It then backed Merlin's purchase of the Legoland chain later in 2005 and Gardaland, Italy's biggest theme park, last fall. … Blackstone, one of the largest private-equity firms in the world, also was a member of the group that bought Universal Studios in Orlando and is an investor in Six Flags theme parks. Last month Blackstone made a huge splash by closing the biggest buyout deal ever when it purchased Equity Office Properties Trust for $39 billion." The Post notes, "Merlin executives said they planned to focus on expanding the wax museum company, which has 14 million visitors a year and operates six museums around the world, as well as other theme parks, hotels and a castle in Europe. It recently bought the London Eye, a giant observatory in that city and one of England's most popular attractions."

A&P Agrees To Buy Rival Pathmark. The Philadelphia Inquirer (3/6, Brubaker) reports, "The Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. Inc., the owner of Super Fresh, said yesterday that it had agreed to buy rival Pathmark Stores Inc. in a deal worth up to $1.3 billion, including the assumption of debt. The cash and stock portion of the deal was $689.7 million." The Inquirer continues, "The combined company would have 54 stores in the eight-county Philadelphia region with more than $1 billion in annual sales, making it the third-largest supermarket chain here behind Acme Markets Inc. and ShopRite Group P.L.C. … The Pathmark banner - which has a strong presence in urban neighborhoods - will remain, said executives at Great Atlantic, which is best known for its A&P stores." The Inquirer adds, "The deal is subject to review by the Federal Trade Commission and shareholder approval. … A&P said it expected the merged companies to cut $150 million in annual expenses within two years, but industry observers were skeptical about the combination of the two struggling chains. … Dutch company Royal Ahold N.V. tried to buy Pathmark in 1999, but backed out after the FTC demanded the sale of a large number of stores to maintain competitive markets. … An antitrust expert said he was confident that the FTC would look at the proposed acquisition carefully. 'The FTC will want to know what new chains or additional food retailers have come into Long Island and North Jersey,' said James Fishkin, a partner in Dechert L.L.P.'s Washington office who worked at the FTC for 15 years before entering private practice in 2002. He worked on the FTC review of Ahold's proposed purchase of Pathmark."

Alaskan Bridge Projects Going Forward. The New York Times (3/6, Yardley, 1.16M) reports, "Long after Congress removed about $450 million in budget earmarks for two bridges in the Alaskan exurbs, the fight over whether to build them is not dead." Although "mocked as 'bridges to nowhere' by critics who saw them as the epitome of Congressional excess, preparations for the projects have been slowly moving forward even as big questions remain over whether the bridges will be built." When Congress "removed the earmarks for the bridges in 2005, it still gave the state the money, but it allowed Alaskan officials to decide how to spend it. The state reserved about $200 million for the proposed bridges, far less than the construction costs but enough to show that there was serious intent to complete the projects. Some environmental and planning work has already been done."

Documentary Calls Global Warming A "Scam." The Washington Times (3/6, Webb, 88K) reports, "With a packet of claims that are almost certain to defy conventional wisdom, a television documentary to be aired in Britain this week condemns man-made global warming as a myth that has become 'the biggest scam of modern times.'" The program "dismisses claims that high levels of greenhouse gases generated by human activity causes climate change. Instead, the program suggests that the sun itself is the real culprit." The documentary's director, Martin Durkin says "global warming 'is a multibillion-dollar worldwide industry, created by fanatically anti-industrial environmentalists, supported by scientists peddling scare stories to chase funding, and propped up by compliant politicians and the media.'" Channel 4, which is airing the program, "says that [it] features 'an impressive roll-call of experts,' including nine professors, who are experts in climatology, oceanography, meteorology, biogeography and paleoclimatology."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

US Indicts 14 In Smashing Texas Heroin Ring. The Austin American-Statesman (3/6) reports, "Austin police say 14 members of a heroin-trafficking organization have been indicted after a nearly two-year investigation." The American-Statesman continues, "Police said in a written statement that in mid-2005, the department's Organized Crime Narcotic Conspiracy Unit began investigating three brothers — Henry Castro, 30, Rene Gaitan Castro, 35, and Randy Gaitan Castro, 24, for suspected heroin trafficking. … The Drug Enforcement Administration and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms later joined in the investigation, and Austin police said officers 'made repeated seizures of heroin packaged within balloons for distribution, as well as seizures of 'black tar' heroin that had not been processed for distribution.' … The investigation comes on the heels of another major heroin trafficking case, police said. In November, a federal judge sentenced 17 members of the so-called 'Celedon' heroin trafficking organization. Fifteen received prison terms, while two received probation. Louis Celedon Jr., 31, received a 20-year prison sentence."

The KVUE-TV (3/6, Koski) reports, "In late 2005, a drug operation based in Southeast Austin was shut down. Investigators say that success opened the door for the Castro brothers. At that time undercover agents were wrapping up a crackdown on the Celedon drug family. That is when, according to investigators, three young brothers decided to move in and take over what the Celedon family lost. The group, police say, was lead by Henry, Rene and Randy Castro. … According to a federal indictment, the Castro drug business from Mexico to North Texas."

KTCB-TV, Austin (3/5) reported Austin police "say the city's biggest heroin dealers are out of business and behind bars. The bust is a result of a long-term joint operation with the federal government. Police say 14 people were involved with selling and distributing black-tar heroin or heroin from Mexico."

Eleven Accused In Nationwide Drug Ring Arraigned In New York. The New York Times (3/6, Confessore, Kovaleski) reports eleven people "accused of playing a role in a nationwide illegal prescription drug ring were arraigned [in Albany] on Monday, part of what prosecutors said was a broadening investigation into the recreational use of steroids and human growth hormone. … All 11 suspects have pleaded not guilty. … According to a law enforcement official familiar with the investigation, two people affiliated with Anti-Aging Centers are expected to surrender to the authorities on Tuesday."

The AP (3/6) reports, "People in three states have been arrested so far and as many as 24 could face felony charges. … Major league baseball players Gary Matthews Jr. and Jerry Hairston Jr., former slugger Jose Canseco and former heavyweight champion Evander Holyfield reportedly were on a customer list at Applied Pharmacy in Mobile, Ala., one of the two pharmacies raided. The NFL is looking into reports that a Pittsburgh Steelers doctor, Richard Rydze, was on the customer list of Signature Pharmacy in Florida, whose owners have been indicted by a grand jury in Albany."

Report: Notorious Brooklyn Gang Leader Admits Involvement With More Than 80 Shootings. The New York Post (3/5) reported John "Bloody Hatchet" Hatcher "has admitted to involvement in more than 80 shootings - including 30 homicides - while operating a notorious gang that made tens of millions of dollars selling crack, cocaine and marijuana. During a two-decade reign of terror, Hatcher and his gang, The Rugby Boys, littered the streets in the heart of Brooklyn with victims and bodies, authorities said. 'He was the crack epidemic,' said John Gilbride, special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration's New York Office." Hatcher's "ring flourished like no other, before the DEA finally mounted a six-year operation buying $10 bags of crack that snared him. Rather than face a possible death-sentence prosecution, Hatcher, 43, spilled his guts."

UN Says Afghanistan's 2007 Opium Poppy Cultivation Could Expand. The AP (3/6) reports Afghanistan's 2007 opium poppy cultivation "could expand again after last year's record crop, the U.N. drug agency said Monday, underlining the weakness of an internationally backed drive against the country's booming narcotics trade. The Office on Drugs and Crime predicted an increase in a string of provinces, including southern Helmand — Afghanistan's largest poppy-growing region and an area wracked by a growing number of Taliban attacks. … The U.N. said poppy cultivation occurred in 100% of villages it visited in Helmand province; 93% of villages were growing opium poppies in neighboring Kandahar, the Taliban's former stronghold. The U.N. report did not detail how many villages were visited."

The New York Times (3/6, Gall) reports, "Although some of the country is showing a decrease in poppy cultivation this year, the south, which has been plagued by the insurgency and traditionally has been the biggest source of poppies, is showing a continued increase, 'which may result in an overall increase in opium poppy cultivation in 2007,' the report said."

BBC News (3/6) reports the UN "says although production of poppies…has fallen in the north and centre, a sharp rise is likely in the lawless south. It also cites a dramatic increase in cannabis growing, which it describes as a new and disturbing trend."

IMMIGRATION:

Congress Seen As Unlikely To Pass Immigration Reform. Roll Call (3/6, Stanton) reports, "With Republicans looking to regain control of the Senate and Democrats hoping to pad their majority in 2008, neither party appears inclined to make the political sacrifices necessary to pass a broad immigration bill this year and may be content to simply duel to a rhetorical draw this summer, lawmakers and strategists in both parties said." Leaders from both parties,

DOJ_NMG_0140443

Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy and Sen. Edward Kennedy "have all vowed to pass reform legislation this year, and Kennedy has been meeting with the White House and presidential hopeful Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) in recent weeks to work out a new compromise bill." But "despite these efforts, it still appears unlikely that comprehensive reforms will move out of the chamber before electoral concerns kill the bill." Roll Call adds, "In fact, GOP and Democratic aides contend that both parties may be best served by a political impasse over the issue, since such a scenario would allow Members to show they are standing firm on the hot-button issue while avoiding compromises that may upset base voters."

Chamber Of Commerce Opposes Hazleton Immigration Ordinance. USA Today (3/6, 2B, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) reports, "The US Chamber of Commerce Monday threw its considerable weight behind efforts to eliminate a groundbreaking Hazleton, Pa., law penalizing businesses that hire illegal workers and landlords who rent to them. The Hazleton ordinance, which also makes English the official language of the small town," has been challenged by the ACLU in a lawsuit set for trial next week. The Chamber "filed a legal document Monday in US District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania backing the ACLU position and calling the law unconstitutional" on the grounds that it "is pre-empted by federal law" and "violates due process protections because it doesn't give a business accused of hiring an illegal worker the right to challenge an allegation before losing its right to operate."

LATimes Criticizes Mexican Immigration Laws. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (3/6, 850K) writes, "When House Republicans last year sought to make the mere presence of illegal immigrants in the United States a felony punishable by one year in prison, the odious legislation sparked international condemnation. No country was more loudly indignant than Mexico." However, Mexico, where "foreign immigrants in Mexico illegally have been subject to prison sentences of two years" since 1974, is "hardly in a position to criticize."

TAX:

MyCFO Sold Tax Shelter Deal Later Nixed By IRS. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A1, Waldman) reports, "John Doerr is the dean of Silicon Valley venture capitalists, one who helped launch tech icons like Google and Sun Microsystems. A billionaire, he works with rock star Bono to fight poverty in Africa and with others to increase aid for education and medical research." The Journal continues, "Mr. Doerr is less well known for one investment that didn't pan out. Called myCFO Inc., the firm set out to provide rich people a full menu of financial services, from wealth management to estate planning. It succeeded with only one: tax shelters that helped clients shield hundreds of millions of dollars from taxes. Less than two years after myCFO began selling them in 2000, the Internal Revenue Service said they were bogus." The Journal adds, "MyCFO ceased independent operations five years ago, but it still casts a shadow. A bank that underwrote some of its tax deals has admitted that they were shams. Former clients, hit with back-tax bills, are fighting the IRS. Two ex-clients have alleged that myCFO's tax deals were fraudulent. … Two lawyers who worked with myCFO are under tax-fraud indictment for their work on similar tax shelters. The Manhattan U.S. attorney's office, which has charged more than a dozen people in connection with tax shelters, said in a court filing last April that it had 'an ongoing criminal investigation' involving 'various former employees of myCFO.' … The financial backers and board members of myCFO were Silicon Valley royalty. They included James H. Clark, co-founder of Netscape Communications and Silicon Graphics; John Chambers of Cisco Systems Inc.; Thomas Jermoluk, former chairman of Excite@Home; and former Netscape boss James Barksdale. The firm's outside legal counsel was Larry Sonsini, lawyer to Silicon Valley's stars. … The firm was Mr. Clark's idea. Mr. Doerr led its financing and took a leading role on the board. In typical Silicon Valley fashion, board members were closely involved with strategy and operations, according to company documents and legal papers reviewed by The Wall Street Journal. The documents show that directors pushed ahead with the tax-shelter business despite signs that all wasn't right with the product."

US Looking For Ways To Close Tax Gap. USA Today (3/6, 1B, Block) reports, "If you're self-employed, sell used items occasionally on eBay or own a home, now would be a good time to start keeping really good records. Your tax returns could receive more scrutiny, thanks to a growing push to narrow the 'tax gap' — the billions of dollars in federal taxes that go uncollected every year." USA continues, "Democrats and Republicans don't agree on much, but they do share a desire to narrow the tax gap. That's not surprising. The IRS estimates that the tax gap exceeds more than $300 billion a year. Collecting even half that amount would let Congress repeal the alternative minimum tax — a parallel tax system that increasingly threatens middle-income taxpayers — without raising taxes or cutting government programs." USA adds, "Taxpayers like the idea of closing the tax gap, too. More than 86% of taxpayers believe that cheating on income taxes is unacceptable, according to a survey released last month by the IRS Oversight Board. … But closing the tax gap is a lot more complicated than chasing down the proverbial deadbeats who hide money under the mattress. Government proposals to narrow the gap would affect people who probably don't think of themselves as scofflaws. And tax experts say the IRS can't make a serious dent in the tax gap unless it conducts more audits. … The IRS estimates that unpaid taxes from individuals, as opposed to big corporations, account for more than 70% of the tax gap. And within that group, the self-employed are considered the biggest offenders. Sole proprietors who underreport their income and self-employment taxes account for roughly one-third of the tax gap, the IRS says." USA notes, "The Treasury Department has proposed requiring credit card companies to report to the IRS payments made to small businesses and other self-employed workers. That would allow the IRS to compare the self-employed workers' tax returns with the payments and determine whether they're underreporting their income. … But groups representing small-business owners worry that the proposal could increase the costs that credit card companies charge small businesses. More fundamentally, they say, the IRS figures fail to distinguish between sole proprietors who deliberately hide income and those who make honest mistakes."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Congress Hears Emotional Testimony From Soldiers About Walter Reed. Lawmakers yesterday heard testimony, described in media reports as "riveting," and "heart wrenching," from wounded servicemen and family members about poor living conditions and a bureaucratic morass during treatment at Walter Reed Army Hospital. Members of a House Oversight and Government Reform subcommittee also grilled top Army officials and medical officers about substandard conditions at Walter Reed and throughout the military medical system.

The emotional hearings were the top story on ABC and CBS last night, and garnered significant attention from major daily newspapers and wire services. ABC World News (3/5, lead story, 3:00, Kerley, 8.78M) reported, "Members of Congress that were here today say the problems are beyond the walls of Walter Reed." Rep. Henry Waxman: "What is going on here is Walter Reed may be the tip of the iceberg of what's going on all around the country." Kerley: "Annette McLeod had to take a leave to help her husband, Dell, through the red tape and paperwork." Annette McLeod: "My life was ripped apart the day that Dell was injured. But then having to live through the mess we've had to live through at Walter Reed has been worse than anything I've had to sacrifice in my life." Kerley: "That prompted an apology from the General who a week ago was dismissing reports of substandard care. George Weightman was fired as head of Walter Reed." In addition, an "internal Army investigation found 87 deficiencies within the entire medical system in the Army."

The CBS Evening News (3/5, lead story, 2:30, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The bullet that cost Sergeant Dan Shannon his left eye still leaves him groping for words. But when a House Committee investigating conditions at Walter Reed Army Medical Center asked time key question of the day, he let it rip." Sgt. Shannon: "My biggest concern?" Unidentified member: "Yes, sir." Sgt. Shannon: "My biggest concern is having the young men and women that have had their lives shattered getting taken care of." Martin: "The most riveting testimony came from the wife of a National Guard soldier injured in Iraq." Annette McLeod "told of battling a system that wanted to blame her husband's mental problems not on his head injury but a preexisting condition." Annette McLeod: "He was considered fit enough to serve in the National Guard for 16 years. He was fit enough for deployment, but now they were saying his mental problems he had before he went to Iraq."

NBC Nightly News (3/5, story 3, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "This was an emotional day in Washington where the topic was the unfolding scandal over treatment at Walter Reed Army Hospital." NBC (Miklaszewski) added, "Today's testimony was heart wrenching." Spc. Jeremy Duncan: "It was like a ghetto." Miklaszewski: "Specialist Jeremy Duncan wounded in Iraq is the one who blew the whistle on conditions at Walter Reed." Spc. Duncan: "It was unforgivable for anyone to live in the room like that." Miklaszewski: "Congressional lawmakers were outraged. Their wrath aimed primarily at the Army's Surgeon General, Lieutenant General Kevin Kiley, former commander at Walter Reed."

On NBC Nightly News (3/5, story 4, 1:20, Williams, 9.87M), Washington Post reporter Dana Priest said the problem is "quite large. We have received thousands of tips, documents, stories pouring in from all over the country from Army and Navy facilities, from people in Baghdad where you are. They are coming from soldiers and family members and veterans and doctors and nurses. And they all have one message and that is it is not just Walter Reed. They are talking about a dysfunctional bureaucracy. About neglect, about indifference from people who treat them. About substandard housing. And really, many, many of them are coming and telling us about horror stories in veteran's hospitals all over the word. These are issues that the government says it will start to address."

USA Today/AP (3/6, 2A, Flaherty) reports Army leaders "said Monday that they accept responsibility for substandard conditions at the service's flagship Walter Reed Army Medical Center but also said they hadn't known about most of the problems." At an "emotional House subcommittee hearing at the hospital, lawmakers suggested the failings go far beyond the hospital for wounded soldiers in Washington. They demanded action. Military leaders — and Vice President Cheney — promised they'd get it." Meanwhile, Veterans Affairs Secretary James Nicholson "said his office will hire 100 patient advocates, speed benefit claims and improve medical screenings for veterans at its facilities." On NPR's All Things Considered, Nicholson said, "Our goal is to do things that serve the veterans in the manner that they deserve the best way that we can."

McClatchy (3/6, Goldstein) reports the generals "in charge were apologetic, even as several said they were unaware of the conditions that blackened the reputation of the Army's premier medical facility." Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, said, "I couldn't be madder; I couldn't be more embarrassed. I'm ashamed." McClatchy adds McLeod, Duncan and Shannon "described a system in which the injured have to justify their wounds in order to earn their disability payments. They said that Army medical personnel can diagnose their conditions, but case managers can question the diagnoses, prolonging their ordeal."

The Los Angeles Times (3/6, Neuman, 850K) reports Gen. Weightman, "who was fired after reports of substandard medical care for veterans at Walter Reed Army Medical Center said today he agreed with critics that there was a failure of leadership at the facility." Weightman, who "headed Walter Reed for less than a year, acknowledged he did not realize how frustrated veterans and their families had become in dealing with a gargantuan bureaucracy overwhelmed by injured soldiers returning from war." The committee "also heard from the Army's top brass. Gen. Peter Schoomaker, chief of staff of the Army, said he was 'extraordinarily angry and embarrassed' by the disclosures."

The Washington Post (3/6, A1, Abramowitz, Vogel, 690K) reports in a front page story under the headline, "Army Chiefs Plead Ignorance, But Lawmakers Are Skeptical," that lawmakers "expressed skepticism that the generals had been unaware of the problems until they were spotlighted by the media two weeks ago." Lawmakers – "Democrats and Republicans alike -- seemed receptive to the candor voiced at the hearing of a panel of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, but they also cited earlier warnings from internal memos, government audits and news reports."

USA Today (3/6, Stanglin, 2.27M) reports Chairman Tierney "said problems at" Walter Reed "are only the 'tip of the iceberg' of poor treatment that extends throughout the military health care system." Tierney said, "Rats and cockroaches don't burrow and infest overnight. Mold and holes in ceilings don't occur in a week. And complaints of bureaucratic indifference have been reported for years." Tierney also "suggested that the treatment of a large number of wounded soldiers from Iraq reflected 'terrible planning' by the administration over the war."

On MSNBC's Hardball (3/5), Tierney said, "I hear from my colleagues who were on this committee in the last session - I was not, I was on leave of absence - that they actually did have some hearings on this issue. And when they had witnesses in from the Army, they were assured that all of the matters that were brought up before them were being dealt with. Obviously, that turns out not to be the case." Rep. David Dreier said, "There is bipartisan horror and outrage over this. We have an all-volunteer military. And Chairman Tierney knows very well that one of the most difficult -- the most difficult -- thing that we do is to talk to the families of those who've lost their lives in Iraq and Afghanistan, or anyplace in the world. And as we try to encourage people to serve in our military, the thought of not providing them with adequate care, to see something like building 18 is just outrageous."

Roll Call (3/6, Singer) reports Democrats "suggested that weak Republican oversight contributed to the problems experienced by wounded soldiers there." Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) "issued a statement proclaiming the beginning of 'long overdue oversight of the Bush administration.'" Roll Call adds Republicans "rejected the notion that they had failed to investigate conditions at Walter Reed, and cited a range of hearings and oversight activities on military health care that preceded the Democratic majority."

The New York Times (3/6, Luo, 1.16M) reports members of Congress "heard wrenching testimony on Monday from wounded soldiers treated at Walter Reed Army Medical Center and contrite promises from top Army officials to correct the conditions there." The Bush Administration "has been thrown on the defensive, and members of Congress have been quick to express outrage."

The Hill (3/6, Kaplan) reports the Walter Reed hearing "could further pressure Democratic leaders to adopt a more stringent approach to paying for the war in Iraq. House Democratic leaders are considering how to proceed on several war-related spending bills. After passing a resolution condemning Bush's troops surge with just 17 Republican votes, Democrats spent last week discussing how to challenge President Bush's authority to manage the war." A Democratic aide said, "The real pressure will be on Republicans to support our troops by voting for the supplemental spending bill." Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.), "chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC), attended yesterday's hearing and said he saw 'political dangers' ahead for the Bush administration." Van Hollen added the scandal "adds further support for the Democrats' position 'that the administration just botched this war from the beginning, not just in Iraq but to address the needs of returning soldiers,' he added."

The Los Angeles Times (3/6, Neuman, Schreck, 850K) reports the story under the headline, "Walter Reed Hearing Brings Outrage And Apologies," noting that "top Army officials faced angry lawmakers during an emotional hearing Monday on shoddy medical treatment and living conditions at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, acknowledging that they had failed in the care of wounded veterans." Rep. Henry Waxman said the "scandal at Walter Reed" was "the tip of the iceberg of what is going on all around the country." Waxman "said veterans and their families were 'flooding us with complaints' about bad medical care."

Cheney Promises Quick Action To Remedy Army Medical Care Deficiencies. ABC World News (3/5, story 2, :30, Vargus, 8.78M) reported, "Vice President Cheney promised, on behalf of the Bush Administration, to change the way injured troops are treated. He told a gathering of war veterans that President Bush is creating a commission looking at the care being given to wounded servicemen and women when they return from war. And that fixing the Army's most fabled hospital would come first." Vice President Cheney: "There will be no excuses, only action. And the Federal bureaucracy will not slow that action down. We're going to fix the problems at Walter Reed, period."

The CBS Evening News (3/5, story 2, :25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "President Bush is appointing a bipartisan commission, and in an address to a veterans group today, Vice President Cheney promised quick action."

Acceptance Of Responsibility By Kiley, Weightman Contrasted. In the Washington Post's "Washington Sketch" column (3/6, A1), Dana Milbank says, Kevin Kiley, "the three-star general in charge of all Army medical facilities, seemed stumped as he testified yesterday about his responsibility for the Walter Reed scandal. 'I'm trying not to say that I'm not accountable,' he told members of the House oversight committee. But try as he might, he couldn't fix blame on himself." Sitting "shoulder to shoulder with Kiley was one such commander, Gen. George Weightman, who last week was fired as chief of Walter Reed after just six months on the job. Weightman and Kiley, who ran Walter Reed from 2002 to 2004, wore matching Army dress uniforms, but their responses could not have been more divergent. While Kiley deflected blame, Weightman freely admitted failure -- even though the victims of Walter Reed's neglect testified, and the House committee members agreed, that he was not to blame."

WPost Says Army Needs To Revamp Hospitals, Bureaucracy. The Washington Post (3/6, 690K) editorializes about the Walter Reed scandal, "Being sorry is only the first step ... Fixing veterans' outpatient care will take a lot more than putting a new roof on Walter Reed's Building 18. It means revamping buildings and bureaucracies across the country. ... These men and women deserve clean accommodations and straightforward assistance -- not adversity -- from administrators."

Robinson: Harvey Firing An Exception For Bush Administration. In his Washington Post column (3/6, A19), Eugene Robinson says, "So this is what accountability looks, sounds and feels like. It's been so long -- since George W. Bush moved into the White House -- that we hardly recognize what used to be a commonplace phenomenon, as much a part of Washington's behavioral DNA as megalomania and mendacity. Imagine how surprised Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey must have been when Defense Secretary Robert Gates fired him last week over the shocking neglect of injured veterans at Walter Reed Army Medical Center." This administration's "nonchalance about its most grievous transgressions has been stunning, and the only inference that fits the facts is that the people running our government don't really believe in government at all. They certainly haven't taken it seriously."

Eaton Faults JCS Acquiescence, Rumsfeld's Legacy For Reed Scandal. In an op-ed for the New York Times (3/6, 1.16M), retired Maj. Gen. Paul Eaton writes, "Regrettably, the silence of our top officers has had a huge impact not just on the battlefield but also on how we have brought our injured warriors home from it. These planning failures led to the situation at Walter Reed Army Medical Center recently reported by The Washington Post." Fired Walter Reed commander George Weightman "has gone down with his ship — the victim of Mr. Rumsfeld's wrongheaded cost-cutting and the joint chiefs' failure to stand up to the civilian leadership." Eaton makes nine recommendations, including "increase financing for research into traumatic brain injuries," "revamp the Medical Evaluation Board process," rein in "the general effort by Mr. Rumsfeld and Mr. Harvey to privatize services," and keep money for health care out of the [cutback-prone] "Defense Department budget."

Cheney Treated For Blood Clot. The Wall Street Journal/AP (3/6) reports, "Doctors found a blood clot in Vice President Dick Cheney's left leg, but he was not admitted to a hospital and will be treated with blood thinning medication 'for several months,' his office said." USA Today (3/6, 11A, 2.27M) also runs a brief story on Cheney's ailment, which was covered by all three network newscasts last night. On the CBS Evening News (3/5, story 3, 1:55, 7.66M), Dr. Jon Lapook said, "We know back in 2005, Mr. Cheney had surgeries on the blood vessels in his legs and perhaps that played a role in increasing his risk. On the other hand, he developed this complication, like many people who do have no known medical problems, after a long plane flight. So I think he'll do very well. Mortality for this is less than 5% if it's treated early and correctly." ABC World News (3/5, story 3,

1:40, Vargus, 8.78M) said Cheney's condition "is known as the economy class syndrome. The Vice President had just spent 65 hours in the air, flying to Afghanistan and back." And NBC Nightly News (3/5, story 6, 1:45, Mitchell, 9.87M) also reported Cheney's "recent travels may have contributed to this new problem." The Los Angeles Times (3/6, Gerstenzang, 850K), New York Times (3/6, Stolberg, Altman, 1.16M) and Washington Post (3/6, A4, Stein, 690K), among other newspapers, also report the story.

"Wage Insurance" Issue Could Be Central To Trade Debate. The Washington Post (3/6, D1, Montgomery, 690K) reports "congressional leaders want to expand" a "little-known federal program that pays up to $10,000 to certain workers dislocated by trade." The program is "known as wage insurance," and "some" argue that "it should be available to any worker who loses a job for almost any reason." The proposal "is part of a broader effort to ease the anxieties of middle-class Americans who feel threatened by the globalization of business and a churning U.S. labor market that creates and destroys about 30 million jobs a year. The proposal is also central to the debate in Washington over trade." Democrats "warn that it will be difficult for them to extend the Bush administration's authority to negotiate trade agreements unless the social safety net for US workers is significantly expanded. That authority expires in June."

Groups Lobby Budget Committee For Funding Increases. The Hill (3/6, Holzer) reports, "The farm lobby, higher-education advocates, veterans' organizations and a host of other groups are pressing their cases with budget committee staffers for increased funding as Democratic lawmakers look to release their spending blueprint as early as next week." The Veterans of Foreign Wars, "for example, wants a $4 billion increase in funding for veterans' healthcare over last year's level. The request is likely to resonate at least somewhat this year in the wake of the Walter Reed scandal." Meanwhile, hospital groups, doctors and "other recipients of payments under Medicare and Medicaid are pushing to forestall any program cuts in an environment where Congress is under intense budget pressure." The budget resolution "is not binding," but it "does cap the total amount of spending and revenue legislators have to work with without running afoul of budget rules."

Right To Life Group Clashes With Waxman Over Lobbying Disclosure. In the Washington Post's "In The Loop: On K Street" column (3/6, A17), Jeffrey Birnbaum says, "The National Right to Life Committee and Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) are locking horns -- not over abortion, but over whether thousands of top executive branch officials should have to disclose the names of people who lobby them." Driven by the "over-the-top, clandestine lobbying of Bush administration officials by now-convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Waxman's House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform has unanimously approved the Executive Branch Reform Act. A spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said that she backs the measure, which would require senior bureaucrats to report quarterly whom they speak to about government actions, and that she expects it to get a vote in the House." But Douglas Johnson, "legislative director of the National Right to Life Committee, is vowing to stop the bill at all costs. He thinks it would discourage officials from meeting with citizens, including his own members. That makes it downright undemocratic. And he is consistent: He led a coalition that helped kill broad ethics reform legislation last year because it would have imposed a similar type of reporting requirement on grass-roots lobbying."

Hispanic Caucus To Meet On Leadership Dispute. The AP (3/6, Werner) reports members of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus "scheduled a special meeting Tuesday to try to resolve an embarrassing leadership dispute that led one lawmaker to quit the group. Among the options is a power-sharing arrangement that would dilute the authority of the caucus' controversial chairman, Rep. Joe Baca, D-Calif." Baca has thus far "resisted any changes to the caucus' power structure, according to caucus members and staff. Baca is under fire from female lawmakers, including fellow California Democratic Rep. Loretta Sanchez, who quit the 21-member, all-Democratic group after accusing Baca of calling her a 'whore.'" The AP adds Baca "denies that. A meeting last Thursday broke up without resolution or a vote, and afterward Baca insisted that he was still in charge and that he was focusing on the future."

McConnell Wins Praise As Minority Leader. The Politico (3/6, Budoff) reports Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell "returned to the Senate in January with a conference slashed in size and chastened by voters. Neither the Republican president nor the Democratic-controlled Congress had much use for him. Colleagues whispered that the senator, with all the pizzazz of plain oatmeal, was terrible on television." But two months later, McConnell has "managed to make the Republican stance on Iraq -- oppose a rebuke of the president while pressing for continued war funding -- look downright vogue. In the process, even skeptics have acknowledged that McConnell knows how to work a chamber." Sen. Lindsey Graham said, "His stock is very high right now." The Politico adds that McConnell is "threading the needle between a conference in need of an opposition identity and a public mood divided on the position he has staked out. Insiders admire his tactical maneuvers on Iraq, but could he lose the broader public relations battle outside of Washington?" Norm Onstein of the American Enterprise Institute says, "They have a potential double whammy. They could ultimately be portrayed as obstructionists, and obstructionists in favor of a policy that deteriorates anyhow."

President, First Lady Dined At Rove's Home On Sunday. The Washington Post (3/6, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) reports in its "Reliable Source" column, "In a rare foray out of the White House, George and Laura Bush had Sunday night supper at the Palisades home of Karl and Darby Rove. The presidential adviser took pity on the press outside in vans and sent out sausage and...quail wings? Sounds like something John Kerry would serve."

NYTimes Comes Out In Favor Of House Labor Legislation. The New York Times (3/6, 1.16M) editorializes, "There are many reasons for the long decline in the membership rolls for private sector unions, including powerful changes in the economy and the unions' past corruption scandals. And there is little doubt that federal rules and regulations for union organizing have also become increasingly hostile to labor, helping to drive unions' share of the work force down from a peak of 35 percent in the 1950s to a mere 7.4 percent today." The House of Representatives "passed a bill last week that would strengthen the rights of employees to form unions, and it drew an immediate veto threat from President Bush. But if Mr. Bush were, as he claims, truly concerned about rising income inequality and truly committed to improving the lives of America's middle class, he would support the legislation and urge the Senate to approve it." The Senate "should take up the House bill promptly and send it to the president for his signature."

WSJournal Calls For Expanded School Choice Under Reauthorized NCLB. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A18, 2.04M) editorializes that the biggest priority for Congress's impending talks on reauthorizing No Child Left Behind should be to "do more to expand public and private school choice." The piece praises the increases in funding and attention to the achievement gap between white and minority students, but faults it for not sufficiently promoting school choice in its efforts to improve public schools. Moreover, the Journal faults NCLB's supplemental education services provisions as a "watered-down" version of President Bush's erstwhile school voucher plan. Meanwhile, "the Education Department has too often allowed school districts to skirt even these limited choice provisions, either by granting exemptions or looking the other way." The Journal criticizes the NCLB Commission's report for not promoting vouchers, while offering qualified praise to President Bush's proposed "promise scholarships."

OTHER NEWS:

US Stock Markets Down Again. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, C1, McKay, 2.04M), under the headline "Stocks Decline As Weakness In Asia Trumps Other News," reports "a big drop in oil prices didn't stanch the bloodletting in the stock market. As was the case last week, weakness in overseas markets, especially Asia, trumped any shreds of good news elsewhere. Signs of so-so growth in the US service sector didn't help matters." ABC World News (3/5, story 7, :25, Vargus, 8.78M) reported "late selling brought the Dow down by more than 60 points [to close at 12,050.41]. And the NASDAQ down by 27 [to close at 2,340.68]. Losses had been feared from the start, after a repeat of sharp losses in Asia, following further declines on major European markets." NBC Nightly News (3/5, story 5, :15, Brown, 9.87M) said "investors were bracing for a rough ride after Tokyo's Nikkei average plunged. But the US markets were pretty subdued. The Dow was down almost 64 points [to close at 12,050.41]. NASDAQ was lost more than 27 points [to close at 2,340.68]."

USA Today (3/6, 1B, Krantz, 2.27M) reports, "Money flowed out of global stock markets again Monday as fears of a coming economic slowdown continued to discourage investors around the world." The Los Angeles Times (3/6, Hamilton, Petruno, 850K) titles its report "US Stocks Drop As Investors Avert Risk," and the Washington Post (3/6, D1, Tse, 690K) says the markets went down as "concerns mounted about the health of a high-risk part of the home mortgage industry." The New York Times (3/6, Peters, Timmons, 1.16M) reports "the fallout from last week's global stock dive showed few signs of letting up yesterday, as markets from Hong Kong to New York deepened their losses."

Fed Governor Says Markets "Functioning Well." The Financial Times (3/6, Guha) reports, "Financial markets are 'functioning well amid higher volatility' while 'overall liquidity does not appear to be in short supply', the Federal Reserve governor Kevin Warsh said on Monday." Warsh, "who acts informally as a point of contact between the Washington-based Fed governors and Wall Street, said market discipline 'appears to be effective, as investors are reviewing their positions.'" The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A2, Ip, 2.04M) says Warsh also "cautioned it is too soon for a 'comprehensive' assessment."

Service Sector Growing At Slower Pace. The Financial Times (3/6, Pimlott) reports, "The US service sector saw a sharp drop off in activity last month, growing at its slowest rate since during the Iraq war in April 2003, according to data released on Monday." The Institute for Supply Management "said that its index of business activity for the services sector stood at 54.3, down 4.7 percentage points from January. The report badly missed economists' forecasts of a level of 57." The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A2, Dougherty, 2.04M) says that "given the weakness in housing and manufacturing, economists had expected the service index to drop: If companies make fewer goods, that will mean less demand for shipping, and with people buying fewer homes it follows that demand for services such as loans and homeowner's insurance would also slow. Though economists expected a decline, the drop was steeper than anticipated."

Bernanke Meeting With Eclectic Group Of Consultants. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A2, Blackstone, Paletta, 2.04M) reports, "A Who's Who of economists from Wall Street, academia, consulting and central banking scored coveted meetings with Ben Bernanke during his first months as Federal Reserve chairman. Topping a list that included Wall Street heavyweights like Bear Stearns Cos. and Morgan Stanley, however, was a small St. Louis-based forecasting firm: Macroeconomic Advisers." Former Fed Gov. Laurence Meyer and former Fed economist Brian Sack, both now with Macroeconomic Advisers' Washington office, "enjoyed the greatest access to Mr. Bernanke among private-sector economists, the Fed chairman's visitor logs show." Bernanke's visitor log "was obtained by Dow Jones Newswires through a Freedom of Information Act request. It lists only the names of people cleared through security to meet with him specifically. He may have also met with other people who were cleared to meet with other Fed officials."

EU Economy 20 Years Behind US. The Financial Times (3/6, Buck) reports, "The European Union's economic development is only now reaching the level achieved by the US more than two decades ago, according to a study released yesterday. The US reached the EU's current level of gross domestic product per capita in 1985, according to the report by Eurochambres, the pan-European business lobby. The EU's employmentrate and level of investment in research and development were reached by the USin 1978, and its level of productivity (expressed in GDP per employed) was reached by the US in 1989, the report said. … Compared with the first such report by Eurochambres published two years ago, it shows the time lag widened between 2003 and 2006. The most drastic gap appears in R&D spending, where the time lag expanded from 23 to 28 years."

Democrats Debate Whether Clinton Or Obama Had Better Reception In Selma. The CBS Evening News (3/5, story 6, 2:30, Couric, 7.66M) reported the "debate today among Democrats is who won the first serious showdown involving the frontrunners, Senators Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama. They appeared yesterday at ceremonies in Selma, Alabama, commemorating a 1965 civil rights march when white police officers beat mostly black marchers. And for the first time, the Clinton campaign employed its not-so-secret weapon." CBS (Borger) added, "The decision to send Bill Clinton to march in Selma alongside his wife was made at the last minute and it was a delicate mission, to prop up Hillary Clinton's standing with African Americans while not overshadowing her. So while his wife preached at a Selma church, Bill Clinton was not sitting in the congregation." Bill Clinton: "All the good speaking has been done by Hillary and Senator Obama today already. I'm just sort of bringing up the rear." Borger: "It's a lesson the Clinton campaign learned after the President upstaged his wife at the funeral for Coretta Scott King." Before Obama "entered the Democratic race, there was a sense of inevitability about Hillary Clinton's nomination. But now there's a real political fight and on lots of levels, the big question is this: Will Bill Clinton help her or hurt?"

On CNN's Anderson Cooper's 360 (3/5), CNN national correspondent John King said, "I think President Clinton's presence certainly helped Senator Hillary Clinton. But I think the fact that he needed to be there is the lead of the story, in the sense that she is very much threatened by Senator Obama's continued inroads and advancing inroads in the African- American community. John Lewis, a congressman who is a hero of the civil rights movement, quoted in 'The New York Times' last week, saying he was leaning Obama's way -- then, President Clinton called him and said: Well, give my wife a chance. So, the fact that she needs to play the Bill card so soon in the community where he is so beloved is a sign of weakness, not strength."

On MSNBC's Hardball (3/5), Rep. Artur Davis, a supporter of Sen. Obama, said, "Three or four months ago, all the black community knew was that Senator Obama was popular and attractive. Over the last several months, he started to talk in detail about his passion for universal health insurance, his passion for universal college access. And what's happened is that the black community has realized he has a progressive agenda, and that's what resonates in the black community. Now, the black community has a lot of experience with politicians over the last 15 years who became famous but who didn't have a progressive agenda." Davis added, "The enthusiasm for Barack Obama in Alabama is off the charts now, in the black and the progressive white community."

On MSNBC's Hardball (3/5), G. Virginia Fields, former Manhattan Borough president and a supporter of Sen. Hillary Clinton, said, "I have worked with Hillary Clinton. I know of her commitment to the black community, as well as others, and this is not new for her. And I think at the end, people do want to know, who is going to be the best person to move forward the agenda on universal health care, health care disparities, education, eliminating poverty? And Hillary Clinton has been fully committed and with real results in all of those areas. That is part of why I have chosen to support Hillary, and I will be doing all that I can, including in my home state of Alabama, working for Mrs. Clinton."

On Fox News' Special Report roundtable (3/5), Morton Kondracke said, "I thought Obama got the better of the day. One, he confronted this issue, is he black enough, by saying that yeah, his mother was white and his father was an African, and yet his whole political career is based, in fact, it's existence is based on the opportunities created by the Civil Rights Revolution. … But, more importantly, I thought, to the extent that any white people were watching that around the country or got wind of it, he took the Bill Cosby view of what's wrong with African-American society. Kids think that to succeed in school is to act white, people don't turn out to the polls, parents do not watch with their children are doing, fathers abandon their children after conception, and stuff like that."

On Fox News' Special Report roundtable (3/5), Mara Liasson of National Public Radio said, "I think that Barack Obama is thrilling to African-Americans. That doesn't mean that they're going to abandon the Clintons, who they feel very strongly about, but there's going to be a real race for those votes."

On Fox News' Special Report roundtable (3/5), Fred Barnes of the Weekly Standard said, "She's not Rich Little, that's for sure. She's a bad impersonator. I'll bet she doesn't try that again [using a Southern accent], it was very strange, particularly coming from. It was not a good weekend for her. … There's not be fierce competition for the African-American vote. Obama's going to get it."

Obama Said To Have "Won" Selma. In his Washington Post column (3/6, A19), Richard Cohen says, "If you had to pick a winner in last weekend's Selma bake-off between Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama, it would have to be Obama. It is not just that he performed better than Hillary Clinton; it's that he had something very important to say to black America." Clinton's "speech was a recitation of Democratic Party cliches. Not so Obama's. As Clinton did, he voiced the expected obeisance to Democratic Party shibboleths about school funding, health care, pensions and such, some of which matter, some of which don't. But then he turned to what clearly does matter: 'discipline and fortitude . . . sometimes I feel like we've lost it a little bit.'" There was "nothing particularly new about this message. You might call it warmed-over Bill Cosby or even an echo of Jesse Jackson. But Cosby is an entertainer and Jackson never stood any chance of getting to the White House. So the uniqueness is not the message; it is the refreshing combination of this particular man and what he is saying."

Clinton Tells Gay Rights Group She Wants "Partnership." The AP (3/6, Barrett) reports Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton "told the nation's leading gay rights group in an unpublicized speech that she wants a partnership with gays if elected president." Clinton also "said she opposes the 'don't ask, don't tell' policy regarding gays in the military that was instituted during her husband's presidency." In a keynote speech to the Human Rights Campaign on Friday, Clinton said, "I am proud to stand by your side." The AP adds that neither Clinton's campaign "nor her Senate office made any announcement that she would be making the Friday address. Asked twice at a Monday campaign stop in Iowa why she did not publicize her speech to the group, Clinton said: 'You'll have to ask my campaign.'" The AP adds that in the speech, Clinton "joked that she shares the same initials as the group, and pledged to maintain the same close working relationship that last year helped defeat the federal amendment which would have banned same-sex marriage."

Clinton Plans Outreach To Women. The New York Times (3/6, Healy, 1.16M) reports Sen. Clinton "will begin an ambitious effort on Tuesday to enlist thousands of women to play roles in her presidential campaign, hoping to build on the enthusiasm her candidacy has stirred among female voters at early campaign events." Clinton will "announce the drive, which will unfold through March to coincide with Women's History Month, in a speech at the annual luncheon held by Emily's List, a political group favoring Democratic female candidates who support abortion rights that has already endorsed her." The campaign "intends to use social networking tools and other Web technology to develop a thousands-strong Women's Leadership Network, which would promote Mrs. Clinton's candidacy nationwide and, by this fall, hold campaign events and take part in fund-raising."

Clinton Carefully Reconstructing Image. The New York Times (3/6, Leibovich, 1.16M) reports in a 2200 word story that to "watch Mrs. Clinton up close during these 'rollout' weeks of her presidential campaign is to see a familiar political figure try to reclaim her name." Lamenting that "her public image has been distorted by caricature, she often says, 'I may be the most famous person you don't really know.' In the cliché of contemporary politics, Mrs. Clinton is 'reintroducing herself to the American people.'" Clinton is, "in this latest unveiling, the Nurturing Warrior. She displays a cozy acquaintance ('Let's chat') and leaderly confidence ('I'm in it to win it'). She is a tea-sipping girlfriend who vows to "deck" anyone who attacks her; a giggly mom who invokes old Girl Scout songs and refuses to apologize for voting for the Iraq War Resolution in 2002. Her aim, of course, is to show that she is tough enough to lead Americans in wartime but tender enough to understand their burdens."

Obama Questioned For Rescinding Invitation To Controversial Pastor. The New York Times (3/6, Kantor, 1.16M) reports the Rev. Jeremiah A. Wright Jr., "senior pastor of the popular Trinity United Church of Christ in Chicago and spiritual mentor to Senator Barack Obama, thought he knew what he would be doing on Feb. 10, the day of Senator Obama's presidential announcement." In January, Obama "had asked Mr. Wright if he would begin the event by delivering a public invocation. But Mr. Wright said Mr. Obama called him the night before the Feb. 10 announcement and rescinded the invitation to give the invocation." Wright said, "Fifteen minutes before Shabbos I get a call from Barack. One of his members had talked him into uninviting me." The Times adds, "Some black leaders are questioning Mr. Obama's decision to distance his campaign from Mr. Wright because of the campaign's apparent fear of criticism over Mr. Wright's teachings, which some say are overly Afrocentric to the point of excluding whites."

Obama's Experience Praised. In his New York Times column (3/6), Nicholas Kristof says, "The conventional wisdom about Barack Obama is that he's smart and charismatic but so inexperienced that we should feel jittery about him in the Oval Office. But that view is myopic. In some respects, Mr. Obama is far more experienced than other presidential candidates. His experience as an antipoverty organizer in Chicago, for example, gives him a deep grasp of a crucial 21st-century challenge — poverty in America — that almost all politicians lack. He says that grass-roots experience helps explain why he favors not only government spending programs, like early childhood education, but also cultural initiatives, like efforts to promote responsible fatherhood." In foreign policy "as well, Mr. Obama would bring to the White House an important experience that most other candidates lack: he has actually lived abroad. He spent four years as a child in Indonesia and attended schools in the Indonesian language, which he still speaks."

Edwards Says Jesus Would Be Unhappy With Iraq War, Americans' Selfishness. The AP (3/6, Baker) reports that ex-North Carolina Sen. John Edwards (D) "says Jesus would be appalled at how the United States has ignored the plight of the suffering, and that he believes children should have private time to pray at school. Edwards, in an interview with the Web site Beliefnet.com, said Jesus would be most upset with the selfishness of Americans and the country's willingness to go to war 'when it's not necessary.' 'I think that Jesus would be disappointed in our ignoring the plight of those around us who are suffering and our focus on our own selfish short-term needs,' Edwards told the site. 'I think he would be appalled, actually.' Edwards also said he was against teacher-led prayers in public schools, but he added that 'allowing time for children to pray for themselves, to themselves, I think is not only OK, I think it's a good thing.' … Edwards was interviewed by David Kuo, a conservative Christian who served as deputy director of President Bush's Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives until 2003. Kuo wrote a book, 'Tempting Faith, An Inside Story of Political Seduction,' that said Bush aides privately called conservative Christians 'nuts,' 'ridiculous' and 'goofy.'"

Giuliani Asks For Privacy To Deal With Family Issues. ABC World News (3/5, story 4, 2:30, Vargus, 8.78M) reported, "Twenty-one year-old Andrew Giuliani has gone public with his strained relationship with his father, following the former Mayor's bitter and public defense from Andrew Giuliani's mother. He said, 'I got my values from my mother. I have problems with his father. But it doesn't mean he won't make a great president.'" ABC political correspondent Jake Tapper added: "For almost any other candidate, the questions would spell political doom. But today in California, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani calmly discussed the damage he did to his children when he divorced his second wife in order to marry his third." Rudy Giuliani: "The responsibility is mine. And I believe that these problems with blended families, you know, are challenges. … And the challenges are best worked on privately." Tapper: "For now, at least, Giuliani seems coated in political teflon, even when the former big city Mayor with liberal views on abortion, gay rights, and gun control addressed a conference of red-meat conservatives."

The AP (3/6, Blood) reports, "Campaigning in Southern California, Giuliani faced questions about his family after his son, Andrew, publicly said their relationship had become distant after Giuliani's messy divorce from Andrew's mother, Donna Hanover, and his later marriage to Judith Nathan. 'My wife Judith is a very loving and caring…mother and stepmother. She has done everything she can. The responsibility is mine,'" Giuliani said, adding, "The more privacy I can have for my family, the better we are going to be able to deal with all these difficulties." In an article Saturday, The New York Times reported "that Andrew Giuliani and his father have recently tried to reconcile after not speaking 'for a decent amount of time.' In the Times article, Andrew said, 'There's obviously a little problem that exists between me and his wife.'" Giuliani was in California for an "event that was intended to highlight his crime-fighting credentials. He met privately with sheriffs from Southern California and Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, who later introduced him at a brief news conference."

Capeheart Reflects Negatively On "Vindictive" Giuliani's Terms As Mayor. In a piece in the Washington Post (3/6, A19, 690K) discussing Giuliani's temperament, columnist Jonathan Capehart relates that "when Giuliani was mayor, he brooked no criticism -- no matter how minor, no matter how constructive. Having been on the receiving end of one of Giuliani's withering verbal assaults, I know of what I speak." Capeheart goes on to recount a Jan. 7, 1999 telephone conversation he had with Giuliani, in which the former mayor "was spitting fire over my column in that morning's New York Daily News, in which I likened his second term to the sitcom 'Seinfeld.'" Capeheart says that "Giuliani ripped me apart, calling my column 'intellectually dishonest,' among other things," then called back shortly later "launching into another 10-minute monologue." Asserting that Giuliani's "skin is as thin as America's Next Top Model," Capeheart also says that "Giuliani could be vindictive," "had no qualms about using government to settle a score," and that the former mayor displayed a "tone-deafness" on issues of race. Capeheart concludes that Giuliani, "who became the face of a bloodied but unbowed nation on Sept. 11, 2001, was a difficult mayor. Many wonder whether the trauma of that day has mellowed Giuliani. We'll soon know. There's nothing like the stress of a presidential campaign to find out for sure."

Moving Toward White House Bid, Giuliani To Sell Investment Firm. The New York Times (3/6, Buettner, Archibold, 1.16M) reports that Rudy Giuliani announced Monday "the planned sale of his boutique investment bank to an Australian company, a transaction that a company official said was part of Mr. Giuliani's increasing focus on his presidential campaign. The firm, Giuliani Capital Advisors, is being sold to the Macquarie Group, a financial services business based in Sydney, Australia, with more than 9,600 employees worldwide. Terms of the sale, which is expected to be final in June, were not released. 'It's indicative of his gearing up and focusing on his candidacy,' said Sunny Mindel, a spokeswoman for Giuliani Partners, Mr. Giuliani's core consulting business."

The Financial Times (3/6, Daniel, Politi) reports that while terms of the deal weren't disclosed, "analysts said that Giuliani Capital Advisors could be worth as much as $100m. … GCA advises on mergers and acquisitions and restructurings in sectors such as infrastructure, energy, and property. Although largely US-based, it has advised on several international deals, particularly in Germany and the UK. It came under Mr Giuliani's umbrella in 2004, trebling the size of his business interests, which were mostly confined to Giuliani Partners, a management consultancy."

The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A8, Cooper, Block, 2.04M) reports that "Giuliani Capital has maintained a steady list of clients, particularly for its restructuring work. Its clients include Delta Air Lines Inc., which sought bankruptcy protection in 2005. It handled similar work recently for US Airways Group Inc. and Aloha Airgroup Inc., a regional carrier. … Of the two units of Giuliani Partners, it is thought to have the greater value. It also may be the most problematic politically for a potential presidential candidate. Analysts say the nature of the firm's client list may make Mr. Giuliani politically vulnerable. It remains to be seen whether a sale of the company will quiet such criticism. The Democratic Party said in a memorandum sent to some reporters that Giuliani Capital Advisors had displayed 'greed' when it sought millions of dollars in fees from troubled airlines."

The Washington Post (3/6, A4, Mosk, Shear, 690K) reports that some "viewed the sale as Giuliani's first step away from the lucrative private-sector career he built during the years he spent outside the public spotlight. Eric Abrahamson, a Columbia Business School professor, said he thinks Giuliani will have little choice but to start building a higher wall between his campaign and his business activities. 'The organization has dealt with all varieties of clients over time, some of whom would expose his image to certain perception problems,' Abrahamson said yesterday. 'I would imagine that, fairly soon, he would have to completely distance himself from the business.'"

The AP (3/6, Westfeldt) reports that "Doug Muzzio, a politics professor at Baruch College, said Giuliani is trying to head off any future conflicts in the campaign. 'Doing it now signals that they consider what they're doing for the clients will be politically problematic for a run for president, so they're getting rid of it early so that even if a story emerges, they will be politically inoculated from it,' said Muzzio."

Simon Outlines Romney Battle Plan. In an article in The Politico (3/6), Roger Simon writes that ex-Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) "may be low in the polls right now, but he is a man with a plan, a plan to make him the Republican nominee for president." Simon says "that in the coming weeks and months," Romney aims "to take advantage of the various and complicated rules governing the primaries. The prime example is the change in the way California will conduct its Republican primary on Feb. 5." Usually, GOP "primaries are winner-take-all." However, "California Republicans have changed the system. Now it is winner-take-all by congressional district." So, Romney "will target his TV ads to certain congressional districts" and "intends to treat California as if it were a 'retail' political state." Romney also intends to emphasize "the differences between himself, Rudy Giuliani and John McCain." Romney aims "to exploit what he perceives as two of McCain's great vulnerabilities in the Republican primaries:" the McCain-Feingold campaign finance law and the McCain-Kennedy immigration reform bill. Romney also is drawing "distinctions between Giuliani's rather turbulent personal life -- he has been married three times -- and Romney's own marriage of nearly 38 years." In an interview with The Politico, Romney said "The breakdown of the family…is an issue that needs to be spoken about." Romney is also keying heavily on the "the straw poll in Ames, Iowa, on Aug. 11" as a crucial "summer showdown." And on the issue of his Mormon faith, Romney "intends to recast the issue by emphasizing that he is a person of faith and that that is more important to voters than what faith he is."

Healthcare Emerges As Key Issue Early In '08 Contest. The Washington Post (3/6, A3, Lee, 690K) reports that ex-North Carolina Sen. John Edwards (D) "says providing health coverage to the 47 million Americans who lack it is so important that he is willing to raise taxes to do it." Illinois Sen. Barack Obama (D) "says he is determined to enact universal health care by the end of his first presidential term." New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) "calls universal coverage 'not only a moral and health imperative, but an economic and jobs imperative as well.'" And "at least two GOP contenders -- former governors Mitt Romney of Massachusetts and Tommy G. Thompson of Wisconsin -- are expected to use their extensive track records on the issue as campaign selling points, especially if either emerges as the party's nominee. All of which illuminates the reality that no White House hopeful can be taken seriously in the rapidly evolving 2008 race without confronting what many Americans have long said is one of their biggest concerns: the availability and affordability of health care. 'Every candidate is going to have to have a health-care plan, because it is the number one domestic policy issue on the minds of voters,' said Karen Ignagni, president of America's Health Insurance Plans."

Kemp Says GOP Working To Be "The Party Of Herbert Hoover." Jack Kemp criticizes "GOP Protectionists" in a Wall Street Journal op-ed this morning (3/6, A19), writing, "As the GOP stumbles around Washington trying to be the party of Herbert Hoover, it's sad to see so many Republicans drifting so far and so fast from the Reagan model that helped pave the way for the great, non-inflationary economic and jobs expansion of the past 25 years. Sen. Lindsey Graham, (R., S.C.) threatens China with a 28% tariff for daring to tie the yuan to the dollar. Rep. Tom Tancredo, running for president, is miffed at…Bush for trying to design comprehensive immigration-reform legislation. The president wants a guest-worker program that could help alleviate border problems in the Southwest." But "Tancredo is a sissy compared to my old pal Duncan Hunter, the congressman from San Diego. He's also running in the GOP primaries as an unambiguous Hoover-like protectionist and anti-globalization candidate. Then there's my other old friend Pat Buchanan, railing against Japan and Toyota for having the chutzpah to sell so many cars in the US, even going so far as to build manufacturing plants right here under our noses." Kemp concludes "the answers to our challenges in today's global marketplace can be found in sound money, lower tax rates on capital and labor, an easing of regulatory burdens, and the welcoming of foreign investment and trade with nations like Japan. Isolationism and protectionism are not worthy of 21st century America."

Jenna Bush To Publish Book For Teens. USA Today (3/6, 1D, Minzesheimer, 2.27M) reports, "Jenna Bush, in a rare interview, says her forthcoming book for teens -- about a 17-year-old single mother in Panama who is living with HIV -- will end with a 'call to action.'" HarperCollins "announces today that it's publishing Bush's Ana's Story: A Journey of Hope this fall. It will be illustrated with photographs by Mia Baxter, a former classmate of Bush's at the University of Texas." The president's daughter "says the book is not political. It's aimed at 'getting kids thinking and involved,' Bush said Monday by phone from Panama, where she has worked since September as an unpaid intern for UNICEF."

Ahead Of Latin America Trip, Bush Outlines Plans To Help Region. USA Today (3/6, Jackson, 2.27M) reports, "President Bush said Monday that the United States will help the working poor of Latin America as part of a plan meant to show the region it has not been forgotten by the United States. Preparing for a seven-day, five-nation swing, Bush outlined past efforts to help the region while offering new plans for health care, education and business development." Bush told members of the United States Hispanic Chamber of Commerce, "The working poor of Latin America need change." USA Today adds, "During a Monday briefing, national security adviser Stephen Hadley said the trip will emphasize the continuing US efforts to bolster Latin American democracies and economies. Those efforts, Hadley said, have not received the attention they deserve. 'That's one of the reasons we're doing this trip.'" Bush leaves Thursday "for São Paulo, Brazil, the first stop on a trip that includes Uruguay, Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico."

The Wall Street Journal (3/6, Pulizzi, 2.04M) reports that in his speech, Bush "unveiled plans to send a Navy vessel to dispense medical care throughout Latin America, spend $75 million over three years on English-language training for the poor and develop a new small-business loan initiative." The Journal adds that "since taking office, Mr. Bush has doubled US foreign assistance to Latin America to about $1.6 billion a year. The money includes development assistance, military assistance and counter-narcotic assistance. Colombia is the largest recipient of US aide outside the Middle East and Afghanistan, with most of the money earmarked for anti-drug efforts."

In response to "criticism he has ignored Latin America," says the AP (3/6, Hunt), Bush said "the region's grinding poverty is a scandal that has caused some to question the value of democracy." To combat this trend, the President said the US "will spend tens of millions of dollars to improve education, housing and health care across the region."

On its front page, the New York Times (3/6, A1, Rohter, 1.16M) reports Bush will arrive in Brazil Thursday "with an energy partnership plan to create jobs and decrease poverty and inequality, a marked shift in Washington's priorities for Latin America aimed at countering the challenge posed by President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela." While US policy in the region has "focused on free-trade agreements and related economic measures, with a secondary emphasis on drug interdiction," the "growing leftward and anti-American trend in regional politics, led by Mr. Chávez" has led to "a modified agenda and a renewed effort to rebut complaints by Latin Americans that the president has ignored their concerns in favor of the campaign against terrorism." Despite the policy shift, "promises of American support and assistance are likely to fall short of what Mr. Chávez, with his oil wealth, has been delivering recently."

The Washington Post (3/6, A11, Baker, 690K) says Bush "is launching a new campaign to compete with Chávez for the region's hearts and minds, employing language mirroring the Venezuelan leader's leftist populism but rooted in traditional American conservatism." After six years "of focusing elsewhere in the world," Bush in his final two years "wants to convince the nation's neighbors that, as he put it yesterday, 'we care.' But he faces an enormous gulf between ambition and reality, analysts say."

The Los Angeles Times (3/6, Reynolds, McDonnell, Kraul, 850K) also says "the emphasis on addressing inequality marks a shift for the president, who has been assailed for stressing free trade and democracy south of the border and ignoring the social ills that continue to stymie the region." Bush, "whose poll numbers are at least as bad in Latin America as at home, is likely to meet skepticism and protests as he tries to portray a kinder, gentler face of US policy."

The Washington Times (3/6, Ward, 88K) reports Eric Farnsworth, vice president of the Council of Americas, "an advocacy group for businesses with interests in Latin America, said 'the specter of Chavez [is] overhanging the region right now,' and that 'the standing of the United States in the region has decreased.'" Farnsworth, however, "applauded Mr. Bush's speech, which he said pushes back against Mr. Chavez's populism in the right way." Dan Restrepo, Latin America analyst at the Center for American Progress, "a left-leaning think tank, was not impressed. 'You can't have a year of engagement every six or seven years and think it's going to answer the mail,' Mr. Restrepo said."

GOP Signals Willingness To Compromise On Panama, Peru, Colombia Trade Deals. The New York Times (3/6, Weisman, 1.16M) reports, "When the Democrats swept to victory last fall, after a campaign fueled partly by attacks on…Bush's trade policies, trade deals promoted by the administration seemed doomed in the new Congress. But that was then. In the last week, the administration and its Republican allies on Capitol Hill have signaled a new willingness to work with Democrats to try to secure their support for three pending trade deals -- with Panama, Peru and Colombia." The Times adds, "The focus of their talks has been guarantees for the rights of workers in countries with which the United States has negotiated trade accords, including a ban on child labor and forced labor." Rep. Charles Rangel, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, said yesterday, "There's no question that there's been a change on the Republican side. … They refused to talk about these things before, and now they're talking." But "it is still not clear how Democrats will respond. Mr. Rangel said that they remained highly skeptical about signs of Republican flexibility on trade and that he had not seen anything "acceptable to a broad number of members" on his side."

Meanwhile, The Hill (3/6, Swanson) reports, "Freshman Democrats seeking a direct role in congressional trade policy have won a meeting this week" with Rangel. No freshmen "sit on the prestigious Ways and Means Committee, which oversees trade policy, but class members pressed for a role in trade in a Jan. 17 letter to Rangel that said opposition to the Bush administration's trade policies had been 'vital to our electoral successes.'" The Gill adds, "A spokesman for freshman Rep. Betty Sutton (D-Ohio), a former labor lawyer who has led the freshman efforts, said the meeting was scheduled with the hope that all 39 Democrats who signed the Jan. 17 letter would be able to attend."

UN Environmental Official Assesses US-Brazil Ethanol Alliance. The AP (3/6, Astor) reports, "A proposed ethanol alliance that President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva is expected to forge with President Bush later this week poses both opportunities and risks for the environment, a top U.N. environmental official said Monday. Achim Steiner, executive director of the U.N. Environment Program, said growing international demands for ethanol and other biofuels can threaten the Amazon rain forest if safeguards are not put in place." The AP adds, "Brazil's main biofuel is ethanol made from sugarcane. While sugarcane cultivation is minimal now in the Amazon, some environmentalists fear that growing demands for the fuel could push cane growers into the rainforest." Bush "and Silva are expected to forge an 'ethanol alliance' Friday aimed at creating quality standards for the alternative fuel, while joining forces to promote production of ethanol in nations lying between Brazil and the United States."

Guatemala To Ask Bush For Assistance In Drug War. The AP (3/6, Llorca) reports, "In a case that has laid bare the extent of corruption" in the Guatemala, "FBI agents are trying to help discover who ordered the murders of three Salvadoran politicians and the Guatemalan police officers who said they were told to kill them." The killings and apparent cover-up "has exposed the seemingly insurmountable challenges President Oscar Berger faces as he tries to regain control of a defiant and even criminal police force." Berger "says he needs more help in fighting organized crime and will ask President Bush when he visits March 12 to provide US helicopters, planes and radar equipment."

New Colombian Foreign Minister Was Held Hostage By Rebels. The Washington Post (3/6, A10, Forero, 690K) profiles newly appointed Colombian foreign minister, Fernando Araújo, who up until only weeks ago had been held hostage by Marxist rebels for the past six years. As foreign minister, Araújo is expected "to speak passionately about a crime that the largest rebel group here, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), has long used to generate ransom money and wield leverage to win the release of jailed guerrillas" and to "explain the difficult challenges the Uribe government faces in reaching a deal with the rebels."

Bolivian Women Leading Way From Rural To City Life. In a front page article, the Washington Post (3/6, A1, Reel, 690K) reports on Bolivian women leading the way from the country's "tiny mountain villages and worn-out mining towns" to larger cities. According to the U.N., "For the first time in the world's history, more people next year will live in cities than in rural areas," and women, like those in Bolivia, "are leading the urban push, leaving the countryside at higher rates than men, lured in large part by domestic service jobs."

US, North Korea Begin "Historic" Talks In New York. The AP (3/6, Lederer) reports the US and North Korea opened "historic talks" Monday on steps to establish diplomatic relations. However, USA Today (3/6, 5A, Slavin, 2.27M) reports State Department spokesman Sean McCormack "downplayed expectations for quick progress," calling the meeting between North Korean Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Gwan and Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill "just an initial discussion."

The Washington Times (3/6, Sands, 88K) calls the talks "groundbreaking," but also notes Administration officials "were trying to tamp down expectations of a major breakthrough, saying difficult issues such as US financial sanctions and designation of Pyongyang as an official sponsor of terrorism will require many negotiating sessions."

UNDP Suspends Work In North Korea. The New York Times (3/6, A11, Hoge, 1.16M) reports the UNDP "announced Monday that it was suspending work in North Korea because the country had failed to meet conditions set up in response to American complaints that United Nations money was being diverted to the government of Kim Jong-il." David Morrison, director of communications for the agency, said, "We have decided to suspend our operations, and the ball is really now in the court of the D.P.R. Korean authorities."

US Urged To Address Subject Of Abductions. Deputy editor Melanie Kirkpatrick writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/6, A18, 2.04M), "Among the promises the US made to North Korea as part of the Feb. 13 nuclear disarmament deal is a pledge to begin the process of removing it from the list of terror-sponsoring states. When Vice President Dick Cheney visited Tokyo last month, [Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo] Abe urged the US not to do so until the abduction issue is resolved. While President Bush has spoken eloquently in the past about human-rights violations in North Korea, that issue appears not to be high on the US agenda these days. Chief US negotiator Christopher Hill is holding talks in New York with his North Korean counterpart this week. A good question for him to ask is, Where is Megumi" Yokota, a Japanese citizen kidnapped by North Korea who remains missing today.

Israeli Security Chief Says Iran Training Hamas. The New York Times (3/6, A8, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports the chief of Shin Bet, the Israeli internal security service, "said Monday that the Islamic movement Hamas had sent dozens of men from Gaza to Iran for military training." In "a rare on-the-record briefing," Yuval Diskin told reporters, "We know that Hamas has started to dispatch people to Iran, tens, and a promise of hundreds." The training would "last months, perhaps years," he said, adding, "I see this as the strategic danger, more than any weapons smuggled into Gaza." Responding the allegations, Ahmed Youssef, an adviser to Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, said Hamas "has not sent anyone to Iran," and that Diskin's comment was "propaganda, to hurt a new government."

On its front page, the Washington Times (3/6, A1, Mitnick, 88K) quotes Diskin as saying, "One of the bad fruits of the international siege on Hamas is that once all the doors were closed, the only window open was to Iran." His analysis of the Palestinian "political and military scene painted a bleak prognosis for peace negotiations with Israel and included a warning about a possible Israeli offensive in the Gaza Strip." The Los Angeles Times (3/6, Boudreaux, 850K) also reports the development.

State Department Says Palestinian Aid Hinges On Hamas. The AP (3/6) reports the State Department "said Monday full funding of a proposed $86 million in security assistance for the Palestinian Authority hinges on whether US officials receive assurances that none of the funds can benefit Hamas." State Department spokesman Sean McCormack commented after four House Foreign Affairs Committee members "urged Secretary…Rice to reconsider the plan in light of the recent agreement between Fatah and Hamas to form a national unity government." McCormack said the Administration "is asking the same questions as members of Congress about whether Hamas would benefit from the program."

France Calls For Closer EU-Palestinian Ties. The Financial Times (3/6, Dombey, Morris) reports France "pushed on Monday for the European Union to step up preparations for deeper ties with a Palestinian government of national unity, despite misgivings from countries such as Germany and the Netherlands." The question of whether to resume contacts with and direct funding for the Palestinian Authority is "set to race up the EU's agenda as the rival Fatah and Hamas factions move closer to working together." While France argues that the momentum of last month's Mecca agreement to set up a unity government "cannot be wasted," other countries "give greater emphasis to making sure the administration fully meets international demands that it recognises Israel."

Webb Introduces Bill Requiring Congressional Authorization For Iran War. The Washington Times (3/6, A1, Bellantoni, 88K) reports in a front page article that Virginia Sen. James H. Webb Jr. yesterday introduced legislation "to force President Bush to seek congressional authorization before using force against Iran." Democratic leaders, "who indicated general support" for the plan last week, are "still deciding whether they will attach it to an upcoming spending bill."

IAEA Says Iran May Have Halted Nuclear Program. The AP (3/6, Jahn) reports IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei said Monday that Iran "seems to have at least temporarily halted" its uranium-enrichment program. The "pause" could represent "an attempt to deescalate Iran's conflict with the Security Council, which is deliberating a new set of harsher sanctions." Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "had been expected to announce last month that Iran had started installing 3,000 uranium-enriching centrifuges at a facility in the desert outside the central city of Natanz," but the announcement "never materialized," in what was seen as "an apparent step back." ElBaradei said, "I do not believe that the number of centrifuges has increased, nor do I believe that (new) nuclear material has been introduced to the centrifuges at Natanz."

However, USA Today (3/6, 11A, 2.27M) notes ElBaradei said "quite a few uncertainties still remain" because "Iran's lack of cooperation with the International Atomic Energy Agency" means the agency "can't determine" whether Iran's nuclear activities "are purely peaceful."

Agreement On UN Iran Sanctions Does Not Appear Close. The AP (3/6, Burkhardt) reports diplomats met Monday to discuss possible new sanctions against Iran, "but differences emerged and an agreement did not appear to be close," diplomats said. After meeting late Monday at Britain's U.N. Mission, China's U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya said there are "some different views here, so we will continue to work." He said the ambassadors would meet again on Tuesday afternoon.

The Christian Science Monitor (3/6, LaFranchi, 59K) reports the Bush administration, "convinced that punitive financial measures played a role in moving North Korea to accept a deal designed to shut down its nuclear operations, is now spearheading a multilateral effort to use sanctions to turn the screws on Iran and its nuclear program." Among the measures being considered for the new resolution, according to US and European officials, "are expansion of the list of Iranian officials whose assets would be frozen, a travel ban on more Iranians who are involved in the country's nuclear research and development, and additions to the list of parts, material, and technology that would be banned from Iranian trade."

Iranian Women Arrested During Rights Protest. The New York Times (3/6, A11, Fathi, 1.16M) reports Iranian authorities arrested 33 women Sunday "after protests outside a court where five of them were being tried for leading a campaign to gain more legal rights for women," Iranian newspapers reported Monday. Human Rights Watch condemned the arrests and called for the women's immediate release.

Interpol Recommends Arrest Warrants For Former Iranian Officials. McClatchy (3/6, Bachelet) reports Interpol's legal department "has recommended issuing capture notices for five former Iranian officials in connection with the 1994 bombing of a Jewish community center in Argentina, which killed 85 people," Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R) said Monday. Argentina "requested the capture notices…triggering anger in the Iranian government, which has denied any involvement in the bombing."

Rice, Jordan's King Abdullah Discuss Iraq Refugees, Mideast Peace. AFP (3/6) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice Monday met with Jordan's King Abdullah to discuss "Iraqi refugees and an Arab peace plan for the Middle East," diplomats said. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters that providing assistance to Iraqi refugees, an issue that will be addressed at a regional conference on Iraq this weekend in Baghdad, was "an issue of serious concern" for King Abdullah. "I know that there is a lot of concern about the pressures on the support network within Jordan and the ability of the NGOs working in Jordan to meet those humanitarian needs" of some 600,000 Iraqi refugees in the country, McCormack said.

Agreement Between Lebanese Factions Expected Within Days. The Washington Times (3/6, Knapp, 88K) reports that "a deal to end the standoff between Lebanon's US-backed government and Hezbollah, the nation's worst political crisis since its 1975-1990 civil war, is expected to be finalized within the next few days, key political figures say." A possible agreement follows a meeting between Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Saudi King Abdullah Saturday.

US Urged To Empower Saudi King Abdullah. Rob Sobhani, president of Caspian Energy Consulting, writes in a Washington Times (3/6, 88K) op-ed, "While the United States and Europe stood by powerless for months…King Abdullah [of Saudi Arabia] brought together the leaders of Hamas and Fatah in Mecca and got them to agree to bury their differences." Sobhani says it "is in America's interest for Washington to recognize the important role of Saudi Arabia's wise monarch and make him an equal partner in bringing about peace and stability in the combustible Middle East." If Washington "does not empower King Abdullah, the negative force and path of extremism exemplified by Mr. Ahmadinejad, Lebanon's Hassan Nassrallah and Iran's Ali Khamenei will fill the current power vacuum in the Middle East with hate and destruction."

Columnist Urges Support For Islamic Moderates. The Wall Street Journal's (3/6, A18) Bret Stephens writes from the "landmark Summit on Secular Islam" in St. Petersburg, Florida that "for more than five years, the Bush administration has been attempting to enlist the support of the so-called moderates in the war on terror -- its definition of 'moderate' being remarkably elastic, to put it charitably." But Undersecretary Karen Hughes "is not at this summit, of course, nor is anyone else from the State Department, nor is the US-funded al-Hurra Arabic TV station. … Al-Jazeera, however, is here, suggesting that the real Arab mainstream better appreciates the broad interest the conference's speakers attract in the Muslim world, as well as their latent power."

Russia Revises Stance On US Missile Shield. The Financial Times (3/6, Buckley, Dombey, Williamson) reports Russia "said it was revising its military doctrine to reflect other powers' growing use of military force, while a Russian general warned again that Moscow could knock out elements of the US missile defence system planned for eastern Europe." The comments came as German Chancellor Angela Merkel "added her voice to the heated international debate over the missile defence system by calling for Nato to be given responsibility for defusing concerns over the plan." In an interview with the Times, Merkel said "Nato is the best place for discussion of this issue," arguing that Washington "should step up consultation with its western allies and Russia." Her statement "reflects concerns over increasing east-west tensions" over the proposed missile plan.

Meanwhile, the New York Times (3/6, A3, Shanker, Cooper, 1.16M) reports under the headline "US Moves To Soothe Growing Russian Resentment," that the Bush administration "has decided to reach out more often and more intensively to Russia at a time when the leadership in Moscow is harshly criticizing American policy and some scholars say the United States has not sufficiently tended to an important relationship." In the wake of growing tensions over the missile shield, "there is a growing acknowledgment among officials in Washington that the United States has not responded as rapidly or eloquently as it might have to a widespread sense of grievance in Russia."

Russia, US To Discuss START Treaty. In a front page article, the Washington Times (3/6, A1, Kralev, 88K) reports the Bush administration "has rebuffed Russian overtures to negotiate a legally binding replacement of the 1991 START I treaty" that is set to expire in 2009, US and Russian officials said yesterday. An "expert-level meeting…to discuss options after the treaty's expiration is expected to take place as soon as this month, but their differences are not likely to be resolved," the officials said. While the Russians "insist on a legally binding agreement," the Americans have focused on "transparency and confidence-building measures" that would still allow both sides to verify each others' arsenals and capabilities.

Putin Critic Dies In Fall From 5th-Floor Window. The Washington Times/London Daily Telegraph (3/6) reports that Ivan Safronov, a Russian journalist who had "criticized" President Vladimir Putin and "frequently irritated Russia's powerful intelligence services," died after falling from a fifth-floor window of an apartment building. Russian investigators said they believed that Safronov "committed suicide -- an interpretation that was challenged by colleagues."

US Official Says "Very Aggressive" Chinese Spies A Threat. In a front page article, the Washington Times (3/6, A1, Gertz, 88K) reports, "China's intelligence services are among the most aggressive at spying on the United States, followed by Cuban, Russian and Iranian spy agencies," according to the US government's top counterintelligence coordinator. In an interview with the Times, Joel F. Brenner, the new head of the Office of the National Counterintelligence Executive, said the US remains the No. 1 target of "virtually every significant espionage service on the face of the Earth." Specifically, Brenner said

"China's intelligence activities have been 'very aggressive' at acquiring US advanced technology, often before it is fully developed here."

US Warns China On Military Build-Up. AFP (3/6, Knox) reports Washington "warned China Monday that its announced military spending boost was 'inconsistent' with peaceful growth and hinted that Beijing was understating its defense expenditures." National security council spokesman Gordon Johndroe told AFP, "This kind of spending not only concerns us but raises concerns among China's neighbors. This is inconsistent with China's policy of peaceful development."

Former Shanghai Stock Exchange Official Urges Changes To System. Fang Xinghai, former deputy chief executive of the Shanghai Stock Exchange, writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/6, A19, 2.04M) that following last week's unexpected drop in the Chinese stock exchange if the "government to intervene now as it did before, it would likely cause unnecessarily large volatilities, with serious results for the economy." A "better alternative than government intervention to ensure the smooth functioning of China's stock market," he says, "is to build in a self-adjusting mechanism," including the approval of "more new mutual funds, increase quotas under the Qualified Foreign Institutional Investor scheme so more overseas institutions can enter the market, and allow more insurance and pension money to be invested in stocks. And yes, hedge funds should be legalized."

Mixed Genocide Ruling Puts Pressure On Serbia. The New York Times (3/6, A10, Simons, 1.16M) reports last week's ruling by the UN's highest court "that found fault with Serbia under the Genocide Convention complicates Serbia's diplomatic rehabilitation, several legal experts said." They said the ruling "would bind diplomats of the European Union and NATO, whose ties with Serbia have been growing," even though the court "did not find that Serbia was directly responsible for the genocide" of Bosnian Muslims in 1995. The ruling also "had important effects reaching beyond Serbia, because any country sheltering" Bosnian Serb leaders Ratko Mladic and Radovan Karadzic "would now be considered in violation of the convention."

NYTimes Urges Japan To Apologize For WWII Sex Slaves. In an editorial, the New York Times (3/6, 1.16M) writes, "What part of 'Japanese Army sex slaves' does Japan's prime minister, Shinzo Abe, have so much trouble understanding and apologizing for?" Although the "underlying facts have long been beyond serious dispute," Abe "seems less concerned with repairing Japan's sullied international reputation than with appealing to a large right-wing faction within his Liberal Democratic Party that insists that the whole shameful episode was a case of healthy private enterprise." The Times says, "It is time for Japan's politicians -- starting with Mr. Abe -- to recognize that the first step toward overcoming a shameful past is acknowledging it."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Privacy Board Approves Two US Surveillance Programs. The AP (3/6, Yen) reports, "A White House privacy board is giving its stamp of approval to two of the Bush administration's controversial surveillance programs — electronic eavesdropping and financial tracking — and says they do not violate citizens' civil liberties." The AP continues, "Democrats newly in charge of Congress quickly criticized the findings, which they said were questionable given some of the board members' close ties with the Bush administration. … 'Their current findings and any additional conclusions they reach will be taken with a grain of salt until they become fully independent,' said Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., who chairs the House Homeland Security Committee." The AP adds, "After operating mostly in secret for a year, the five-member Privacy and Civil Liberties Board is preparing to release its first report to Congress next week. … The report finds that both the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping program and the Treasury Department's monitoring of international banking transactions have sufficient privacy protections, three board members told The Associated Press in telephone interviews. … Both programs have multiple layers of review before sensitive information is accessed, they said." The AP notes, "The board's initial findings come as Congress is moving forward on measures to give the board more authority and make it more independent of the president. Created in late 2004, the panel was established as a compromise between Congress and the White House after a recommendation by the Sept. 11 commission. … Both conservative and liberal civil liberties groups have urged the members to aggressively review the eavesdropping program and have questioned whether board members would stand up to the president if he were flouting the law."

Study Said To Show Need For Redefinition Of Torture. The AP (3/6, Kole) reports, "Prisoners who endure poor or degrading treatment suffer much of the same long-term psychological distress as do captives who are tortured, suggests a study published Monday." The AP continues, "The study was based on interviews with victims of ill treatment and torture while imprisoned in the former Yugoslavia, and experts said the findings underscored the need for a broader definition of torture. … 'What is the basis for the distinction between torture and other cruel and degrading treatment? Science should inform this debate,' the study's lead author, Metin Basoglu of the Institute of Psychiatry at King's College in London, told The Associated Press in a telephone interview. The study was published in the Archives of General Psychiatry." The AP adds, "Steve H. Miles of the University of Minnesota's Center for Bioethics, who was not involved in the study, said the findings 'show that the severity of long-lasting adverse mental effects is unrelated to whether the torture or degrading treatment is physical or psychological.' … 'The wrongness of these inflicted harms is compounded by the fact that most abused prisoners, including those in the present war on terror, are innocent or ignorant of terrorist activities,' Miles said." The AP notes, "The Bush administration has said the U.S. uses legal interrogation techniques — not torture — to gain information that could head off terror attacks. It insists that the U.S. complies with the U.N. Convention Against Torture. … Yet Washington's definition of torture, as interpreted by the U.S. Justice Department after reports of American abuses at Guantanamo Bay and in Iraq and Afghanistan surfaced, is fairly narrow. … It excludes mental pain and suffering created by acts that do not cause severe physical pain, such as blindfolding, hooding, forced nudity, isolation and deprivation of sleep or light, the researchers said, citing a Dec. 30, 2004, Justice Department memo. The document also contends that for an act to be considered torture, there must be proof that it inflicts 'prolonged mental harm.' … 'The implications of such a narrow definition of torture have raised serious concerns in the human rights community,' said the study. 'These findings suggest that physical pain per se is not the most important determinant of traumatic stress in survivors of torture.'"

AFP (3/6, Daly) reports, "Researchers who evaluated the mental health of soldiers and civilians tortured during the 1990s Balkan wars found that victims of psychological abuse were just as likely to suffer from post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) and depression as victims of classic physical torture methods. … The researchers also reported that the torture victims rated some techniques such as stress positions, isolation, sleep deprivation and blindfolding as distressing as most physical torture methods." AFP adds, "In 2003, lawyers for the US Justice Department and a Pentagon working group report on detainee interrogations made the case for a narrow definition of torture that excludes procedures such as blindfolding and hooding, forced nudity, isolation and other psychological manipulations. … The Justice Department memorandum argued that the scope of the term torture should be limited to those acts which could be shown to result in 'prolonged mental harm,' according to the study. … The development followed allegations of human rights abuses at US detention facilities in Iraq, Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. … However, the authors of this paper said that based on their analysis of the experiences of torture victims from the modern Balkans conflict, the US appears to be drawing a distinction without a difference."

High Court Hears Guantanamo Detainees' Request For Rights Guarantees. The AP (3/6, Sherman) reports, "Lawyers for Guantanamo detainees held more than five years without charges asked the Supreme Court Monday to step in a third time to guarantee that they can challenge their confinement in U.S. courts." The AP continues, "The detainees want the justices to hear their case and issue a decision before the Court ends its term in early summer. … 'Not only are these questions of paramount legal importance, but the extreme and worsening plight of the Guantanamo detainees make them questions of great humanitarian urgency as well,' lawyers for the detainees wrote in court papers urging the justices to decide the case." The AP adds, "The Court has twice ruled that foreigners imprisoned at the U.S. naval base in Cuba can pursue their cases in American courts, rejecting Bush administration arguments. … The latest Supreme Court appeal follows a federal appeals court ruling last month that limited detainees' legal rights. The 2-1 decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit upheld a key provision of the Military Commissions Act, which President George W. Bush pushed through Congress last year to set up a Defense Department system to prosecute terrorism suspects. Now, detainees must prove to three-officer military panels that they don't pose a terror threat. … Separately, the justices said they would not grant quick review in the cases of two other Guantanamo detainees who have been designated by the Pentagon to face criminal charges in front of a military tribunal."

WPost Calls Gitmo Prosecutors' Criticism Of Defense Lawyer "Disturbing." The Washington Post (3/6, A18, 690K), in an editorial, writes, "Cully Stimson…was the Pentagon official in charge of Guantanamo Bay prisoners who had to leave his post after suggesting that private law firms shouldn't be representing detainees. Now the Pentagon's chief Guantanamo prosecutor, Air Force Col. Morris Davis, has gotten into the attack-the-defense-lawyers act, this time complaining about the conduct of a military lawyer assigned to defend Australian David Hicks. … Hicks's outspoken military lawyer, Marine Maj. Michael Mori, has spent a good deal of time in Australia helping stir up public support for his client, and he has been unsparing in his criticism of the military tribunals." According to the Post, "Davis's unsubtle effort to quiet Maj. Mori may be even more disturbing than Mr. Stimson's remarks: It's not likely that private law firms are going to be intimidated out of representing their clients, but military lawyers who have to fear for their careers might think twice before zealously representing their clients."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

New York Officials Seek Extension Of Terrorism Risk Insurance Act. The New York Times (3/6, Cardwell, 1.16M) reports New York officials "urged Congress yesterday to renew" the Terrorism Risk Insurance Act "set to expire at the end of this year that they said allowed the city's economy to recover and grow in the years after the Sept. 11 terror attack. The program, created…in 2002 and extended in 2005, was devised when insurers began excluding terrorism from their property policies after Sept. 11, 2001. Under its terms, the federal government would pay most of the cost of losses from a foreign terror attack, up to a total of $100 billion a year. In seeking its renewal, the officials told the House Subcommittee on Capital Markets, Insurance and Government Sponsored Enterprises at a hearing in Manhattan that without it, the city's robust development engine could sputter to a halt." Sen. Charles Schumer "said the cycle of pending expiration and renewal had created a damaging 'fear pattern' among insurers." Mayor Michael Bloomberg "also spoke in support of continuing the program, saying it was crucial to the city's overall economic health."

Senate To Vote On Union Rights For TSA Workers. The Washington Post (3/6, D4, Barr, 690K) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The Senate plans to vote today on whether to extend union rights to federal airport screeners, a fundamental question that confronted Congress when it created the Transportation Security Administration after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks." However, the Post adds, "the administration is holding firm. Yesterday, at a Senate subcommittee hearing, Kip Hawley, head of the TSA, rejected proposals by [sponsor Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.)] and Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) that would provide bargaining rights for transportation security officers, popularly called security screeners. The proposals, Hawley said, pose 'a serious negative security impact.'" The Post notes, "Providing bargaining rights would allow unions to take grievances to outside arbitrators to review management decisions 'after the fact' and 'sets up a morass of wasted time that detracts from the focus on security,' Hawley said." The Post adds, "Aides to President Bush have said they will recommend a veto of the bill implementing the 9/11 panel's recommendations if it includes union rights for screeners. Senate Republicans hope to sustain the veto, noting that 36 GOP senators," signed "a letter to Bush objecting to the union provision."

WSJournal Accuses Democrats Of Putting "Big Labor" Ahead Of National Security. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A18, 2.04M) editorializes that the two most recent examples of "favors that Democrats in Congress are doing for Big Labor" are "especially notable because they'd benefit unions at the expense of national security. First up is Senator Jim DeMint's (R., S.C.) proposal to bar certain convicted felons from working in ports." DeMint offered the amendment last year and it was removed by Democrats "under the cover of a House-Senate conference. … Mr. DeMint was back trying again last week, and every Senate Democrat once again voted for his amendment. However, they also voted for a separate amendment from Hawaii's Daniel Inouye that would allow future Administrations to delete the DeMint requirements." The Journal continues that "Democrats also keep trying to impose collective bargaining rights for all 43,000 screeners at the Transportation Security Administration. Congress expressly denied such organizing ability when it created TSA in 2001, on the sensible grounds that union work rules would compromise security."

ACLU Calls For Repeal Of Real ID. Anthony D. Romero, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union, in an op-ed in USA Today (3/6, 12A, 2.27M) writes, "Real ID should be repealed, especially after the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) released its vague and evasive regulations last week. Rather than answer the hard questions and provide solid guidance, DHS told the states to find solutions by 2010, effectively passing the hot potato to the next administration." Romero continues that the act was "attached…to a must-pass Iraq war/tsunami relief bill. No hearings. No debate." Had it been exposed to "democratic scrutiny," Real ID would have been seen as "an unfunded mandate that violates the Constitution's 10th Amendment on state powers, destroys states' dual sovereignty and consolidates every American's private information, leaving all of us far more vulnerable to identity thieves." Furthermore, "Real ID is not a solution that can stop terrorism. Clever and resourceful 'terrorists' will always find ways to get IDs."

USA Today Says Security Trumps Real ID Concerns. In an opposing editorial, USA Today (3/6, 12A, 2.27M) notes that seven of the 9/11 terrorists had Virginia state licenses, "although none lived there. … Real ID has produced much howling about the costs, the likely hassles at state motor vehicle departments and the potential threat to privacy. All are valid concerns. But the fact is that driver's licenses are the nation's principal form of ID. As long as that's the case, they need to be credible."

WAR NEWS:

House Democratic Caucus Increasingly Divided Over Iraq. The Washington Post (3/6, A1, Weisman, 690K) reports, "Senior House Democrats, seeking to placate members of their party from Republican-leaning districts, are pushing a plan that would place restrictions on President Bush's ability to wage the war in Iraq but would allow him to waive them if he publicly justifies his position. Under the proposal, Bush would also have to set a date to begin troop withdrawals if the Iraqi government fails to meet benchmarks aimed at stabilizing the country that the president laid out in January." The plan "is an attempt to bridge the differences between anti-war Democrats, led by Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.), who have wanted to devise standards of troop readiness strict enough to force Bush to delay some deployments and bring some troops home, and Democrats wary of seeming to place restrictions on the president's role as commander in chief." The Post adds, "The legislative jujitsu in the backrooms of Capitol Hill underscores the difficulties the Democrats face in confronting the issue that helped them regain control of Congress -- Iraq."

Meanwhile, The Politico (3/6) reports Speaker Nancy Pelosi "is facing a full-blown revolt from liberal House Democrats over the $98 billion Iraq supplemental bill, according to Democratic insiders. Anywhere between 50 to 75 Democrats are now threatening to vote against the bill because it doesn't go far enough toward ending the war, including setting a date certain for withdrawal of U.S. combat forces from Iraq, said the sources." Pelosi and Democratic leaders "are expected to postpone markup of the Iraq bill in the House Appropriations Committee by at least a week in order to buy time to resolve the matter." Liberals "are unhappy with the current proposal being discussed by…Murtha…and the Democratic leadership, which would prevent…Bush from sending more troops to Iraq unless they are certified as being properly equipped, trained and rested to take on combat missions." The Politico adds that "as happens so often in politics, if you move too far in appeasing one group, you then alienate another, which is what's happening here."

Roll Call (3/6, Pierce) offers a different picture of Democratic opinion on the supplemental, reporting "both liberal and conservative Democrats signaled that they might be willing to be team players if leaders accommodate them in small ways." Roll Call adds, "As of Monday evening, the chances of committee action on a bill this week were slipping away and it was unclear whether House Democratic leaders would include language, first proposed by" Murtha, "to restrict in some way the president's ability to deploy troops to Iraq unless he publicly acknowledges that he is sending troops into combat without meeting certain readiness requirements." However, "one House Democratic leadership aide indicated that the bill most likely would include a provision requiring the president to report to Congress on whether the benchmarks he set out for the Iraqi government are being met." And "there were other indications Monday that House Democratic leaders were considering language requiring the president to seek Congressional approval for any military action against Iran."

E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (3/6, A19, 690K) that "this week could well determine whether Democrats splinter or find a new strategy on Iraq based on the unhappy but realistic assumption that -- unless Bush suddenly opens himself to new approaches -- the fight to change course in Iraq is likely to go on all this year, and perhaps into the next. … Democrats and the left face a testing time. For some in the antiwar movement, failing to end the war right now is immoral. But as Murtha suggested, a short-term strategy to end the war can't work. This is a long struggle, and those engaged in it need to battle for the long term."

White House To Ask For More War Funds. The AP (3/6, Taylor) reports, "The White House is ready to ask Congress for more money for…Bush's plan -- already hotly debated -- to send 21,500 new combat troops into Iraq." The move "would pay for support personnel and otherwise update last month's request for the Iraq war. It probably will draw criticism from Democrats who say the Pentagon had low-balled estimates of the costs of Bush's plan for improving security in Baghdad and Anbar province. The latest request could come as early as Tuesday, modifying last month's $93.4 billion request for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan through Sept. 30. … The request probably will come to about $2 billion. It will be accompanied by equal-sized reductions elsewhere in the larger request, which contained money for two next-generation Joint Strike Fighters and a V-22 tilt rotor aircraft."

Gallup Poll Finds Only 28% Think US Will Win Iraq War. USA Today (3/6, 2.27M) reports, "A new USA TODAY/Gallup Poll shows deepening pessimism on Iraq, even as many Americans are reluctant to limit money or troops for the war effort. Only 28% say the United States will probably or definitely win the war, down from 35% in December and the lowest since the question was first asked in September 2005. The share of people who now call the war a mistake is 59% -- the same as September 2005 and the highest level in the 58 times the question has been asked since the war began." In addition, "six in 10 people said they want Congress to set a timetable to withdraw all U.S. troops by the end of 2008. Three-quarters said Congress should require that US troops come home if Iraqi leaders don't keep pledges to reduce violence, and that US troops have at least a year's stay in the USA between deployments to Iraq. The mandatory break is part of a plan by" Murtha.

Democrats Said To Face Tough Political Endgame In Iraq. Jonah Goldberg, editor at large of National Review Online, writes in USA Today (3/6, 13A, 2.27M), "There's a deep irony to the Democratic Party's dilemma over Iraq. For 30 years, the party's left-wing base has reflexively proclaimed every foreign policy challenge 'another Vietnam,'" and now they are "behaving as if Iraq is Vietnam all over again. But it is only now dawning on the Democrats that the Vietnam War wasn't exactly their finest hour." Goldberg adds, "The Democratic pickle is exquisitely simple: In the past election, they ran as the anti-war party and promised to bring the war to a close, but, like the dog who finally catches the car fender, they're at a loss about what to do now. As Virginia's Rep. Jim Moran says of his fellow Democrats, they 'want to make sure this is still…Bush's war,' but the only way they can end the war is to take possession of it. The Democratic base thinks that'd be fine. But, one gets the sense, someone in the party's leadership understands that might be a problem." If Bush's "surge is successful, odds are Americans will think it was all worth it. If, on the other hand, the Democrats are successful at ending the war in defeat, it's not at all clear Americans will see our loss as the unambiguous triumph Kennedy remembers in Vietnam. Nor is it clear they'll congratulate Democrats for securing a sure defeat rather than chancing a possible victory."

As Security Crackdown Continues, Suicide Bomb Kills 20 In Baghdad. The CBS Evening News (3/5, story 4, 2:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported that in Iraq yesterday, "a suicide car bomb went off in an area of the city known for its bookstores. At least 20 Iraqis were killed in the explosion which left bloody papers scattered everywhere." Meanwhile, "the security crackdown in Baghdad is now entering a new phase. US and Iraqi forces have been moving into the section known as Sadr City, home to two million people, and controlled by a radical Shiite militia."

NBC Nightly News (3/5, story 2, 2:50, Engel, 9.87M) said "Sadr City has been one of the most dangerous neighborhoods in all of Baghdad, completely out of government control. Today I went in with US forces trying to take it back. Soldiers from the 82nd Airborne today mounted up. And braced for what has been a no go zone for American forces. Sadr City. The last time US troops entered this Shiite slum of two million 2 1/2 years ago, they battled the Shiite militia, the Mahdi Army, for weeks. What the soldiers found today surprised them, no resistance. … The big question is, are they just regrouping, waiting to return?"

NBC Nightly News (3/5, lead story, 4:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "We have brought this broadcast back to Iraq for these next several days to see up close and once again the conflict that is quickly becoming the story of our times. And the story here, it is plain to see, is changing. There was violence here in Baghdad today, but the war we found at an outpost to the west of here today was different." The attack in Baghdad "comes during a period of change here. There are now pockets of relative peace where there had been awful ongoing violence." NBC Nightly News (3/5, story 8, 3:20, Williams, 9.87M) later reported, "Retired Army General, four-star General that is, Wayne Downing is with me on this trip, just as he was with me in Iraq for the initial invasion." Gen. Wayne Downing said, "One of the things that is striking is you didn't see a lot of children out waving, you didn't see people out working like that. So, I think that reflects the fact than not only the US forces are cracking down, but we saw a lot of Iraqi police and Iraqi army. They are right now breaking the grip of Al Qaeda. That is an Al Qaeda area that we were in today."

The Los Angeles Times (3/6, Berthelsen, 850K) says the suicide bombing "was the latest to underscore the difficulty faced by US and Iraqi forces as they try to stem sectarian violence here, and it raised questions about how long certain factions, such as Shiite Muslim militias, would continue to comply with the new security plan before taking revenge." Also, "around the capital Monday, police found the bodies of 25 men who had been shot to death, a number higher than in recent days and approaching the pre-crackdown average." The Times adds, "Since the operation was launched Feb. 13, it has seen some success in reducing such death squad killings, which are believed to be the work of Shiite militias."

The New York Times (3/6, Wong, Habeeb, 1.16M) reports, "The bombing was the latest of a half-dozen major blasts aimed at civilians in the capital in the three weeks since the Iraqi government and American military announced the start of a new Baghdad security drive. The number of gunshot killings attributed to sectarian death squads appears to have dropped as militia leaders have ordered their followers to lie low. But deadly bombings have continued with ferocity." The Times adds, "American officials have said they are still struggling to tamp down the bombings and intend to bring thousands of additional troops into Baghdad in the next two months."

The Washington Post (3/6, A10, Raghavan, 690K) reports, "For many victims, the attack brought questions about the effectiveness of a new security crackdown that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has already declared a success. Nearly three weeks after its launch, the number of violent attacks has dipped, but bombings continue to plague Baghdad." The Washington Times/AP (3/6, Frayer) runs a similar report.

Nine US Soldiers Killed In Iraq Bombings Today. The AP (3/6) reports, "Nine U.S. soldiers died in two separate incidents north of Baghdad, the military said Tuesday. Six soldiers were killed when a bomb exploded near their vehicles during a combat operation Monday in Salahuddin province, the military said in a statement. ... In another incident the same day, three more soldiers were killed by a roadside bomb in Diyala province, another statement said. ... All nine were assigned to Task Force Lightning."

US Focuses On "Microfinance Projects" In Effort To Stimulate Iraqi Economy. USA Today (3/6, 5A, Dorell, 2.27M) reports, "As U.S. military and civilian officials try to help Iraq's economy rebuild, they are placing a new emphasis on small businesses," and "through grants and loans -- often for a few hundred dollars each -- they're trying to stimulate job growth and eventually improve Iraq's security. So-called microfinance projects have proved more efficient at creating jobs than large-scale, multibillion-dollar reconstruction efforts, says Eric Nigh, executive director of the Iraqi-American Chamber of Commerce and Industry." USA Today adds, "Large infrastructure projects, such as power plants, required enormous spending on workers' security, says Ra'ad Omar, chief executive of the chamber. He said Iraqi contractors tended to invest their profits in real estate abroad rather than reinvest them at home. Many owners of larger Iraqi companies eventually left the country because of security issues."

Gogdanos Says US Soldiers Should Be Assigned To "Protecting Cultural Property." Matthew Bogdanos, a colonel in the Marine Reserves and an assistant district attorney in Manhattan, writes in the New York Times (3/6, 1.16M) that "it's a pretty tough sell to ask people to care about a bunch of old rocks with funny writing." But "the plunder of Iraq's 10,000 poorly guarded archaeological sites not only deprives future generations of incomparable works of art, but also finances the insurgents. … And what if Americans understood that our failure to appreciate the importance Iraqis place on their history has added to the chaos faced by our troops?" Bogdanos adds, "The lesson for the United States is that we must never again cede the moral high ground on cultural issues like this one. In advance of any future military action, we should assign units the task of protecting cultural property. And all troops scheduled to deploy overseas should receive cultural awareness training; the Archaeological Institute of America has already conducted some seminars at Camp Lejeune in North Carolina."

US Strike Accidentally Kills Nine Civilians. The CBS Evening News (3/5, story 5, :25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "In Afghanistan, for the second day in a row, civilians were caught in the crossfire as NATO forces targeted militants. A NATO air strike north of Kabul last night killed nine people, including four young children. The bombs destroyed their family's mud brick home. The US military says the strike was meant to target insurgents who had attacked an American air base."

The New York Times (3/6, Gall, Wafa, 1.16M) reports "a local representative of the provincial council, Suraya Bahadur, who comes from Nejarab district, where the bombing happened, condemned it. 'I condemn both the suicide attacks and the rocket attacks by the enemy of Afghanistan, and also I condemn these type of mistakes,' by American and NATO forces, she said. 'We never want our civilian people to be killed.'" John Sifton, "a senior researcher at Human Rights Watch, which is based in New York, also expressed concern about the level of force." The Washington Post (3/6, A10, Witte, 690K) and Washington Times/AP (3/6, Shah) also report the story.

UN Official Says Afghanistan Could Have Record Opium Crop. The New York Times (3/6, Gall, 1.16M) reports, "Afghanistan's opium harvest could be bigger than last year's record crop, with nearly half of the provinces showing an increase in planting this year, the director of the United Nations Office for Drugs and Crime said here Monday." His office "released an assessment of winter planting trends, which shows an increase in 15 provinces, no change in 6 provinces, and a decrease in 7 provinces. Six of Afghanistan's 34 provinces have no poppies, the study said."

New Intelligence Sparks Renewed Effort To Catch Bin Laden. ABC News' online blog "The Blotter" (3/6, Ross) reports, "Armed with fresh intelligence, the CIA is moving additional man power and equipment into Pakistan in the effort to find Osama bin Laden and his deputy Ayman al Zawahri, US officials tell ABC News. 'Reports that the trail has gone stone cold are not correct,' said one U.S. official. 'We are very much increasing our efforts there,' the official said." ABC adds, "People familiar with the CIA operation say undercover officers with paramilitary training have been ordered into Pakistan and the area across the border with Afghanistan as part of the ramp-up. … Although never publicly acknowledged, Pakistan has permitted CIA teams to secretly operate inside Pakistan."

DOJ:

Rep. Wilson Says She Complained About Dismissed US Attorney. In a day of fast-moving developments in the widening controversy over the dismissal of several US Attorneys, media coverage focused on several aspects of the controversy. The AP (3/6, Kellman) reports, "The probe into the Bush administration's firings of U.S. attorneys intensified Monday as lawmakers ordered two more ousted officials to tell their stories and the Justice Department said Republican Sen. Pete Domenici had complained repeatedly to the attorney general about one prosecutor." The AP continues, "A second lawmaker from New Mexico, GOP Rep. Heather Wilson, acknowledged that she, too, had complained to the same prosecutor about the slow pace of an investigation. Like Domenici, she denied pressuring the U.S. attorney in her state." The AP adds, "The administration has said eight prosecutors were told to leave, all but one for performance-related reasons. However, Democrats have suggested ever more pointedly that politics was behind many of the dismissals, and the Domenici revelation fueled that idea. … Six of those fired, meanwhile, issued a stiff defense of their conduct and implied that they had had differences with Justice Department officials in Washington. … 'We leave with no regrets, because we served well and upheld the best traditions of the Department of Justice,' the group said in a joint statement released in advance of a Tuesday hearing by a House subcommittee." The AP notes, "The Justice Department, besieged by charges of cronyism, acknowledged that lawmakers — both Republican and Democratic — had complained about several of the eight. … One, David Iglesias of New Mexico, was the subject of four phone calls from Domenici to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and his deputy questioning whether the prosecutor was 'up to the job,' department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said. … It's unclear whether Iglesias was aware of the senator's calls to the Justice Department, but he knew of Domenici's interest in his work. Domenici said over the weekend that he had called the prosecutor in October 2006 to ask about the progress of a probe into an alleged Democratic kickback scheme. … Iglesias has said he received calls from two lawmakers — he has not named them publicly — who inquired about the case. He said that he felt pressured by them to rush indictments before the November elections."

USA Today (3/6, Johnson) reports, "Congressional inquiries into the Bush administration's dismissal of eight federal prosecutors deepened Monday, as the House Judiciary Committee announced it would seek subpoenas for two more of the prosecutors." USA continues, "The panel now plans to hear from as many as six of the ousted prosecutors today, and several of them are likely to also appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee. Both panels are investigating whether the administration unfairly dismissed the eight prosecutors — who serve at the pleasure of the president — as political retaliation for their investigative activities. … The House panel's announcement said it would seek testimony from former U.S. attorneys Daniel Bogden of Nevada and Paul Charlton of Arizona. Previously scheduled to testify today were former U.S. attorneys H.E. 'Bud' Cummins of Arkansas, David Iglesias of New Mexico, Carol Lam of Southern California and John McKay of Washington state." USA adds "Administration officials, including Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, have said that all but one of the firings were related to the prosecutors' performance. Last month, McNulty told the Senate panel that Cummins was removed so he could be replaced by an ex-aide to White House political director Karl Rove. … Since then, the Senate panel has disclosed that Justice had issued generally favorable evaluations of all of the fired prosecutors. And Iglesias, the former U.S. attorney in New Mexico, has said that before he was dismissed in December he was contacted by two unidentified members of Congress who asked about the status of corruption probe looking at Democrats."

The Financial Times (3/6, Masters) reports, "Brian Roehrkasse, DoJ spokesman, said Mr Domenici had complained four times to top officials there about Mr Iglesias but never mentioned the corruption investigation. … 'Any suggestion that any US attorney was removed to inappropriately interfere with any investigation is plainly wrong and ill-conceived,' he said. 'These decisions were based on the individual concerns of each US attorney about their overall performance . . . [including] ineffectively prosecuting departmental priorities areas, failure to follow departmental guidelines or just an inability to lead.'"

ABC News (3/6, Wolf) reports, "The topic of conversation between Iglesias and Domenici was a corruption investigation Iglesias was conducting into an alleged kickback scheme involving New Mexico Democrats. … But the substance of that call is up for debate. Domenici, who admits to placing the call, said he was just interested in the timeframe for any potential indictments stemming from the investigation." ABC adds, "Iglesias, however, has said he felt violated by the call and sensed pressure to bring indictments sooner than he wanted to -- before the November election. The indictments never came. And last week Iglesias was fired by the Department of Justice. … Justice Department spokesmen have said Iglesias was among the attorneys let go because of poor performance."

Gonzales Defends Dismissals. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A4, Perez) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, facing criticism for the firing of eight U.S. attorneys, defended the action as appropriate but said the Justice Department handled the situation poorly. … 'We could have rolled out the decisions more smoothly,' he said in an interview. But he also rejected accusations from Democrats and other critics that the prosecutors were fired for failing to follow the Bush administration's political agenda. … 'To think we made these changes to retaliate or because they didn't carry out certain prosecutions?' he said. 'That did not occur here. I stand by the decision to make the changes.'" The Journal continues, "The tempest has been the latest imbroglio for the Justice Department and Mr. Gonzales, a longtime Bush friend and former White House counsel who has defended the administration's often-controversial law-enforcement programs, from domestic surveillance to the treatment of enemy combatants. … Part of the problem is the Justice Department's contention that the Dec. 7 dismissals were performance related, which came after initial suggestions that the moves were normal turnover. That switch has prompted protests from some of those let go. Some have taken to referring to the firings as the "Pearl Harbor Day Massacre." And some of have said they wouldn't have protested the moves otherwise. … Internal Justice Department documents, reviewed by The Wall Street Journal, show evaluations offering positive reviews for all the prosecutors' work as recently as last March. Mr. Gonzales said the written reviews were among several factors the department used to evaluate prosecutors, which include numbers and types of prosecutions and management issues. … Mr. Gonzales denied any political motivation for the moves. 'I made recommendations to the president' that the changes be made, he said. 'Ultimately, these are presidential appointees.'"

Wilson Complained About Pace Of Iglesias Probes. The Washington Post (3/6, A1, Kane, Eggen) reports, "Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.) acknowledged yesterday that she contacted a federal prosecutor to complain about the pace of his public corruption investigations, as the Senate ethics committee signaled that it had opened a preliminary inquiry into a similar communication by her state's senior senator, Pete V. Domenici (R)." The Post continues, "Wilson denied allegations from former New Mexico U.S. Attorney David C. Iglesias that she pressured him to speed up a political corruption investigation involving Democrats in the waning days of her tight election campaign last fall. … 'I did not ask about the timing of any indictments and I did not tell Mr. Iglesias what course of action I thought he should take or pressure him in any way,' Wilson said in a statement to The Washington Post. 'The conversation was brief and professional.'" The Post adds, "Iglesias…is expected to tell Congress today that Wilson and Domenici were trying to sway the course of his investigation. Domenici acknowledged Sunday that he called Iglesias about the corruption case but said he did not pressure him. The telephone calls to Iglesias by Domenici and Wilson appear to put them in conflict with congressional ethics rules that bar contacts with federal agency officials during most active investigations." The Post adds, "Iglesias and three other ousted prosecutors are scheduled to appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee this morning. The same group and two others are slated to testify in the afternoon before a House Judiciary subcommittee. … The Senate Ethics Committee released a statement yesterday evening declining to address the allegations against Domenici, but it said that anytime a legitimate complaint is filed against a senator, a preliminary inquiry is begun. The statement, from the chairwoman, Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), and Sen. John Cornyn (Tex.), the committee's ranking Republican, noted that preliminary inquiries can lead to wider investigations." The Post notes, "Wilson said in her statement that many of her constituents had complained about "the slow pace of federal prosecutions" in corruption cases and that one unidentified constituent told her that 'Iglesias was intentionally delaying corruption investigations.' … Wilson also said she was trying to help Iglesias. 'If the purpose of my call has somehow been misperceived, I am sorry for any confusion. I thought it was important for Mr. Iglesias to receive this information and, if necessary, have the opportunity to clear his name.' … Wilson said Iglesias's dismissal occurred 'without input from me.' Justice officials said they are not aware of any contacts by Wilson about Iglesias. But they said Sunday that Domenici complained about him to Gonzales three times in 2005 and 2006 and spoke to Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty in the first week of October 2006."

Democrats Say DOJ Withholding Information On Dismissals. The Washington Times (3/6, Pfeiffer) reports, "Congressional Democrats say half a dozen former federal prosecutors were fired by the Bush administration for political reasons, and they're accusing the Justice Department of withholding information related to the dismissals. … 'Eleven months after the firings, we still haven't gotten straight answers from the Department of Justice, which changed its own story this weekend and admitted the firings weren't based on job performance,' said Rep. Linda T. Sanchez, California Democrat and chairman of the House Judiciary subcommittee on commercial and administrative law." The Times continues, "Both the House and Senate Judiciary committees will hold hearings today with the six former prosecutors. … Supporters of the administration's policy say the firings were not done improperly. U.S. attorneys have four-year terms, but can be removed or replaced at any time, and for nearly any reason, according to federal law. … 'We ought to not lose sight of the fact that president has the power to replace them,' said Sen. Arlen Specter, the ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee. 'He doesn't have to have a reason. If it is a bad reason, that is different.' … The Pennsylvania Republican added he would listen to the Democrats' accusations of improper firings." The Times notes, "Democrats have specifically cited the case of former prosecutor Carol Lam of San Diego, who prosecuted former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, California Republican. Cunningham resigned from office last year after pleading guilty to bribery charges in connection to a case involving military contractors. Cunningham received an eight-year sentence. … Mrs. Lam, who was appointed by Mr. Bush in 2002, was fired after the Justice Department issued a request for her dismissal in January. According to the Justice Department, Mrs. Lam was fired for not aggressively pursuing the prosecution of border crimes. … The other five former U.S. attorneys scheduled to testify today include Daniel Bogden of Las Vegas, Paul K. Charlton of Phoenix, Bud Cummins of Little Rock, Ark., David C. Iglesias of Albuquerque, N.M., and John McKay of Seattle."

DOJ Official Said To Have Threatened Dismissed US Attorney. McClatchy Newspapers (3/6, Taylor) reports, "A high-ranking Justice Department official told one of the U.S. attorneys fired by the Bush administration that if any of them continued to criticize the administration for their ousters, previously undisclosed details about the reasons they were fired might be released, two of the ousted prosecutors told McClatchy Newspapers." McClatchy continues, "While the U.S. attorney who got the call regarded the tone of the conversation as congenial, not intimidating, the prosecutor nonetheless passed the message on to five other fired U.S. attorneys. One of them interpreted the reported comments by Michael Elston, the chief of staff to Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, as a threat." McClatchy adds, "Justice Department officials denied that the conversation with the U.S. attorney ever took place, and Elston said he called several of the fired U.S. attorneys but never made any such comments. … 'I had no conversation in which I discussed with any U.S. attorney what they should or should not say to the media regarding their removal,' Elston said. … The two prosecutors who described the call demanded anonymity because, they said, they didn't want to antagonize the Justice Department further." McClatchy notes, "Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse criticized McClatchy for running the story. 'It is unfortunate that the press would choose to run an allegation from an anonymous source from a conversation that never took place,' he said." McClatchy adds, "According to one of the fired U.S. attorneys, Elston made the comments during a telephone conversation after Democrats began questioning whether the administration was attempting to purge more independent-minded Republican appointees in order to replace them with more partisan candidates. … According to the former U.S. attorney, Elston made a 'pointed comment that indicated that somehow anyone who talked might become more embarrassed if the story continued on.'"

DOJ Official Who Told US Attorneys Of Dismissal Quits. The New York Times (3/6, Johnston) reports, "The Justice Department official who told seven United States attorneys in December that they were being dismissed said Monday that he was resigning." The Times continues, "Michael A. Battle, director of the Executive Office for United States Attorneys, said in a statement that his departure was unrelated to the dismissals, but Democrats said he appeared to be a casualty of the uproar over the firings. … Mr. Battle, formerly a United States attorney in Buffalo, is not believed to have played a significant role in the decision to remove the United States attorneys, although Justice Department officials said he had accepted it." The Times adds, "Mr. Battle said in his statement that he had been planning to leave the agency since last June. … But Democrats in Congress said the timing of his departure, on March 16, appeared unusual."

The Hill (3/6, Schor, Crabtree) reports, "The circumstances surrounding Battle's departure add to questions Democrats plan to ask about whether politics played any role in the firings of seven U.S. attorneys, some of whom were pursuing public-corruption cases against GOP lawmakers. The House and Senate Judiciary committees will hold hearings featuring the testimony of several of the fired U.S. attorneys today to investigate the matter." The Hill continues, "A Department of Justice staffer said only that the public-affairs office planned to send out a statement about Battle's resignation; it did not do so by press time yesterday. … House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) and Judiciary Subcommittee on Commercial and Administrative Law Chairwoman Linda Sánchez (D-Calif.) vowed to 'do everything in their power to unearth the facts surrounding Battle's resignation.' … 'The wheels seem to be coming off the Bush administration's increasingly hollow defense of its decision to fire eight U.S. attorneys,' Sánchez said. 'The administration's explanation of Mr. Battle's apparent resignation is as murky as everything else they have told us about this case.'"

Former Maryland US Attorney Says He Was Pressured To Resign. The New York Times (3/6, Lichtblau) reports, "The former federal prosecutor in Maryland said Monday that he was forced out in early 2005 because of political pressure stemming from public corruption investigations involving associates of the state's governor, a Republican. … 'There was direct pressure not to pursue these investigations,' said the former prosecutor, Thomas M. DiBiagio. 'The practical impact was to intimidate my office and shut down the investigations.'" The Times continues, "Mr. DiBiagio, a controversial figure who clashed with a number of Maryland politicians, had never publicly discussed the reasons behind his departure. But he agreed to an interview with The New York Times because he said he was concerned about what he saw as similarities with the recent firings of eight United States attorneys. … As in those cases, there are conflicting accounts of the circumstances that led to Mr. DiBiagio's ouster. The Justice Department disputes his version. … His office had been looking into whether associates of Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. had improperly funneled money from gambling interests to promote legalized slot machines in Maryland. Mr. DiBiagio said that several prominent Maryland Republicans had pressed him to back away from the inquiries and that one conversation had so troubled him that he reported it to an F.B.I. official as a threat. … But he said that the Justice Department had offered little support and that that made it 'impossible for me to stay.'" The Times notes, "Several current and former officials in the Baltimore office said Mr. DiBiagio voiced concerns in 2004 that the corruption inquiries were jeopardizing his career, a view that they shared. … The Justice Department rejected Mr. DiBiagio's explanation. An official in the department, David Margolis, said he told Mr. DiBiagio in 2004 that he had to leave because 'we had lost confidence in him.' … Mr. Margolis said the prosecutor's harsh management style had caused resentments in the office that ran 'wide and deep' and called 'an absolute fairy tale' the idea that Mr. DiBiagio's departure was tied to the gambling case or any other investigation."

Testimony Could Spark Ethics Probes. Roll Call (3/6, Van Dongen) reports, "A pair of Judiciary panel hearings today featuring testimony from at least four U.S. attorneys who were summarily fired by the Justice Department could spark the first major ethics probes of the 110th Congress." Roll Call continues, "The star witness at this morning's Senate Judiciary hearing and this afternoon's House Judiciary session will be ousted U.S. Attorney for New Mexico David Iglesias, who has told various media outlets that two New Mexico lawmakers contacted him in mid-October 2006 to inquire about the pace of an ongoing corruption probe of local Democrats. … Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) already has admitted to, and apologized for, making a phone call to Iglesias in mid-October. But Domenici denied doing anything improper, saying in a statement over the weekend that 'at no time in that conversation ... did I ever tell [Iglesias] what course of action I thought he should take on any legal matter.'" Roll Call adds, "On Monday, ethics attorneys off Capitol Hill said that Domenici's behavior involved seriously suspect activity and could result in Senate Ethics Committee action, a major investigation by the Justice Department or even an independent counsel. … 'Having been in Washington for 35 years, I'm sure we're headed to a full-blown obstruction investigation of some variety that will involve not only the Members of Congress but the Justice Department itself,' said Stan Brand, a former House general counsel who now works at Brand Law Group. … 'This isn't some rulemaking, this is serious stuff and I don't know where it ends or what the outcome is, but it's going to have to be investigated,' Brand added." Roll Call notes, "The Domenici revelations further fuel Democratic charges that there has been improper political interference by the Bush administration in judicial proceedings. They say at least seven U.S. attorneys were unfairly fired for political reasons and are set to be replaced with political cronies. The Justice Department maintains that the seven — with the exception of Bud Cummins III, the ex-U.S. attorney for Eastern Arkansas — were dismissed for 'performance based' reasons. … 'More than any other Justice Department officials, U.S. attorneys must be above reproach,' said Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), who will chair today's Senate Judiciary hearing. 'Today's revelations call into serious question whether they allowed such independence in this administration.' … Schumer also questioned the timing of the imminent departure from the Justice Department of Mike Battle, the director of the executive office of U.S. attorneys. … 'This raises another question about a subject where there are already too many unanswered questions,' Schumer charged."

The Los Angeles Times (3/6, Serrano) reports that "a left-leaning congressional watchdog group on Monday called for a Senate ethics investigation into Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) for allegedly interfering with the work of the U.S. attorney in his state. That would be a violation of Senate rules. And the Justice Department revealed Monday that Domenici telephoned Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales or his deputy four times in the last two years to complain about the U.S. attorney in New Mexico, David Iglesias, and whether he was 'up for the job.'" The Times continues, "The Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, which characterizes itself as progressive, filed a formal complaint Monday against Domenici, asking the Senate Select Committee on Ethics to investigate. 'He appears to have violated the prohibition on contacting agencies based on political considerations,' said the watchdog group's executive director, Melanie Sloan. … But others wonder if it isn't the Democrats who are playing politics. … William B. Canfield, a conservative lawyer and a former Senate ethics committee staffer, said that Domenici, a senator since 1973, would be 'too sophisticated a guy to have said anything to suggest he was improperly leaning on the U.S. attorney.' … 'U.S. attorneys probably take phone calls from members on a regular basis,' Canfield added. 'And there's nothing in the ethics rules in the Senate that says you can't make calls for a status report on where an investigation is going.'"

Yang Says Her Departure Was Unrelated To Dismissals. The Hill (3/6, Crabtree) reports, "A former U.S. attorney for Los Angeles, Debra Wong Yang, dismissed questions about the timing of her departure, which occurred about a month before several other U.S. attorneys were fired late last year." The Hill continues, "Wong Yang was heading up the investigation into Rep. Jerry Lewis's (R-Calif.) ties to a lobbying firm and the millions of dollars in contracts the firm's clients received from Congress. Wong Yang, the first Asian-American woman to serve as a U.S. attorney, left her post with Justice to become a partner at Gibson, Dunn and Crutcher, the law firm representing Lewis. She will co-chair the firm's crisis-management practice group, along with Washington, D.C., partner Theodore B. Olson, a former Bush administration solicitor general. … Wong Yang said her departure was a personal decision based on financial concerns and the fact that she is a single mother, and had nothing to do with the firings of other U.S. attorneys. She also said her departure would not affect the case against Lewis in any way, noting that the Justice Department said it would have allowed her to stay in the position 'as long as I wanted to.' … 'The investigation [into Lewis] would never be delayed or affected in any way because of my departure,' she said. 'We had 260 attorneys in that office.'"

Issa To Testify About Lam Dismissal. The North County Times (3/6, Bennett) reports, "U.S. Rep. Darrell Issa will testify Tuesday at one of two congressional hearings addressing the firing of former San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam and a handful of other U.S. attorneys." The Times continues, "The hearings come in the wake of pressure from Democrats who have raised questions about whether the recent sacking of Lam and the other U.S. attorneys was politically motivated. … Issa has been one of the chief critics of the Yale-educated Lam, who left her post on Feb. 15 after being asked to resign in December. Issa criticized Lam for what he saw as a failure to prosecute illegal immigrant smugglers." The Times adds, "Issa said Monday that Lam lost her job because she failed to fulfill part of her mandate. … 'Clearly she needed to be fired for not implementing policy over a long period of time,' the Vista Republican said during a telephone interview. Issa's 49th District covers much of northern North County and Southwest Riverside County. … Starting in early 2004, Issa and other Republican members of Congress began sending letters to Lam and the attorney general's office complaining about the job she was doing. … Issa, who will testify before a House panel, said he takes 'maybe one twentieth' of the credit for Lam's dismissal, adding that he believes that California Democratic U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein also played a role. … On Monday, Issa's office sent to the North County Times a copy of a June letter from Feinstein to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in which Feinstein expressed concerns about the low rate of human smuggler prosecutions by Lam's office. … A spokeswoman for Gonzales said privacy issues prevented her from talking about performance review details but confirmed Issa's position that the San Diego office had the lowest number of prosecutions of any U.S. attorney's office on the Southwest border. … The spokeswoman, Tasia Scolinos, also said the performance reviews Feinstein referred to evaluated the U.S. attorneys' offices as a whole and 'not necessarily ... the U.S. attorneys themselves.'"

Formerly Low-Profile Iglesias Now At Center Of Controversy. The Albuquerque Tribune (3/6, Gisick) reports, "Low-profile during his five years as New Mexico's U.S. attorney, David Iglesias now finds himself at the center a growing national controversy." The Tribune continues, "Although no member of the New Mexico delegation sits on the two congressional committees that will interview Iglesias and other dismissed U.S. attorneys Tuesday, Republicans are expected to ask tough questions about Iglesias' tenure. … Democrats say they believe Iglesias and other federal prosecutors were political victims, and want to know more." The Tribune adds, "In a written statement this weekend, Domenici apologized for his October phone call to Iglesias, then said he had been concerned for several years about the slow pace of prosecutions. … 'New Mexico needed a new U.S. attorney,' Domenici concluded."

More Commentary. The Washington Post (3/6, A18) editorializes, "When members of Congress call, people listen -- especially if those people are political appointees who owe their positions in part to support from the lawmaker at the other end of the line. That is why the phone calls made to David C. Iglesias, the since-replaced U.S. attorney in New Mexico, by home-state Republicans Sen. Pete V. Domenici and Rep. Heather A. Wilson are so troubling. The Senate and House ethics committees have a duty to investigate." The Post continues, "Mr. Iglesias should have reported the lawmakers' phone calls to the Justice Department in Washington, as protocol dictates. He is to testify on Capitol Hill about the calls today. That may be illuminating. But more urgent is for the Justice Department to stop hiding behind vague assertions of 'performance-related issues' and explain, finally and clearly, why Mr. Iglesias and seven other U.S. attorneys were dismissed."

In a piece posted on Slate.com (3/6), Dahlia Lithwick writes, "The U.S. attorneys purge scandal is heating up. The House and Senate have convened hearings for Tuesday, promising an orgy of named names and pointed fingers. Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., now admits what he once denied: that he may have had a hand in the removal of New Mexico's U.S. attorney. And the senior Justice Department official who personally canned the U.S. attorneys has just announced the date of his resignation. … But as the political scandal spreads, the question at its heart gets less and less public attention: Who changed the Patriot Act to make it easier to replace U.S. attorneys without oversight, and how did it happen with nobody looking?" Lithwick continues, "U.S. attorneys are well aware that they serve at the president's pleasure, but new wording in the Patriot Act made it worth the president's while to fire a big, fat lot of them and hire a group of new ones. And while certainly half the scandal is that the Justice Department did that—let eight U.S. attorneys go, seemingly for no reason—we seem to have forgotten that even without the mass firings, this law had been changed in the sneakiest way imaginable. … On Feb. 6, when the Senate held hearings on the issue of prosecutorial independence, former judiciary committee Chairman Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., proudly claimed to have been as clueless as the rest of us. Denying New York Democratic Sen. Charles Schumer's claim that he or his staff had 'slipped the new provision into the Patriot Act in the dead of night,' Specter asserted, 'The first I found out about the change in the Patriot Act occurred a few weeks ago when Sen. [Dianne] Feinstein approached me on the floor.' … Specter added that he only looked into how the provision was altered after Feinstein told him about it. As he explained, 'I then contacted my very able chief counsel, Michael O'Neill, to find out exactly what had happened. And Mr. O'Neill advised me that the requested change had come from the Department of Justice, that it had been handled by Brett Tolman, who is now the U.S. attorney for Utah, and that the change had been requested by the Department of Justice because there had been difficulty with the replacement of a U.S. attorney in South Dakota.'" Lithwick adds, "Thus, at least according to Specter, O'Neill had merely been following orders from the Department of Justice when he snuck new language into the Patriot Act that would consolidate executive branch authority. … Now, it's not necessarily outrageous that Sen. Specter didn't know what his subordinate slipped into the legislation. … But this was not some minor technical amendment. It was a substantial enhancement of executive power. So, Specter now finds himself in an exceedingly strange position: His staff either lied to him or misled him about what he acknowledges to be a significant legal change."

In a column for the Washington Post (3/6, A19), Eugene Robinson writes, "So this is what accountability looks, sounds and feels like. It's been so long -- since George W. Bush moved into the White House -- that we hardly recognize what used to be a commonplace phenomenon, as much a part of Washington's behavioral DNA as megalomania and mendacity." Robinson continues, "This administration's nonchalance about its most grievous transgressions has been stunning, and the only inference that fits the facts is that the people running our government don't really believe in government at all. They certainly haven't taken it seriously." Robinson adds, "Before Gates arrived, it was awfully difficult to get fired by this administration for failing to do your job. Brown hardly counts, since he never should have been hired in the first place. Donald Rumsfeld presided over the Iraq war mess for years before his policies were essentially rejected by the American people last November. Generally, though, incompetence has not been a firing offense. … Political incorrectness, on the other hand, seems to be more than enough to get you shoved aside. … In December, the Justice Department fired eight U.S. attorneys -- top federal prosecutors -- in New Mexico, Arizona, Nevada, California, Washington and Arkansas. The administration acknowledges that one of the prosecutors, Bud Cummins of Little Rock, was ousted so his job could be given to a former aide to White House political czar Karl Rove. Hey, what's wrong with that? … Another of the fired prosecutors, David C. Iglesias, said he was being pressured by two members of Congress to speed up a criminal investigation that involved a Democratic legislator. The pressure came last fall, before the midterm election, Iglesias said. Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) admitted on Sunday that he called Iglesias and asked about the investigation, saying he was looking for 'an idea of what time frame we were looking at' -- but he denies pressuring Iglesias. … The White House acknowledges that complaints from members of Congress factored into the decision to fire the prosecutors, who say they had no prior indication of unhappiness with their performance."

The Los Angeles Times (3/6) editorializes, "Last month, Deputy Atty. Gen. Paul J. McNulty assured the Senate Judiciary Committee that none of the removals were designed to thwart ongoing investigations or to punish prosecutors for investigating public corruption. At the same hearing, McNulty said that the firings were 'performance related.' Yet some of the dismissed prosecutors had received positive evaluations. This seeming contradiction needs to be cleared up, not just by Congress but by the Justice Department's inspector general. … That said, we continue to oppose a proposal by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) that would return to federal judges the power to appoint interim U.S. attorneys. The bill is grounded in a suspicion that the Bush Justice Department wants to install cronies in U.S. attorneys' jobs indefinitely and without Senate confirmation — a claim the administration denies and must now refute with prompt presidential nominations subject to Senate confirmation." The Times adds, "Even after being approved by the Senate, a U.S. attorney — like a member of the Cabinet — is an officer of the executive branch who under our system of government can be removed by the president at a moment's notice. Congress has no business asking whether such dismissals are wise, but it has every right to determine whether they are intended to thwart or politicize the administration of justice. That question should be the focus of today's hearings."

The Houston Chronicle (3/6) editorializes, "The unprecedented dismissal of eight top U.S. prosecutors at the behest of the White House late last year finally is getting the attention it deserves. House and Senate judiciary committees are preparing to question the ousted U.S. attorneys." The Chronicle continues, "There are indications the purge was anything but the routine bureaucratic shuffle claimed by Justice Department spokesmen. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' deputies gave conflicting explanations as to why the officials were forced to resign. … All of the ousted attorneys are Bush appointees, with good records as prosecutors. McNulty testified at a congressional hearing that the shake-up occurred because of performance-related issues, but he was mistaken. Most of the attorneys' personnel evaluations turned out to be highly complimentary." The Chronicle aedds, "The most innocuous explanation for the mass firing is that White House officials simply wanted to create vacancies so cronies could burnish their resumés during the closing years of Bush's presidency. … Considering that at least one of the dismissed prosecutors was highly effective in bringing corruption cases against high-ranking Republicans, partisan revenge probably played a role in some of the firings. … Getting rid of dedicated federal prosecutors in order to dispense their jobs as short-term plums places patronage above justice. If some government attorneys were dismissed in order to derail or speed up investigations for partisan gain, such conduct borders on the criminal."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

High Court Turns Down Ebbers Appeal. The AP (3/6) reports, "The Supreme Court turned down an appeal Monday from former WorldCom chief Bernard Ebbers, who is serving a 25-year prison sentence for fraud and conspiracy." The AP continues, "The justices rejected without comment Ebbers' bid for review of his 2005 conviction based on his contention that he was denied a fair trial. … Ebbers argued in court papers that the trial judge improperly allowed prosecutors to use testimony from witnesses who had been given immunity, but denied immunity to potential defense witnesses. … The judge also instructed jurors that they could find Ebbers guilty if they believed he suspected a crime was being committed but intentionally looked the other way." The AP adds, "A federal appeals court upheld the conviction last year, acknowledging that Ebbers' sentence for a white-collar crime was longer than sentences routinely imposed by many states for violent crimes. The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said Ebbers' actions to hide WorldCom's financial problems were substantial and had cost investors dearly. … Ebbers was convicted for his role in the massive fraud that drove Clinton, Miss.-based WorldCom into bankruptcy in 2002."

Canadian Holding Company Pleads Guilty In Hollinger Fraud Case. The AP (3/6, Robinson) reports from Chicago, "A private Canadian holding company used by former media baron Conrad Black to control the Hollinger International newspaper publishing empire pleaded guilty Monday to defrauding Hollinger." The AP continues, "Toronto-based Ravelston Inc. entered its plea to a single count of mail fraud as lawyers for Black and the federal government prepared to start jury selection March 14 for his racketeering and fraud trial. … Black, 62, and three other former Hollinger executives are charged with plundering $80 million from Hollinger, mainly by selling off hundreds of community newspapers across the United States and Canada." The AP adds, "Black allegedly received sizable payments from the buyers in exchange for signing agreements not to compete with them by starting or buying newspapers in markets where the ones sold by Hollinger were circulating. … Prosecutors say the non-compete money should have gone to Hollinger shareholders and not into the pockets of Black and other executives. … Black and the three other executives have pleaded not guilty and vowed to fight the charges." The AP notes, "Ravelston had been trying for weeks to plead guilty, but the company was blocked until last week in a Canadian court from going ahead with the plea. … Black owns 65.1 percent of Ravelston and had sought to block the plea. But the company is in receivership and the receiver, who is responsible to the creditors, won permission from a Canadian court last week to go ahead and plead guilty."

Prosecutors Face Deadline In Stock Option Backdating Cases. The San Jose Mercury News (3/6, Wolverton) reports, "Federal prosecutors investigating the backdating of stock options are bumping up against a legal deadline that will probably affect when they file charges and what charges they bring." The News continues, "Under federal law, prosecutors typically have five years to bring charges of securities fraud. For many of the backdating cases, that time window could be closing, because the misdating of stock options largely ended in 2002 thanks to new regulations. … 'It's a prevailing issue in most of the cases,' said one Bay Area defense attorney, who asked not to be named. Added the attorney, who is a former federal prosecutor, 'Is the government under pressure (to make decisions) sooner rather than later? The answer is yes.'" The News adds, "The five-year deadline also means that the government could soon lose the chance to file charges on some of the most egregious instances of backdating. … There are ways around the deadline issue: The government can attempt to pause the clock, for instance, or file charges related to the backdating (for example, conspiracy or lying to prosecutors) if not on the backdating itself. But prosecutors can't get the clock to stop permanently, and the related charges could well be easier for defendants to challenge and can carry lighter penalties. … 'There's some room for creativity,' said another former federal prosecutor, who also asked not to be named. 'But they don't want to risk that. They want to go with the most solid theory they have.'" The News notes, "The U.S. Department of Justice investigated alleged backdating at Brocade Communications Systems for 18 months before moving to indict former Chief Executive Greg Reyes. Indictments of officials at other companies could take a fraction of that time, in part because of concern about this legal ticking clock. … Indeed, the pace of the overarching backdating investigation appears to have quickened. In recent days, federal prosecutors secured a guilty plea from a former executive at Monster Worldwide in a backdating case and are reportedly close to bringing similar charges against the former general counsel of McAfee. Take-Two's former CEO also recently pleaded guilty to backdating in New York state court. … Luke Macaulay, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Francisco, declined to say whether the government felt pressured by the five-year deadline or if it would prompt quicker actions in outstanding cases. … 'It's something we're aware of,' said Macaulay, whose office has been handling the lion's share of the backdating investigations. 'It's something we take into account in the final analysis of how we are investigating and prosecuting cases.'"

Judge Declares Mistrial In Seidman Fraud Case. The Wall Street Journal/AP (3/6, C4) reports, "A judge declared a mistrial in a $170 million fraud case against accounting firm BDO Seidman LLP after an attorney for the Portuguese bank suing the firm mentioned the suicide of one of the company's executives, against the judge's orders. … Miami-Dade County Circuit Judge Jose M. Rodriguez agreed with BDO Seidman that it couldn't receive a fair trial." The AP continues, "A lawyer for Banco Espirito Santo SA last week mentioned the suicide while questioning a witness. The judge had prohibited references to the suicide, in an order issued before the trial began. … In a 2004 lawsuit, Banco Espirito Santo accused BDO Seidman of failing to uncover the fraud at a former partner of the bank, E.S. Bankest LLC. The bank said BDO Seidman, hired to audit Bankest's books, failed to find signs of the fraud beginning in the late 1990s in part because the firm had financial ties to another Bankest partner." The AP adds, "The Big Four accounting firms typically settle high-stakes cases. Those actions often involve damage claims that run to the billions, rather than millions, of dollars. But BDO, along with fellow second-tier firm Grant Thornton LLP, are often willing to risk a trial. … A lawyer representing BDO Seidman, Mark Schnapp, argued that the jury would associate the suicide with the uncovering of fraud at the financial-services firm, a connection that was never suggested."

RIM To Restate Earnings Amid Options Backdating Probe. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A3, Vascellaro) reports, "In the latest fallout from the stock-options backdating scandal, Research in Motion Ltd. said it made widespread accounting errors in issuing some 3,000 improperly dated options grants going back to the 1990s and would take a roughly $250 million restatement." The Journal continues, "Co-Chief Executive Jim Balsillie, a recipient of some of the grants improperly accounted for, stepped down as chairman of RIM. He and co-CEO Mike Lazaridis, who also received options, agreed to pay about $4.25 million each 'to assist RIM in defraying costs' from the board probe and restatement, the company said. … Though some executives have repaid some gains from backdated shares, no executives have made such payments in the unfolding backdating scandal." The Journal adds, "RIM, the maker of the popular BlackBerry hand-held device, said all options granted before late February 2002 and approximately 321 grants made between that time and August 2006 were improperly accounted for. The 321 grants represent approximately 63% of the grants made by the company after Feb. 28, 2002. Correcting the accounting likely will cut earnings up to the end of RIM's fiscal year 2006 by $250 million, a much larger restatement than investors had expected. In September, RIM indicated it would have to restate between $25 million and $45 million in results. The company didn't name a new chairman. … RIM posted $382 million in net income on $2.1 billion in revenue in its most recently reported fiscal year, ended March 4, 2006. RIM said the announcement yesterday came after a seven-month probe by a special board committee. … RIM said an informal investigation is continuing by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Ontario Securities Commission. … The improprieties identified by the board included the practice of backdating options -- that is, pretending they were issued at an earlier time than they actually were, when RIM's share price was lower. Such backdating can increase the payoff for recipients by setting an artificially low strike price, increasing the gain when the options are exercised. About 140 companies are under investigation for backdating."

Blackberry Ousts Chairman, Restate Earnings. The Washington Post/Bloomberg (3/6, D3, Fournier, Heiskanen) reports, "Research in Motion, maker of the BlackBerry e-mail phone, will restate earnings by about $250 million and said James Balsillie will give up his post as chairman following a review of its stock-options grants." Bloomberg continues, "Research in Motion did not find intentional misconduct by its executives, according to a statement released by the company, based in Waterloo, Ontario. The restatements, which are not yet complete, cover more than three years of results dating back to 2004." Bloomberg adds, "The adjustment exceeds an earlier prediction by Research in Motion, which forecast in January that restatements would cut past earnings by more than $45 million. In concluding its options probe, the company said Balsillie would remain co-chief executive as it separates the roles of chairman and chief executive to upgrade corporate governance. … Research in Motion is one of at least 200 companies that have disclosed internal or federal investigations into options. Investigators are trying to determine whether companies inflated the value of employee options by backdating or timing the grants to coincide with days when the stock price was low."

McAfee Chooses EMC Official As New CEO. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A3, Vara, Lublin) reports, "McAfee Inc., trying to move past fallout from a federal investigation of its stock-options grants and revive its growth, named EMC Corp. executive David DeWalt as its new chief executive." The Journal continues, "The hiring of Mr. DeWalt, EMC's head of world-wide customer operations, comes as McAfee tries to stabilize its executive bench after a string of financial debacles, including probes into improperly dated stock-options grants. Mr. DeWalt, a 42-year-old software industry veteran, will be the Santa Clara, Calif., security-software maker's fourth CEO in six years. … George Samenuk, McAfee's last permanent chief executive before Mr. DeWalt, resigned in October after an internal probe found accounting irregularities related to stock-options grants. Last month, a Securities and Exchange Commission complaint claimed that Mr. Samenuk had known about a change to a 2002 stock-option grant made in his favor by a subordinate. The complaint charged Kent H. Roberts, McAfee's former general counsel, with fraud for his alleged role in manipulating options and followed a criminal indictment of Mr. Roberts. Mr. Samenuk hasn't been charged." The Journal adds, "Mr. DeWalt, who starts at McAfee on April 2, is expected to clean up the mess. The company plans to restate several quarters of past financial results in the wake of the stock-options problems. Interim chief Dale Fuller, the board member who temporarily replaced Mr. Samenuk, will remain on the board. Chuck Robel will remain chairman. … Mr. DeWalt joins McAfee as the security-software industry enters a more difficult phase after years of go-go growth. McAfee's antivirus software for home users and companies was once in demand as computer users sought to protect themselves against viruses and worms. But new threats like 'phishing' have displaced the old ones, leaving McAfee and other security-software makers scrambling to catch up. Priorities have also shifted at businesses, where security officers are focused on new problems like keeping corporate data from getting lost or stolen. McAfee recently launched products to fight phishing and data leakage, but those areas are already crowded."

New York AG Names New Attorney In Grasso Case. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, C7, Lucchetti, Koppel) reports, "New York Attorney General Andrew Cuomo named lawyer Benjamin E. Rosenberg to be his chief trial counsel, a role that will include handling high-profile cases such as the long fight against former New York Stock Exchange Chief Executive Dick Grasso." The Journal continues, "Mr. Rosenberg, a partner with law firm Dechert LLP, will start in the state's law-enforcement office Monday, said a spokesman for the attorney general's office. His salary will be $140,000. Mr. Rosenberg, 48 years old, worked on several high-profile white-collar cases while at Dechert, said the attorney general's spokesman." The Journal adds, "The attorney general's office won a partial summary judgment in the Grasso case last year, but Mr. Grasso is appealing. A decision on the appeals is expected in coming months, and if Mr. Grasso loses, he may have to give $100 million or more of his compensation back to the NYSE, where he worked for decades. Mr. Grasso has been fighting the case and has said he did nothing to warrant giving back part of his pay package. … Mr. Cuomo's predecessor, New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer, brought the case. Mr. Spitzer harshly criticized Mr. Grasso for collecting a pay package of $187.5 million while at the NYSE, which at the time was a not-for-profit company under New York state law."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Jury Remains Focused On Cooper Conversation. The Washington Post (3/6, A3, Leonnig, Goldstein, 690K) reports jurors "in the perjury trial of I. Lewis

DOJ_NMG_0140480

'Scooter' Libby indicated yesterday they remain focused on whether Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff lied to the FBI about a July 12, 2003, conversation with Matthew Cooper, then a reporter for Time magazine." In a note "to the presiding judge late yesterday afternoon, jurors asked three questions about how they should decide whether Libby is guilty of making a false statement to investigators about his conversation with Cooper. After sending the note, the jury concluded its ninth day of deliberations without reaching a verdict." During that time, the jury "has sent U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton five questions about Libby's statements to the FBI regarding his conversation with Cooper."

The New York Times (3/6, 1.16M) reports the jury "suggested on Monday that some of its members were deeply uncertain about one of the five felony charges. Before the jurors departed at the end of their ninth day of deliberations, they sent a note to Judge Reggie B. Walton asking for clarification of Count 3, in which Mr. Libby is charged with giving a false statement to an agent of the Federal Bureau of Investigation." In the discussions Judge Walton "had with both sides' lawyers, it appeared that the jury was asking whether its members might consider Mr. Libby's testimony to the grand jury in March 2004 to help determine whether he made a false statement in his F.B.I. interview six months earlier."

FBI Investigating Wal-Mart Technician Who Tapped Phone Conversations. The Financial Times (3/6, Birchall) reports the FBI "is investigating the activities of a Wal-Mart 'technician' who was fired by the retailer after it learnt that the employee had been intercepting electronic messages transmitted by people outside the company. A company spokeswoman said the employee had used personal equipment to intercept all text messages sent 'within a few miles' of Wal-Mart's Bentonville headquarters, and had collected messages containing certain key words, without giving more details.

The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A4, McWilliams) reports, "Federal investigators are probing a Wal-Mart Stores Inc. employee's electronic interception of telephone conversations and text messages of other employees and outsiders, including a New York Times Co. reporter. People familiar with the issue said the criminal probe targets an employee who was searching for the identities of those who had leaked embarrassing company memos to the newspaper and others. Wal-Mart has been the subject of articles by the Times and others for its health-care, wage and benefit policies. The U.S. attorney for Western District of Arkansas confirmed it has begun a probe after being notified by the Bentonville, Ark., retailer of the recordings and electronic interceptions. Deborah Groom, first assistant U.S. attorney, declined to say whether it had subpoenaed records or interviewed employees of the world's largest retailer. Mona Williams, a Wal-Mart vice president, said the retailer fired two employees of its computer-systems department as a result of a nearly two-month internal review. One was a manager, who was dismissed yesterday. A third employee, also a computer-systems unit manager, was disciplined but not fired for 'failure to carry out management duties,' Ms. Williams said." Williams "confirmed agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation were carrying out the probe for the U.S. Attorney's office."

The New York Times (3/6, Creswell) reports, "the United States attorney's office for the Western District of Arkansas and the Federal Bureau of Investigation are assessing the actions of the employee and others inside Wal-Mart to determine whether federal and state laws were broken and whether they have jurisdiction in the matter, according to spokesmen for the investigators' offices. Wal-Mart said the technician was not authorized to monitor and tape the conversations between members of its media relations staff and Michael Barbaro, a retail reporter for The Times. The company did not say what led the technician to make the recordings or why Mr. Barbaro's conversations were the target. Over the last year, Mr. Barbaro has written dozens of articles about Wal-Mart, including some that were based on internal company documents that were given to him by union-financed groups that were critical of Wal-Mart's business practices."

The Washington Post (3/6, D3, Mui) reports, "A spokesman for the FBI did not return several phone calls or respond to an e-mail asking whether an investigation was underway."

The AP (3/6) reports, "FBI officials in Washington said Monday the agency is reviewing the information 'to determine if there was a violation of federal law and if the FBI has jurisdiction.'"

Newark Employee Accused Of Defrauding Cisco Systems. The AP (3/6, Robertson) reports, "A computer technician working for the city of Newark, N.J., was arrested on charges he defrauded technology giant Cisco Systems Inc. of more than $10 million by cheating one of the company's programs for replacing broken or defective parts. Michael Kyereme, 40, of Piscataway, N.J., was arrested Friday on a charge of mail fraud and made his initial appearance in Newark federal court on Monday, according to the FBI. He will remain in custody at least until a bail hearing Thursday. Kyereme worked as independent contractor for Newark, assisting city employees when their computers needed troubleshooting, the FBI said. … According to the criminal complaint, Kyereme ordered about 280 parts from Cisco since August 2002 _ some worth more than $250,000 _ and made false claims that they were replacements for Cisco parts in the city's computer system that were 'dead' or 'not responding.'"

Rhode Island Prosecutor Heads To New Orleans To Fight Crime. In a story distributed by Scripps Howard News Service (DC) (3/6, Stanton), the Providence Journal reports, "Federal prosecutor Richard Rose makes presentations at schools on a regular basis. He has T-shirts and runs through the names of those killed by gang violence in Providence." The Journal continues, "During the past few years, Rose has made a program called Street Smarts his mission as the anti-gang coordinator for the Rhode Island U.S. Attorney's office. He has spoken to more than 3,400 schoolchildren about the dangers of the streets, relating his own experiences as a fatherless black youth growing up in Providence. … Now Rose, the man best known for prosecuting ex-Providence Mayor Vincent A. Cianci Jr., is headed to New Orleans, where death is a near-daily occurrence in the wake of Hurricane Katrina in 2005." The Journal adds, "Rose, 48, is part of a federal task force of prosecutors and agents from throughout the country who will spend the next six months in the Crescent City, combating the escalating gun violence. He is among the second wave of federal reinforcements in a program that began last year. On Wednesday, Rose will report for duty at the U.S. Attorney's office there. … 'We've got to take the cowboys off the streets,' said Rose, in an interview last week. 'They had 161 murders last year, in a city of 200,000. Two weeks ago they had seven shootings in nine hours, five of them fatal -- that's a whole year for us!' … Katrina overwhelmed the city's law-enforcement structure, he noted. Floodwaters destroyed evidence and rendered courtrooms useless. Outside of the relatively safe tourist districts, criminals flooded lawless streets, emboldened by the chaos. Rose cried with his daughter as he watched television footage of refugees streaming across a bridge 'like survivors in a B-movie where the nuclear bomb is dropped.'"

Death Of Peacemaker Jeopardizes Boston Gang Truce. USA Today (3/6, Hampson) reports from Boston, "Two hooded strangers walked out of the darkness at the end of the street. … Jahmol Norfleet and his sister Teah, standing in front of their apartment house that night last November, stopped talking. On Holworthy Street, an unfamiliar face could mean danger — even since Jahmol, a leader of the notorious H Block gang, helped arrange a truce four months earlier in the city's bloodiest street war." USA continues, "In the 18 months before the truce, about two dozen people were shot. Jahmol himself was an inch from death; there was a crease where the bullet grazed his scalp. After that he took a gun to school, got busted and spent a year in jail. … Then the gangster turned peacemaker. At a secret summit, H Block and its rival gang, Heath Street, agreed to a truce. When word finally leaked out, Boston was enthralled. Perhaps the truce could spread across the city, maybe even across a nation where gang violence was helping jack up the crime rate for the first time in 15 years." USA adds, "So as the two strangers came down Holworthy, Teah would recall, she fought the impulse to run. After all, it was peacetime. Suddenly, the guys reached under their sweatshirts, pulled out pistols, charged through the parked cars and opened fire. … When it was over, Jahmol lay dead on the sidewalk. … The next day, Mayor Thomas Menino praised the young man for trying to 'change his neighborhood from a place of violence to a community of peace.' But now, three months after his death, it's unclear whether the gang truce is a national model, or even if it still exists." USA notes, "America has had street gangs almost as long as it's had streets. But gangs are turning up in more places, including towns, suburbs, even agricultural areas — 'spreading like a virus,' according to Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. … Kevin O'Connor, an associate deputy U.S. attorney general, said at a conference on gangs last month that there was 'a resurgence of gang violence in several U.S. cities.' The Justice Department is surveying about 20 communities to determine how bad the problem is. … The National Youth Gang Center estimates the national number of gang members rose to 760,000 in 2004, the most recent year figures are available, up from 731,000 two years earlier. Los Angeles alone has about 40,000 gang members; the police say violent gang-related crime rose 14% last year. … Law enforcers are trying many strategies — midnight basketball leagues, gun buybacks, neighborhood sweeps, 'start snitchin' ' campaigns. None has approached the success a decade ago of what Newsweek hailed as 'the Boston Miracle.' … In the mid-1990s a coalition of law enforcers, social workers and inner-city black ministers imposed a gang cease-fire with a carrot-and-stick promise to gangsters: Keep fighting and face tighter probation checks, arrests on outstanding warrants, federal prosecution; stop and have a chance at a summer job, tutoring, a break in sentencing."

Unresolved Corruption Probes Leave Officials In Limbo. The Arizona Republic (3/6, House) reports, "There has been a long list of recent Justice Department investigations announced or leaked to the media targeting current and former members of Congress. … In many of those cases, the public has been left for months, or longer, to wonder about whether lawmakers will be charged or what, if anything, the investigations revealed. That air of uncertainty, which may never be wiped away, could ultimately tarnish reputations or destroy careers. … That includes the so-called preliminary inquiry and assessment launched last fall by Paul

Charlton, then U.S. attorney in Arizona, regarding activities of Rep. Rick Renzi, R-Ariz., and former Rep. Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz., respectively." The Republic continues, "In the months since, nothing has surfaced about either case. Both Renzi and Kolbe have denied wrongdoing. Meanwhile, Justice Department officials in Phoenix and Washington, after initially confirming the existence of both inquiries, have declined to give additional comment. At times, the Phoenix and Washington offices don't seem to have a handle on who is in charge, referring inquiries about the matters to each other. … Charlton, who left office in January, recently declined to comment. … Charlton was one of half a dozen top prosecutors forced out of office last year by the Justice Department. Some lawmakers say the move was related to investigations of politicians. Hearings will be held in Washington today." The Republic adds, "Meanwhile, potential targets wait to learn the status of the investigation. … Ex-Rep. J.D. Hayworth, R-Ariz., was linked in published news accounts in January 2006 to at least four other members of Congress reportedly under federal investigation in Virginia in connection with the influence-peddling scandal surrounding convicted former D.C. lobbyist Jack Abramoff. … Hayworth, who lost his re-election bid in November, has denied wrongdoing. Only one of the five lawmakers cited, former Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, has been convicted in the Abramoff scandal. … There has been no word since about where the inquiry involving Hayworth has led. … And there probably won't be, federal officials say. … 'A lot of that is up to the discretion of the U.S. attorney. In some cases, they issue a statement clearing them,' said Bill Carter, a Justice Department spokesman in Washington. … 'In some cases, they say nothing at all,' Carter said. 'Or they send a letter to the individual, if requested.'"

Challenges To Death Penalty On The Rise. The National Law Journal (3/6, Jaksic) reports, "A perfect storm of problematic executions, wrongful convictions and recent court rulings against the practice of lethal injection has led a growing number of states to challenge the death penalty through lawsuits and legislative action. … Adding still more to the momentum are a public backlash against the cost of capital cases and the development of more effective defense techniques, such as mitigation specialists who humanize death row inmates." The Journal continues, "Eleven states have halted some or all executions -- including Florida and Maryland in December -- and more lawmakers have been speaking out against the death penalty. … Last month alone, Maryland's governor urged legislators to replace the death penalty with life without parole, North Carolina's governor said executions should be halted until issues surrounding lethal injection are solved and Montana's Senate voted to abolish the death penalty." The Journal adds, "Court decisions have also continued to come down, such as a Delaware judge granting class action status on Feb. 22 to all death row inmates based on a case challenging lethal injection. Jackson v. Danberg, No. Civ. 06-3000-SLR (D. Del.). 'It's probably the strongest momentum since the death penalty was reinstated in the mid-1970s,' said John Holdridge, director of the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) Capital Punishment Project, which advocates against the death penalty." The Journal notes, "The Death Penalty Information Center recently listed the following 11 states as those that have stopped some or all executions: Arkansas, California, Delaware, Florida, Maryland, Missouri, New Jersey, North Carolina, Ohio, South Dakota and Tennessee, according to Richard Dieter, executive director of the nonprofit Washington, D.C.-based organization, which opposes capital punishment. … North Carolina's officials were in talks last week in hopes of resolving the situation, and the state's attorney general hinted on March 1 that a solution may be imminent. The executions have stopped either through government-issued moratoriums or judges' rulings, and have had varying effect."

Russian Expert's Son, Wife Say He Was Not Robbed During Attack. The Washington Post (3/6, B2, Rich) reports, "The assailants who shot an expert on Russian intelligence in Prince George's County last week did not, as law enforcement sources said, take his wallet, the victim's adult son said yesterday, showing the billfold to a reporter. The disclosure, which contradicts a report in The Washington Post yesterday, adds to the allegations and theories about the shooting, which left Paul Joyal, 53, critically wounded in his driveway Thursday night. During a brief interview at the family's home in the Adelphi area, Alex Joyal said his father was in critical but stable condition. … The timing of the shooting -- four days after Paul Joyal said on 'Dateline NBC' that the government of Russian President Vladimir Putin was responsible for the poisoning death of former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko -- raised the possibility that Joyal might have been targeted in retaliation for his comment." The post notes that "several news outlets, including The Post, have cited anonymous law enforcement officials as saying that the shooting appeared to have occurred during a botched robbery. The claim that a wallet and briefcase had been taken from Paul Joyal was seen as offering additional support for the theory that he was targeted in a robbery or perhaps a failed carjacking. A source in The Post's report said yesterday that the wallet and briefcase were initially thought to have been taken but that the wallet was found in Joyal's car. The location of the briefcase was unclear last night."

The Washington Post/AP (3/6, Manning) reports, "The wife of an expert on Russian intelligence who was shot last week challenged reports Monday that her husband had been robbed. In a brief interview at the couple's suburban Washington home, Elizabeth Joyal said reports that Paul Joyal's wallet and briefcase were taken were false. She didn't know of any motive for Thursday's shooting outside their home in what she said was a normally safe area. 'We really have no idea what the reason was,' said Elizabeth Joyal, but added that 'it could easily have been a random act of violence.'"

Gibbons Did Not Clear Legal Defense Fund With House Committee. The AP (3/6, Riley) reports, "A legal defense fund set up for Nevada Gov. Jim Gibbons in November, when he was dealing with brewing legal cases including a woman's claim he assaulted her, wasn't sanctioned by a House Committee even though Gibbons was still a congressman. But representatives of the governor, who now has two high-priced lawyers handling an FBI probe into his associations with a longtime friend who's a wealthy federal contractor, say the fund was created properly. They add that the fund shouldn't run afoul of a state law limiting contributions during legislative sessions. Gibbons spokeswoman Melissa Subbotin said Monday that a U.S. House committee's approval of the defense fund wasn't sought in November because Gibbons, a Republican who served five terms in the House, was seeking election to a state office and not a federal office. … Attorneys Don Campbell of Las Vegas and Abbe Lowell of Washington, D.C., currently are helping Gibbons deal with FBI questions about his associations with Warren Trepp. Gibbons has denied that he accepted payments or gifts from Trepp in exchange for helping the wealthy Reno software contractor get defense contracts while Gibbons was a member of Congress."

Ford Returns To Memphis Council Following Grand Jury Subpoenas. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (3/6, Aaronson) reports, "City Councilman Edmund Ford will take his seat at the dais today for the first time since Memphis Light, Gas and Water Division president and CEO Joseph Lee admitted the politician received special treatment. But Ford's actions as a public official -- including during his tenure as chairman of the council committee that oversees MLGW's spending and budget -- are key to elevating the utility scandal to criminal charges. The crux of the case: Federal prosecutors need to prove that Ford used his position on the City Council to benefit MLGW improperly in exchange for leniency on his more than $16,000 in debt to the city-owned utility. … The federal investigation of MLGW became public following the delivery of grand jury subpoenas to the utility in mid-February. On Feb. 22, vice president of customer operations Alonzo Weaver and Gloria Washington, a top assistant to Lee, testified before the grand jury. Five days later, on Feb. 27, Lee responded to his grand jury subpoena. … If the government can document quid pro quo, prosecutors' law of choice could be the Hobbs Act, a federal code that prohibits bribery and extortion, among other crimes, affecting interstate commerce. As a utility company, MLGW engages in interstate commerce. The Hobbs Act allows crimes usually prosecuted in state courts -- from robbery to racketeering -- to be brought to U.S. District Court, which has strict penalty guidelines and no opportunities for parole.

Spending On Los Angeles Anti-Gang Initiative Questioned. The Los Angeles Times (3/6, Mcgreevy, Winton) reports, "Los Angeles has spent $100 million over the last decade on a gang-prevention program, even though it doesn't track how many youths it keeps out of gangs and has been repeatedly criticized for not adequately coordinating with schools and police." The Times continues, "Unlike anti-gang efforts in other cities that have been held up as models by the federal government, L.A. Bridges lacks a system for determining whether its clients are involved in gangs, so there is no way of knowing whether the program actually works. … The program has come under growing scrutiny at City Hall as L.A. and federal authorities have launched a new gang crackdown. Critics point out that in 2006, gang crime increased 15.7% over the year before, according to LAPD statistics." The Times adds, "Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa has vowed to increase funding for intervention programs, saying the gang crackdown can't focus solely on law enforcement. But he is limiting funding of L.A. Bridges through September while officials try to assess its effectiveness. … Supporters acknowledge that L.A. Bridges needs to do a better job of working with other agencies, but they maintain it provides a valuable community service and would be more effective if the city expanded it. … The city spends $14 million annually on Bridges, which essentially screens and gives money to community organizations that do the actual intervention. Bridges I is a gang prevention program that provides after-school tutoring, counseling and other services to students from 27 middle schools. Bridges II offers job training to gang members in the hope that employment will get them out of gang life. The contracts range from $227,000 to $1.7 million."

Some Dispute Benefits Of Sex Offender Therapy. The New York Times (3/6, Goodnough, Davey) reports from Atascadero, CA, "During five years of psychotherapy at a treatment center here for sex offenders who have finished their prison terms, Bill Price, a pedophile who admits to 21 victims as young as 3, has constructed a painstaking plan for staying straight. … A requirement of his treatment, the plan catalogs on five single-spaced pages the tactics Mr. Price has learned to stop molesting." The Times continues, "There are 42 so far, including avoiding places where children congregate, abstaining from alcohol, shunning the Internet and sniffing ammonia whenever he has a deviant thought. … 'It was just like a hunt for me,' Mr. Price, 59, a former Sunday school teacher, said of his sexual crimes. 'I kept choosing children because they were easier prey; they were easier to deal with than women.'" The Times adds, "Treatment plans like Mr. Price's, known as relapse prevention, have been a cornerstone of efforts to reform sex offenders for the past 20 years. Yet there is no convincing evidence that the approach works, or that others do either. … Similar to aspects of Alcoholics Anonymous, relapse prevention has sex offenders own up to wrongdoing and resign themselves to a lifelong day-to-day struggle with temptation. But one of the few authoritative studies of the method, conducted in California from 1985 to 2001, found that those who entered relapse prevention treatment were slightly more likely to offend again than those who got no therapy at all. … Clinicians who work with sex offenders cling to relapse prevention nonetheless, and its durability speaks volumes about the troubled, politically fraught science of treating sex offenders. Not only is relapse prevention of questionable value, but so are the tests to gauge whether sex offenders in treatment still get inappropriately aroused, the drugs used for so-called chemical castration and the methods of predicting risk of reoffending." The Times notes, "Treatment methods have become particularly topical as thousands of sex offenders are confined or restricted beyond their prison terms under civil commitment laws on the books in 19 states. The laws have been found constitutional in part because they aim to provide treatment if possible; New York legislators announced last week that the state would soon allow civil confinement. … On average, the civil commitment programs cost four times more than keeping sex offenders in prison. But too little research has been conducted into how to treat sex offenders, experts say, putting psychotherapists and others working in civil commitment centers at a distinct disadvantage."

US Probing Counterfeit Wine Sales. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A1, Wilke) reports, "Federal prosecutors have uncorked a criminal investigation into counterfeit-wine sales, sending subpoenas to rare-wine collectors and to some of the world's leading auction houses, including Christie's in London and Zachys in New York." The Journal continues, "A federal grand jury in New York has begun hearing evidence in the case, and the art-fraud unit of the Federal Bureau of Investigation has conducted interviews, according to people who have been contacted in the course of the probe." The Journal adds, "The criminal investigation is focusing, among other things, on whether auction houses, collectors or importers knowingly sold counterfeit wines despite doubts about their authenticity, those close to the case said. Such sales could be prosecuted under federal fraud statutes. … The inquiry comes as wine sales are booming amid a broader surge in the market for luxury goods. Backed in part by robust profits on Wall Street, collectors and speculators increasingly are paying $1,000 or more per bottle, especially for the rare Bordeaux vintages of France. … That's raised new fears about counterfeiting, which is beginning to threaten confidence in the market for rare wines -- except those sold directly from wineries. Wine Spectator magazine recently estimated that as much as 5% of rare vintages sold privately or at auction today may be fake." The Journal notes, "The criminal investigation began in December, after several collectors began pressing auction houses and wine merchants to take some measure of responsibility for the alleged sale of counterfeit wines. The collectors included Russell Frye, a wealthy software entrepreneur, and William Koch, president of closely held Oxbow Corp., a global mining and energy concern. His billionaire brothers control Koch Industries, a $25 billion business empire. … Mr. Koch filed a civil suit last year in federal court in New York, alleging that a German wine merchant, Hardy Rodenstock, forged bottles of wine he claimed had belonged to Thomas Jefferson and had been discovered in a bricked-up cellar in Paris. Mr. Rodenstock also claimed to have other extremely rare wines, including a cache belonging to Czar Nicholas II of Russia, Mr. Koch alleged. "

Taxpayers Footing Legal Bills For Former FBI Agent In Mob Case. The New York Daily News (3/6, Sherman) reports, "Taxpayers are footing part of the mounting legal bills for an ex-FBI agent accused of helping a Brooklyn Mafia boss commit four murders, the Daily News has learned." The Daily News continues, "The Justice Department is helping fund retired agent Lindley DeVecchio's defense, which has cost more than $450,000 since his indictment last year by the Brooklyn district attorney's office. … 'It's an expensive litigation,' said DeVecchio's lawyer Douglas Grover, who declined to comment further." The Daily News adds, "A highly informed source confirmed the Justice Department contributions, saying, 'It's on an hourly rate. Not a top New York City rate, more like a federal public defenders' rate.' … It could not immediately be determined how much the department is paying. … 'There is a process in place by which employees or former [FBI] employees who are the subject of civil litigation or criminal charges can apply for coverage of their legal costs. The recommendation is forwarded to the Department of Justice, where a final determination is made,' FBI spokesman John Miller said. … In a case that rocked New York law enforcement, DeVecchio, 66, was indicted last year for providing information on informants and mob rivals to Colombo family boss Gregory Scarpa before the murders."

Opportunistic Scammers Flock To Midwest Casinos. USA Today (3/6, 3A, Keen) reports, "Casinos sprouting across the Midwest are attracting sophisticated cheaters from Las Vegas, Atlantic City and overseas who believe they can scam new, unseasoned staff, gambling officials say." USA continues, "Cheating is often discovered only when casinos' books don't add up, making it difficult to nab culprits, says Joe Diaz of the Iowa Division of Criminal Investigation. … 'We've had people coming in from out of state trying to take advantage of inexperienced staff or a staff that hasn't got all the bugs worked out,' he says. Most casinos' security staffs are aided by state or local police." USA adds, "Joe Massa, general manager of Iowa's Riverside Casino & Golf Resort, knew scammers might target his casino, which opened in August. He hired experienced pit and security staff, he says, and hasn't detected any out-of-state cheaters. … Nevertheless, casinos in Iowa — where a half-dozen have opened since 2000 — and other states allegedly have been hit by out-of-state cheats: … Three gamblers from the East Coast, including one from Atlantic City, were charged in Osceola, Iowa, with using shaved coins to trick slot machines into awarding credits. … A casino in Joliet, Ill., was targeted by a team that included a Nevadan. They were charged with using fake cash vouchers to steal $50,000. … Indiana, with help from the FBI and IRS, is investigating international cheaters. … 'They have gone from site to site, and they seem to prey on riverboats or smaller venues,' says Ernest Yelton of the Indiana Gaming Commission. 'They perhaps believe that we are less sophisticated.'"

NYTimes Blasts NYPD Theft Sting. The New York Times (3/6) editorializes, "The New York Police Department has been going fishing. Not content to nab criminals when they break the law on their own, the department has been planting unattended bags in subway stations to see who might take them, at which point waiting officers pounce." The Times continues, "As NY1 News reported last week, 220 people were arrested last year in the sting, known as Operation Lucky Bag. In dismissing one of these cases, a Brooklyn judge said the police 'do not need to manipulate a situation where temptation may overcome even people who would normally never think of committing a crime.' This program bothers us for that and many other reasons and should be discontinued immediately." The Times adds, "Civil libertarians have argued that the program is entrapment. That is a legal distinction for the courts to decide, but it certainly looks like that to a layperson. It is clearly a poor use of resources. People wandering off with lost property ranks far down the list of law enforcement priorities. … There is also the question of whether the sting does actual harm. In an era of terrorism, where the police have to rely on the help of average people to notice anything suspicious — including apparently abandoned bags — the last thing New York needs are cynical operations that encourage mistrust between the police and subway riders. … And of course, there is the effect on neighborliness. It is remarkable how many people in this city are willing to track down the owners of lost cellphones, wallets or bags. Arresting good Samaritans is bad enough, but encouraging them not to help in the future through this kind of overly aggressive policing is a downright shame. The best thing to do with this misbegotten program would be to end it."

Book Examines Savage DC Murder. The Washington Post (3/6, B1, Cauvin) reports, "It took Kevin Flynn just over a year to put away the man who killed Diane Hawkins and her 13-year-old daughter, Katrina Harris. … It has taken him almost 14 years to put to paper the story of that night in 1993 when Norman Harrell took the lives -- and the hearts -- of Hawkins, who was his ex-girlfriend, and her daughter." The Post continues, "Homicides were everyday occurrences in the District then. The city was in the clutches of a crack war and its impulsive, impersonal violence. But the slayings of Hawkins and Harris were different. They were personal, savage. … And they seized Flynn, then a 36-year-old homicide prosecutor who had just become a father, like no other case had -- or has." The Post adds, "The crime scene at the house in Northeast Washington was like nothing he had ever seen, the killer's rage so evident. Hawkins's heart was left adrift among her innards; her daughter's was gone. … And the sons and daughters, sisters and cousins Flynn first encountered at D.C. Superior Court were like no family he had met. Angry as they were, the victims' family shared a faith in God and a belief in the law and in Flynn himself. … Indeed, after the jurors had listened to him, even after they had convicted Harrell in the summer of 1994, Flynn found himself with more to say -- about Hawkins, her daughter, the incredible strength of the family they left behind and himself. … Many drafts -- and many murder cases -- later, Flynn's book, 'Relentless Pursuit,' arrived in stores this month. … It is a true-crime memoir by a prosecutor who took on the biggest trial of his career in the midst of his own family crisis. On the opening day of the trial, his father learned that lung cancer had spread to his brain and that he probably had only months to live. … It is also the story of how, in his own time of need, Flynn says he found a measure of comfort in the company of a family that was wrestling with painful emotions that have never gone away."

Radio Broadcasters Agree To Pay $12.5 Million Payola Fine. The Los Angeles Times (3/6, Puzzanghera)

reports, "Four of the nation's largest broadcast radio companies have agreed to pay a combined $12.5 million to settle a federal investigation into 'pay-for-play' practices and will provide thousands of hours of free airtime to local musicians and independent record labels, sources familiar with the agreement said today." The Times continues, "Details of the settlement are being worked out and the Federal Communications Commission still must approve it. Under terms of the agreement, Clear Channel Communications Inc., CBS Radio Inc., Entercom Communications Corp. and Citadel Broadcasting Corp. would pay one of the largest fines ever levied by the FCC. The companies allegedly received money, airline tickets, clothing and other gifts from major record companies to play certain songs. … The under-the-table payments, known as payola, have been illegal since a series of pay-for-play scandals in the early days of rock 'n' roll in the 1950s. Any payment in exchange for airtime must be disclosed by broadcasters." The Times adds, "The $12.5-million fine to be paid by the four companies is in line with settlements two of the companies reached with former New York Attorney General Elliott Spitzer. CBS Radio agreed to pay $2 million in October and Entercom agreed to a $4.45 million fine two months later. … But the proposed FCC fine pales in comparison to big settlements Spitzer got from major record companies. Universal Music Group, for example, agreed last year to pay more than $12 million to settle payola allegations. The FCC's jurisdiction, however, is limited to broadcast radio stations."

The AP (3/6, Dunbar) reports, "The settlement was reached at the same time as a separate deal designed to lead to more airtime for smaller record companies and their lesser-known artists as well as local musicians." The AP continues, "The American Association of Independent Music, a group of independent record labels, has received a commitment from the same four broadcasters for the free airtime, the officials said. … In addition to airplay, the broadcasters and the independent labels have also negotiated a set of 'rules of engagement' that will guide how record company representatives and radio programmers interact. … The free airtime would be granted to companies not owned or controlled by the nation's four dominant music labels — Sony BMG Music Entertainment, Warner Music Group, Universal Music Group and EMI Group."

The Washington Post (3/6, D1, Babington) reports, "The four broadcast conglomerates, which together own more than 1,500 stations, have agreed to pay hefty fines and to provide air time for local artists and independent record labels, government and industry officials said yesterday. The negotiated settlement is meant to end a probe into the practice of what is known as 'payola,' in which large record companies quietly give cash or other benefits to radio station employees who agree to play music by the companies' artists. … 'This is the largest collective fine in the history of American broadcasting,' said Jonathan S. Adelstein, one of the five members of the Federal Communications Commission. 'It wipes payola off the radio dial,' he said, and gives lesser-known musicians a chance to reach a wider audience."

The Washington Times (3/6, Rowland) reports, "The monetary settlement with the FCC is part of a consent decree that has yet to be voted on by the full commission, sources said. It was reached at the same time broadcasters committed to providing 8,400 half-hour segments of airtime to small record labels and unsigned artists. … Broadcasters do not admit fault under the FCC deal, which calls for stricter oversight of their interactions with record labels. Some of the new requirements would include a limit on gifts from record companies; a special hot line for employees to report violations; and a fleet of compliance officers to monitor stations, which would list all items of value received from record companies in a database. … Of the four broadcasters involved, Clear Channel and CBS Radio own stations in the Washington area."

The New York Times (3/6, Leeds) reports, "If approved, the settlement would rank as the biggest penalty ever imposed at one time by the F.C.C. — at least until the agency levies another proposed fine, $24 million, against Univision, the Spanish broadcasting giant, which is accused of sidestepping its obligations to supply educational programming for children." The Times adds, "The F.C.C. started formal investigations of the radio companies last year after disclosures that radio programmers accepted gifts, luxury trips and other enticements surfaced as part of an inquiry led by Eliot Spitzer, then the New York attorney general. … Mr. Spitzer reached a series of settlements with the four major music conglomerates — the Universal Music Group, Sony BMG Music Entertainment, the EMI Group and the Warner Music Group — totaling more than $30 million. CBS Radio and Entercom settled cases with Mr. Spitzer's office for a combined $6.25 million. … The settlement with the F.C.C. comes at the same time as a separate arrangement in which the broadcasters agreed to devote more time to playing artists who are not signed to contracts with the four big record companies."

Fewer Congressional Constraints On Drug Prescriptions Urged. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (3/6, A19), Dr. Scott Gottlieb, who was deputy commissioner of the FDA from 2005 to 2007 and is a resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, writes, "Inside the federal agencies that oversee parts of the health-care system, there is a palpable view that doctors can no longer be trusted to do the right thing. … The Food and Drug Administration, Medicare and even the Justice Department all believe they cannot rely on many doctors to heed safety warnings, wisely weigh new medical information, or follow treatment approaches that maximize health benefits or lower costs. So in recent years, these agencies have hatched rules that dictate when treatments should be delivered and even how they can be administered -- especially when it comes to new drugs." Gottlieb adds, "The result is increasing federal regulation of medical practice that constrains health-care providers and limits the choices patients have. It might get worse. New legislation offered by Sens. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.,) and Michael Enzi (R., Wyo.,), intended to make drugs safer, would raise this regulatory burden by reducing a physician's discretion to exercise clinical judgment and erecting barriers that will exacerbate disparities in access to care. … The legislative proposal extends the FDA's ability to restrict which physicians can prescribe a medicine, and which pharmacies can dispense it, through risk-management plans that would accompany the approval of many new drugs. These 'RiskMAPs,' as they are called inside the FDA, already guide the use of about 30 marketed drugs as part of 'voluntary' arrangements with drug companies. … Right now, pharmaceutical companies propose the plans to better balance the risks and benefits of their drugs, in order to secure FDA approval. But these plans impose burdens, especially on patients who already face difficulty obtaining the specialist care that many RiskMAPs require for the dispensing of new drugs. Thus the FDA and the pharmaceutical industry have mostly confined RiskMAPs to drugs with unpredictable and potentially deadly risks, such as anaphylaxis or rapid organ failure." Gottlieb adds, "That sense of restraint is lifting. New proposals by Congress and the Institute of Medicine advocate RiskMAPs for mitigating a wider set of less-serious problems and to constrain the off-label prescribing of new drugs, even though such prescribing is the standard of care for many diseases. The proposals are gaining traction. Once the FDA is granted the authority to simply impose these RiskMAPs on drug companies, there will be a lot of political pressure on the agency to constrain prescription writing in the name of drug safety. … The solutions to any of the health-care problems that government is trying to mitigate will not rest in Washington's constraining 'fixes,' but with these organs of medicine working with agencies to promote practice standards and safety measures that do not sacrifice medical autonomy and patient choice."

FBI To Probe Teen's Death At Maryland Juvenile Facility. The Baltimore Sun (3/6, Garland, Dechter) reports, "On the same day the state medical examiner ruled that the death of a student at the Bowling Brook Preparatory School was a homicide, the FBI said it is conducting an independent investigation into the incident." The Sun continues, "At a joint news conference Monday in Westminster, federal officials said their investigation into the death of 17-year-old Isaiah Simmons was ordered last week by the Justice Department. Local officials said they would present evidence already gathered by the Carroll County sheriff to a grand jury to determine whether criminal charges should be brought in Maryland. … Simmons died Jan. 23 after being physically restrained for three hours by counselors at Bowling Brook, a privately run residential program for juvenile offenders." The Sun adds, "Officials stressed that the medical examiner's ruling of a homicide -- meaning the death was the result of actions by another person or people -- does not necessarily mean a crime was committed. That will be decided by the grand jury next month, said David P. Daggett, Carroll County deputy state's attorney. … Kevin R. Lewis, the assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Baltimore office, said at the press conference that federal authorities began monitoring the Simmons' case several weeks ago at the request of the sheriff's office. … Last week, the U.S. Department of Justice asked the FBI to formally launch a separate investigation to determine whether federal civil rights laws were violated, Lewis said. … The investigation will 'be starting right away,' he said, and the results will be reported to the Justice Department. … An FBI spokeswoman, Michelle Crnkovich, stressed that the investigation is not an indication that the federal government lacks confidence in Carroll County's probe. … 'Absolutely not. We have every confidence in them,' she said."

DOJ To Monitor Elections In Four California Cities Today. The Fresno Bee (3/6) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department said Monday it planned to monitor municipal elections in four Southern California cities to ensure they comply with federal voting law." The Bee continues, "Federal observers on Tuesday will visit polling places in Azusa, Gardena, Paramount and Rosemead. … Last year federal investigators visited polling places in the region and determined that Azusa and Paramount failed to fully translate election materials into Spanish, as they are required to do under the federal Voting Rights Act. Authorities also said Rosemead failed to offer all voting materials in Spanish, Chinese and Vietnamese." The Bee adds, "The Voting Rights Act requires cities to provide election materials in any foreign language that is spoken by a substantial number of people within their boundaries. … Azusa, Paramount and Rosemead each signed federal consent decrees last July requiring them to fix flaws in their election procedures. … Gardena, which has a large non-English speaking population, said on its Web site that it planned to provide ballots and polling place officials who can speak in English, Spanish, Japanese, and Korean."

The Torrance (CA) Daily Breeze (3/6, Maddaus) reports, "The Department of Justice won't say why polling in the South Bay community will be receiving special attention on Tuesday. … The U.S. Department of Justice will monitor Tuesday's election in Gardena to ensure that the city complies with the federal Voting Rights Act. … In announcing the decision Monday, federal authorities did not explain why Gardena had been selected for special attention." The Breeze adds, "The other three cities chosen for election monitoring — Azusa, Rosemead and Paramount — are all subject to federal consent decrees related to ballot translations. But Gardena, which prints ballots in English, Spanish, Japanese and Korean, has not been cited for translation problems in the past. … 'It's not a sign of censure,' said Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson. 'It's routine. We want to do this to ensure compliance with the law.' … Federal observers will be on hand at polling places in the city throughout the day. An attorney from the Civil Rights Division will coordinate the office's activities."

DOJ To Tour Washington Jail. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (3/6) reports, "Justice Department officials are expected to spend the next few days in Seattle as part of an ongoing federal investigation, touring the King County Jail and interviewing staff members." The P-I continues, "In October, the department sent a letter to King County officials announcing that it would be investigating the main jail in downtown Seattle. Primary concerns were occurrences of sexual misconduct by corrections officers, suicides, and controlling the spread of infectious diseases. … Federal investigators made their first visit in December. A final report could take six months to a year."

KING 5 Seattle (3/6) reports, "Jail Director Reed Holtgeerts told KING 5 News he welcomes the investigation and has already begun providing the requested documentation into jail safety and procedures. Holgeerts is meeting this afternoon with the Department of Justice and union representatives for corrections officers and others who work in the jail. … 'The message has been sent very clearly that there is zero tolerance (for sexual misconduct),' said Holgeerts. 'If we find it, you're gone and you're going to be charged.'" KING 5 adds, "During a KING 5 investigation in the fall of November, 2005, corrections officers said that they were being exposed to serious diseases such as MRSA (Methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus Aureus) and that the jail wasn't doing enough to prevent the spread of the highly contagious disease. Some guards told KING 5 they had contracted MRSA and passed it on to their spouses and children. … The American Civil Liberties Union toured the jail late last month and says that while some improvements have been made, more needs to be done to stop the spread of MRSA."

Los Angeles Police Object To Financial Disclosure Requirement. CBS 2 Los Angeles (3/6) reports, "Up to 600 Los Angeles Police Department anti-gang and narcotics officers have threatened to retire or transfer to other units if they are required to provide personal financial information, as mandated by a federal consent decree, police union representatives said Monday." CBS 2 continues, "Los Angeles Police Protective League officials are considering a lawsuit to block the disclosure requirement, which was imposed following the Rampart Division corruption scandal, in which gang officers were caught stealing drugs and framing suspects." CBS 2 adds, " The U.S. Justice Department's consent decree with the city requires future gang officers disclose their finances so supervisors might more easily tell if they were illegally profiting from police work. … 'We have seen the LAPD repeatedly allow gang members and others to manipulate the system to target officers,' Bob Baker, president of the league said. … 'We have little confidence that information will be safeguarded once it has been released,' Baker said. 'The simple fact is that the financial disclosure rules that the LAPD is about to implement open the Pandora's box, once somebody's financial information is available and public, there is no way to turn back and make it private again.' … In May, U.S. District Judge Gary Feess extended the five-year consent decree for another three years."

Suit Accuses Akin Gump Of Age Bias. The Legal Times (3/6, Schwartz) reports, "The old guard has been getting its dander up. First there was Sidley Austin, where partners are challenging the firm's mandatory retirement policy. … Other lawyers have followed, and just last week one Washington attorney filed suit in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia alleging that he was fired from one of the city's largest firms because he was too old." The Times continues, "Donald Gross, who is in his 50s, says he was let go from Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld in October 2004, not even a year and a half after he was hired as senior counsel in the Korea practice. Before his termination, Gross alleges that his practice group's head, Sukhan Kim, 'reiterated to him that Akin Gump was terminating him not because of any defects in his performance, but because he was "too senior" because of his age and, therefore, "not a good fit."' … Pillsbury Winthrop Shaw Pittman partner Christine Kearns, who is representing Akin Gump, says the firm treated Gross fairly. 'The firm certainly denies the allegations of age discrimination,' she says." The Times adds, "Gross' case differs from some of the other suits that allege more systemic problems or forced retirements. But it paints a picture of the trouble an older attorney had acclimating to life in a law firm."

NYPD Officers Testify To Grand Jury About Killing Of Unarmed Black Man. The New York Times (3/6, Baker, Moynihan) reports, "Two of the five police officers involved in the killing of Sean Bell, an unarmed black man who died in a hail of 50 police bullets, testified yesterday before a grand jury in Queens that is weighing evidence in the case." The Times continues, "The two officers, Detective Paul Headley and Officer Michael Carey, testified voluntarily without immunity from prosecution in the case, officials said. Union officials and lawyers for the men said they had been eager to talk about what occurred on Nov. 25, when they and their colleagues opened fire on Mr. Bell's car outside the Club Kalua strip club in Jamaica, Queens." The Times adds, "Yesterday's events were noteworthy because city police officers who are the focus of grand juries sometimes stay silent about their roles in such shootings. And the first public appearances by the officers — more than three months after the shooting of Mr. Bell — made for a day filled with emotions. … In the morning, Detective Headley, 35, was surrounded by about a dozen people, including his lawyer and union officials, when he strode toward the office building in Queens where the grand jury is seated. He wore a blue suit, stepped confidently and appeared to be at ease. He testified for about two hours and then left the building about 2:30 p.m., again surrounded by supporters. … Officer Carey, 26, arrived later, about 3:30 p.m., also wearing a business suit but appearing tenser as he kept his expression fixed, his eyes set straight ahead. He testified, then left the building about 5:20 p.m. with supporters, including Patrick J. Lynch, the president of the Patrolmen's Benevolent Association, by his side." The Times notes, "Separately, each officer declined to discuss his testimony. But union officials and their lawyers spoke for them. 'My client is relieved that he had the opportunity to answer the questions the grand jury posed to him,' said John Arlia, the lawyer for Detective Headley. 'He is relieved he had the opportunity to speak to them and tell his version of the events.' … Stephen C. Worth, the lawyer for Officer Carey, said, 'This officer stood there and answered all of their questions.' He said his client testified for about an hour and a half."

LAPD Officers Charged In Beating Of Teen. The Los Angeles Times (3/6, Hong) reports, "A 41-year-old LAPD officer was charged today with unlawful use of force and filing a false police report for allegedly choking and punching a 16-year-old boy in the Central Division station in December." The Times continues, "Officer Sean Meade's actions were recorded by a hidden camera that had been installed after some chairs at the station had been vandalized. Police Chief William Bratton and Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa both expressed outrage at the incident. Bratton immediately called for the arrest of Meade." The Times adds, "Department sources who viewed the video said it appears to show Meade choking the boy, then removing his handcuffs and challenging him to a fight. … The teenager was arrested on suspicion of a curfew violation in Chinatown, and Bratton said the attack was without provocation. The boy was picked up about 1:30 a.m. while walking with a teenage girl. Police called the girl's parents, who picked her up, then took the boy to Central Division."

High Court Upholds Colorado Redistricting Map. The AP (3/6, Yost) reports, "The Supreme Court on Monday ruled against Colorado voters challenging a congressional redistricting plan favorable to Democrats." In a unanimous decision, "the justices said that three Republican voters were not entitled to sue in an effort to replace a redistricting plan ordered by a court with one passed by a Republican-controlled state legislature. The three voters were joined by a former Democratic state legislator who often voted with Republicans."

"Don't Ask, Don't Tell" Policy Comes Under New Scrutiny. The Christian Science Monitor (3/6, Lubold, 59K) reports, "'Don't ask, don't tell' – the 14-year-old policy that keeps openly declared gays from serving in the military – is coming under new scrutiny." Although "overturning it remains an unlikely prospect in the near term, given the political explosiveness of the issue," the "needs of war – and a fresh push by gay advocates in the courts and Congress – is pushing the policy back into the limelight." An annual "poll begun in 2003 by the independent Military Times newspapers has shown a yearly increase in support for homosexuals serving openly in the military. Nevertheless, in its latest poll, only 30 percent of a sampling of 6,000 of subscribers approved of the idea."

Transgender Professor Charges Evangelical College With Gender Bias. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, B1, Sataline) reports, "For 15 years, John Nemecek was a respected business professor and associate dean at Spring Arbor University, an evangelical college in Michigan. But after he started wearing makeup and earrings and asked friends to call him Julie, he was demoted, then fired, and told that his womanly appearance violated 'Christian behavior.'" The Journal continues, "Prof. Nemecek is contesting the dismissal under federal discrimination laws, presenting a test in a growing clash between religious and employee rights. The case is the latest of a number of conflicts pitting two constitutional principles against each other: the freedom of religious organizations to operate without government intrusion versus the rights of workers to be free of discrimination based on race, religion, sex or nationality." The Journal adds, "Prof. Nemecek's complaint to the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, scheduled to be heard today, charges that the university, which is affiliated with the Free Methodist Church of North America, violated federal and state civil-rights laws by ordering the professor to groom and dress like a typical male. The school also violated Michigan's law protecting the disabled, the complaint says, because it allegedly treated Prof. Nemecek as if he had a disability that prevented him from doing his job. Spring Arbor declined to comment on the specific allegations in the EEOC complaint. … Since Congress passed the Civil Rights Act in 1964, courts have recognized that churches enjoy a 'ministerial exception' allowing them to discriminate to uphold their beliefs. This right is recognized when it comes to selecting clergy, such as allowing Catholics to exclude women priests, but courts have not settled on the sweep of this exception -- and whether it would cover teachers of secular subjects at religious institutions, says Eugene Volokh, a professor at the University of California Los Angeles School of Law. … Civil-rights groups said they have received a growing number of complaints from gay and transgender employees dismissed for religious and other reasons. … Federal courts have also issued mixed decisions on whether people changing their sex are protected by civil-rights laws, disagreeing over what constitutes discrimination based on sex. … Prof. Nemecek's lawyer is basing her argument on a 1989 U.S. Supreme Court opinion. The justices found that Price Waterhouse engaged in gender stereotyping by illegally denying Ann Hopkins a partnership because of her 'macho' behavior. … That ruling formed the backbone of a 2004 decision in U.S. District Court in Cincinnati. The judge ruled that Salem, Ohio, illegally fired a transsexual firefighter because the U.S. Civil Rights Act protects someone who does not 'act and/or identify with his or her gender.'"

Conservative Professor Settles With Community College Over Firing. The Washington Times (3/6, Richardson) reports from Denver, "Anson Rohr is known as an outspoken critic of global terrorism. Ordinarily, that wouldn't be enough to get a person fired. … But Mr. Rohr says that's what happened after he hung an anti-terrorism poster at his work space, urged a religion professor to present a balanced view of Islam and generally made no secret of his conservative views at Front Range Community College." The Times continues, "After he was fired last year from his job as an administrative assistant, Mr. Rohr sued college officials for violating his free-speech rights. Last week, he agreed to accept an undisclosed financial settlement. … In return, Mr. Rohr, 50, is prohibited from working again at the Westminster, Colo., college. Although he misses the flexible schedule and paycheck, he said, saying goodbye won't be a problem." The Times adds, "Mr. Rohr, who was employed at the college for five years, has a long history of conservative dissent. … He wrote letters to the campus newsletters responding to left-wing articles. He criticized an anti-war presentation at the college. He sent an e-mail to a religion professor asking for information about a course on Islam after hearing that the course presented an unbalanced view. … The last straw, however, was his decision to hang a poster at his desk depicting a scene from the school massacre at Beslan, Russia, where Muslim terrorists killed 334 students and adults in 2004. The print showed a man carrying a dead child. … A faculty member, Julie Voss, saw the poster and wrote an e-mail to administrators asking for its removal, saying she was 'deeply offended,' according to court documents." The Times notes, "Dean of Instruction Therese Brown called Mr. Rohr and ordered him to remove the picture, but he refused, citing his First Amendment rights. He also argued that other college employees were permitted to display signs with political messages. … Mr. Rohr, who had regularly received positive job reviews, said he hung up on the dean after she continued to berate him. She denied the accusation in court documents."

DOJ, FBI Praised For Reopening Civil Rights Cold Cases. The Richmond Times-Dispatch (3/6) editorializes, "An adage teaches that justice delayed is justice denied. In the case of those killed during the fight for civil rights in the mid-20th century, the tardy justice promised by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller is important nonetheless." The Times-Dispatch continues, "Spurred by a string of successful prosecutions of murders dating to the civil-rights era, the Department of Justice and FBI announced they will open investigations into 12 additional unsolved cases. In all, Gonzales and Mueller expressed an interest in 40. To individuals who up to this point 'have quite literally gotten away with murder,' the FBI director spoke with clarity: 'You've not gotten away with anything. We're still on your trail.'" The Times-Dispatch adds, "Every murder is heinous, and all perpetrators should answer for their crimes. Yet those killed in the cases the DOJ and FBI have reopened often died only because they had dark brown skin. These victims deserve the special attention Washington will now focus on them. Society deserves the attention, too. The prosecutions serve a penitential function. … If the individuals who committed these crimes are still alive, they should be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law, no matter how elderly the assailants or their conspirators. This rights a specific wrong, and it sends a proper message about the rule of law to the communities these crimes were calculated to intimidate. In these instances justice delayed is justice served."

NYTimes Praises Crist's Proposal To Restore Felons' Voting Rights. The New York Times (3/6,

1.16M) editorializes, "Florida is notorious for running elections badly, but its new governor is trying to fix one of the state's most unjust and undemocratic practices. He has called for tearing down the barriers that prevent as many as 950,000 ex-offenders from voting. The United States stands alone in the free world when it comes to laws that strip convicted felons of the right to vote -- sometimes for life -- even after they complete their sentences and go on to crime-free lives. … Gov. Charlie Crist has a better idea: automatically restoring voting rights to felons who complete their sentences. … That's an excellent proposal."

Intel Says Emails Related To AMD Antitrust Case May Be Lost. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, B5, Clark) reports, "Intel Corp. said it may have lost many internal emails that it is obliged to produce for rival Advanced Micro Devices Inc. and other plaintiffs in high-profile antitrust litigation. … The disclosure -- which could further complicate AMD's antitrust suit against Intel -- comes as AMD warned that it expects to miss its first-quarter revenue target amid an intensifying battle with Intel, its far larger competitor." The Journal continues, "An Intel spokesman said it couldn't yet estimate the number of missing emails, expressing optimism that it will be able to recover most of them. Richard Horwitz, a lawyer representing Intel, wrote the judge overseeing the litigation that the company 'very much regrets this happened.'" The Journal adds, "AMD sued Intel in June 2005, accusing the company of using a variety of improper tactics to maintain a monopoly in sales of microprocessors that provide the calculating power for most personal computers and server systems. Private antitrust suits on behalf of Intel shareholders followed. Intel has insisted that its tactics are fair and legal. The AMD suit against Intel was filed in U.S. District Court in Delaware. … The wide-ranging cases touch on Intel's dealings with many computer makers, retailers and other companies. Chuck Mulloy, the Intel spokesman, said the company has already produced 17 million pages of documents to plaintiffs as of last week. … Mr. Horwitz's letter, and a court filing by AMD, point to a series of foul-ups in saving documents. Among other things, Intel continued to operate a system that automatically deleted employees' emails every 35 days. Employees designated as likely to have relevant documents were asked to identify and move them to avoid the automatic document purge. The company in October 2005 also began creating backup tapes of emails once a week from those employees as a last resort if there were lapses in individuals' data-retention efforts."

CNET News.com (3/6, Krazit) reports, "AMD was quick to respond to Intel's disclosure. 'Through what appears to be a combination of gross communication failures, an ill-conceived plan of document retention and lackluster oversight by outside counsel, Intel has apparently allowed evidence to be destroyed,' AMD said in a filing Monday with the U.S. District Court in Delaware." CNET adds, "The day after AMD filed suit, Intel preserved the data on its network, and later sent notices asking about 600 employees to retain specific information, the company said in its letter to Farnan. However, it did not instruct those employees to preserve e-mails from their 'sent' folders, and since Intel automatically erases e-mails older than a few weeks or months--depending on the employee--those messages could be gone. … The company also failed to send document-retention notices to employees identified in 2006 as additional targets for the document-retention policy, despite having put them on such a list. And despite having preserved data on its network after the complaint was filed, the company has identified "a small number of backup tapes" in its Munich offices that were erased." CNET notes, "Intel thinks it can assemble some of the missing documents by combing through other documents it has already preserved, said Chuck Mulloy, an Intel spokesman. For example, sent e-mails likely received a reply that was preserved in the sender's inbox, or other Intel employees on the list might have been copied on the sent e-mail and it would have appeared in their inbox. … Also, many of the e-mails in question might have been preserved on weekly backup tapes set up in October 2005 to capture documents from several hundred employees. However, not all the employees on the list were migrated to a special e-mail server set up for that purpose, and some of the tapes have been 'recycled,' Intel said in its letter."

Alltel Reportedly Shopping Itself To AT&T, Others. The San Antonio Express-News (3/6, Nowlin) reports, "Wireless communications provider Alltel Corp. reportedly is shopping itself to AT&T Inc. and other potential buyers, but it's unclear how likely it is to reach a deal, analysts said." The Express-News continues, "Alltel, based in Little Rock, Ark., has talked with AT&T, Verizon Communications Inc. and private equity firms about a buyout, the Wall Street Journal reported Monday. Talks for a sale of the nation's fifth-largest wireless carrier still are in early stages, the paper said, citing people familiar with the negotiations. … However, Alltel's $22 billion market value could be a significant obstacle to the deal, analysts said. Based on the company's current stock price, a bidder would need to spend $30 billion or more to close a transaction." The Express-News adds, "AT&T also could have other reservations about buying Alltel, experts said. … The nation's largest phone company has expanded aggressively with a string of big buyouts. However, AT&T closed its $86 billion takeover of BellSouth Corp. late last year amid intense regulatory scrutiny and may not think another big deal would pass antitrust review. … What's more, Alltel uses a different wireless technology than AT&T, meaning the acquiring company would need to replace equipment and handsets to convert customers to its system. … Even so, analysts said, a takeover of Alltel isn't without appeal for AT&T and its largest wireless rival, Verizon. Many expected Alltel to seek a buyer once it spun off its landline phone business last year."

Memo Shows Microsoft Threatened To Abandon Macintosh Office In 1997. Computerworld (3/6) reports, "Microsoft Corp. threatened to dump the Macintosh version of Office 10 years ago during talks with Apple Inc. because the move would 'do a great deal of harm' to its rival, according to a memo made public in a recently-settled antitrust case." Computerworld continues, "The 1997 memo from Ben Waldman, at the time the head of Microsoft's Macintosh development group, to then-CEO Bill Gates, urged Mac Office 97's release. The suite, which in June 1997 had not yet reached beta, was eventually released as Office 98 in March 1998. … But Waldman understood that the next Mac Office was a stick that could be used against Apple. 'The threat to cancel Mac Office 97 is certainly the strongest bargaining point we have, as doing so will do a great deal of harm to Apple immediately. I also think that Apple is taking this threat pretty seriously,' Waldman said in his e-mail to Gates." Computerworld adds, "Less than six weeks after Waldman's e-mail, Microsoft and Apple announced a deal under which the former bought $150 million of Apple stock. As part of the pact, Microsoft promised to release the next version of Office and was allowed to bundle Internet Explorer with the Mac OS. The two companies also agreed to a patent cross-licensing deal. … At the time, Apple was struggling. Steve Jobs had returned to the company only months before, and share prices were at all-time lows. The Microsoft-Apple agreement was seen by many as a bail-out of Apple by its long-time rival. … Later, the U.S. Department of Justice included the bundling of Internet Explorer among the charges it brought against Microsoft in its antitrust case. 'Microsoft, by threatening to cease development of its Office for Macintosh productivity suite, coerced Apple into making Internet Explorer the default browser on all Macintosh operating systems and to disadvantage competing browsers,' the federal agency charged in 1998." … Waldman also wrote in the memo -- which was revealed in the recently-settled Iowa antitrust case against Microsoft -- that keeping Mac Office alive was a good idea because the suite's users could be used as guinea pigs to test new features."

CreditSuisse Upgrades Value Of CME, CBOT Stocks. The AP (3/6) reports, "Shares of Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc. and CBOT Holdings Inc. jumped Monday, as a CreditSuisse analyst upgraded the two commodities exchanges." The AP continues, "Analyst Howard Chen upgraded both stocks to 'Outperform' from 'Neutral.' CBOT, which operates the Chicago Board of Trade, accepted an $8 billion buyout offer from CME in October. Shareholders will vote on the deal April 4. Chen said the future CME Group Inc. will benefit from recent market volatility due to its diverse products." The AP adds, "CME is the world's largest exchange trade, while CBOT is the main U.S. bond market. The Department of Justice is reviewing the deal."

EU Gives Antitrust Nod To Areva's Bid For Repower. Bloomberg (3/6, Mcgee) reports, "Areva SA, the world's biggest maker of nuclear power plants, won European Union antitrust approval for its 600 million-euro ($786 million) bid for German wind turbine-maker Repower Systems AG." Bloomberg continues, The European Commission, the EU's Brussels-based antitrust regulator, announced the approval today after reviewing the transaction under a simplified procedure. … Suzlon Energy Ltd., India's biggest builder of wind turbines, on Feb. 9 offered 1.02 billion euros ($1.34 billion) for the German company, or 20 percent more than Areva's earlier bid. Repower's management is 'interested' in the offer, Suzlon said March 2. Alstom hasn't raised its price." Bloomberg adds, "Tulsi Tanti, Suzlon's chairman, is 'quite confident' that the bid will be successful, he said on a conference call last week. The offer is being made together with Martifer, a unit of Portuguese builder Mota-Engil SGPS SA that already owns a quarter of Repower. Areva would be a 'fitting strategic partner,' the German company said on Feb. 19 without endorsing either offer."

DaimlerChrysler Keeping Deal Options Open. The Financial Times (3/6, Reed, Simon) reports, "For the three weeks since DaimlerChrysler raised the prospect of decoupling the Detroit end of the US-German carmaker, merger talk, fevered rumours and even conspiracy theories have proliferated in an industry that has seen no large-scale tie-ups or dramatic partings since General Motors and Fiat severed their alliances in 2005." The Times continues, "The Stuttgart group's revelation that, after nine years, 'all options are on the table' for Chrysler was accompanied by the disclosure of a $1.4bn (€1.07bn, £728m) loss at the US unit last year - and the decision was not sudden. People familiar with the situation have told the Financial Times that DaimlerChrysler made the announcement on its lawyers' recommendation, be-cause of advanced talks on Chrysler's future." The Times adds, "JPMorgan Chase had already been advising on options that are said to include a sale in full or part, or a flotation. It also emerged that the bank had contacted several private equity houses, which are in discussion with others including Wolfgang Bernhard, former

Chrysler chief operating officer, about a possible consortium bid. … Perhaps most intriguingly, Fritz Henderson, GM's chief financial officer, has assembled a task team to explore a possible alliance between the world's largest carmaker and its crosstown rival. According to people close to the process, DaimlerChrysler has considered the idea of accepting a stakeholding in GM as payment for part or all of Chrysler. … If implemented, the solution would be financially expedient for the cash-strapped GM. It would also be politically smart for DaimlerChrysler, which would not want to be seen as having dumped its US unit unceremoniously."

Microsoft Blasts Google Over Copyright Policy. The Financial Times (3/6, Gapper) reports, "Microsoft on Tuesday launches a fierce attack on Google over its 'cavalier' approach to copyright, accusing the internet company of exploiting books, music, films and television programmes without permission." The Times continues, "Tom Rubin, associate general counsel for Microsoft, will say in a speech in New York that while authors and publishers find it hard to cover costs, 'companies that create no content of their own, and make money solely on the back of other people's content, are raking in billions through advertising and initial public offerings'. … Mr Rubin's remarks, presaged in an article in Tuesday's Financial Times, come as Google faces criticism and legal pressure from media companies over services allowing users to search online for books, films, television programmes and news. Viacom, the US media group, instructed YouTube, which Google owns, to remove 100,000 clips of copyright material." The Times adds, "The Authors Guild and a group of publishers backed by the Association of American Publishers have separately sued Google for making digital copies of copyrighted books from libraries without permission. … Mr Rubin will tell the AAP's annual meeting that Google's decision to take digital copies of all books in various library collections, unless publishers tell it not to, 'systematically violates copyright, deprives authors and publishers of an important avenue for monetising their works and, in doing so, undermines incentives to create'. … He will say Google is breaching copyright law because it has 'bestowed upon itself the unilateral right to make entire copies of copyrighted books'. Google thinks it is acting legally because it publishes only 'snippets' of copyrighted works unless it has the publisher's permission. "

Citigroup Seeks Control Of Nikko Cordial. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A10, Morse) reports, "Citigroup Inc. was poised to announce a tender offer to acquire more than 50% of Nikko Cordial Corp., a person familiar with the situation said. The prospective deal, which could be valued at as much as $5 billion, would be the biggest acquisition of a Japanese brokerage company by a foreign company. … Though the sides were close to an agreement, terms of a deal hadn't been finalized, the person said." The Journal continues, "Such a move would come as Tokyo-based Nikko Cordial looks to shore up its business, which has been hurt by an accounting scandal that erupted last December. An internal investigation by the brokerage firm, Japan's third-largest by revenue, revealed that it had inflated its earnings for two years, prompting an exodus of clients. … The Tokyo Stock Exchange is considering whether to delist the company." The Journal adds, "In a statement, Nikko Cordial said 'negotiations [with Citigroup] are being carried out from various perspectives.' … New York-based Citigroup and Nikko Cordial have long-standing ties. Citigroup recapitalized Nikko Cordial in 1998 and the two companies formed a joint venture investment bank, Nikko Cititgroup Ltd., which handles mergers-and-acquisitions advice and equity and debt underwritings. Citigroup still owns a little less than 5% of Nikko Cordial."

Blackstone Purchases Madame Tussauds Chain. The Washington Post (3/6, D3, Cho) reports, "Private-equity giant Blackstone Group said yesterday that it had created the world's second-largest theme park group, behind Walt Disney Co., with its $1.9 billion buyout of Madame Tussauds waxworks museums." The Post continues, "Madame Tussauds will be managed by Merlin Entertainments Group, which is controlled by Blackstone. The combined company said it will operate 50 theme parks throughout the world, including Legoland, Sea Life and the London Eye. They drew more than 30 million visitors in 2006, second only to Disney's parks." The Post adds, "The move by Blackstone is part of an aggressive push into the theme park business that began two years ago with its acquisition of Merlin, an international theme park company, for $187 million. It then backed Merlin's purchase of the Legoland chain later in 2005 and Gardaland, Italy's biggest theme park, last fall. … Blackstone, one of the largest private-equity firms in the world, also was a member of the group that bought Universal Studios in Orlando and is an investor in Six Flags theme parks. Last month Blackstone made a huge splash by closing the biggest buyout deal ever when it purchased Equity Office Properties Trust for $39 billion." The Post notes, "Merlin executives said they planned to focus on expanding the wax museum company, which has 14 million visitors a year and operates six museums around the world, as well as other theme parks, hotels and a castle in Europe. It recently bought the London Eye, a giant observatory in that city and one of England's most popular attractions."

A&P Agrees To Buy Rival Pathmark. The Philadelphia Inquirer (3/6, Brubaker) reports, "The Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. Inc., the owner of Super Fresh, said yesterday that it had agreed to buy rival Pathmark Stores Inc. in a deal worth up to $1.3 billion, including the assumption of debt. The cash and stock portion of the deal was $689.7 million." The Inquirer continues, "The combined company would have 54 stores in the eight-county Philadelphia region with more than $1 billion in annual sales, making it the third-largest supermarket chain here behind Acme Markets Inc. and ShopRite Group P.L.C. … The Pathmark banner - which has a strong presence in urban neighborhoods - will remain, said executives at Great Atlantic, which is best known for its A&P stores." The Inquirer adds, "The deal is subject to review by the Federal Trade Commission and shareholder approval. … A&P said it expected the merged companies to cut $150 million in annual expenses within two years, but industry observers were skeptical about the combination of the two struggling chains. … Dutch company Royal Ahold N.V. tried to buy Pathmark in 1999, but backed out after the FTC demanded the sale of a large number of stores to maintain competitive markets. … An antitrust expert said he was confident that the FTC would look at the proposed acquisition carefully. 'The FTC will want to know what new chains or additional food retailers have come into Long Island and North Jersey,' said James Fishkin, a partner in Dechert L.L.P.'s Washington office who worked at the FTC for 15 years before entering private practice in 2002. He worked on the FTC review of Ahold's proposed purchase of Pathmark."

Alaskan Bridge Projects Going Forward. The New York Times (3/6, Yardley, 1.16M) reports, "Long after Congress removed about $450 million in budget earmarks for two bridges in the Alaskan exurbs, the fight over whether to build them is not dead." Although "mocked as 'bridges to nowhere' by critics who saw them as the epitome of Congressional excess, preparations for the projects have been slowly moving forward even as big questions remain over whether the bridges will be built." When Congress "removed the earmarks for the bridges in 2005, it still gave the state the money, but it allowed Alaskan officials to decide how to spend it. The state reserved about $200 million for the proposed bridges, far less than the construction costs but enough to show that there was serious intent to complete the projects. Some environmental and planning work has already been done."

Documentary Calls Global Warming A "Scam." The Washington Times (3/6, Webb, 88K) reports, "With a packet of claims that are almost certain to defy conventional wisdom, a television documentary to be aired in Britain this week condemns man-made global warming as a myth that has become 'the biggest scam of modern times.'" The program "dismisses claims that high levels of greenhouse gases generated by human activity causes climate change. Instead, the program suggests that the sun itself is the real culprit." The documentary's director, Martin Durkin says "global warming 'is a multibillion-dollar worldwide industry, created by fanatically anti-industrial environmentalists, supported by scientists peddling scare stories to chase funding, and propped up by compliant politicians and the media.'" Channel 4, which is airing the program, "says that [it] features 'an impressive roll-call of experts,' including nine professors, who are experts in climatology, oceanography, meteorology, biogeography and paleoclimatology."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

US Indicts 14 In Smashing Texas Heroin Ring. The Austin American-Statesman (3/6) reports, "Austin police say 14 members of a heroin-trafficking organization have been indicted after a nearly two-year investigation." The American-Statesman continues, "Police said in a written statement that in mid-2005, the department's Organized Crime Narcotic Conspiracy Unit began investigating three brothers — Henry Castro, 30, Rene Gaitan Castro, 35, and Randy Gaitan Castro, 24, for suspected heroin trafficking. … The Drug Enforcement Administration and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms later joined in the investigation, and Austin police said officers 'made repeated seizures of heroin packaged within balloons for distribution, as well as seizures of 'black tar' heroin that had not been processed for distribution.' … The investigation comes on the heels of another major heroin trafficking case, police said. In November, a federal judge sentenced 17 members of the so-called 'Celedon' heroin trafficking organization. Fifteen received prison terms, while two received probation. Louis Celedon Jr., 31, received a 20-year prison sentence."

The KVUE-TV (3/6, Koski) reports, "In late 2005, a drug operation based in Southeast Austin was shut down. Investigators say that success opened the door for the Castro brothers. At that time undercover agents were wrapping up a crackdown on the Celedon drug family. That is when, according to investigators, three young brothers decided to move in and take over what the Celedon family lost. The group, police say, was lead by Henry, Rene and Randy Castro. … According to a federal indictment, the Castro drug business from Mexico to North Texas."

KTCB-TV, Austin (3/5) reported Austin police "say the city's biggest heroin dealers are out of business and behind bars. The bust is a result of a long-term joint operation with the federal government. Police say 14 people were involved with selling and distributing black-tar heroin or heroin from Mexico."

Eleven Accused In Nationwide Drug Ring Arraigned In New York. The New York Times (3/6, Confessore, Kovaleski) reports eleven people "accused of playing a role in a nationwide illegal prescription drug ring were arraigned [in Albany] on Monday, part of what prosecutors said was a broadening investigation into the recreational use of steroids and human growth hormone. … All 11 suspects have pleaded not guilty. … According to a law enforcement official familiar with the investigation, two people affiliated with Anti-Aging Centers are expected to surrender to the authorities on Tuesday."

The AP (3/6) reports, "People in three states have been arrested so far and as many as 24 could face felony charges. … Major league baseball players Gary Matthews Jr. and Jerry Hairston Jr., former slugger Jose Canseco and former heavyweight champion Evander Holyfield reportedly were on a customer list at Applied Pharmacy in Mobile, Ala., one of the two pharmacies raided. The NFL is looking into reports that a Pittsburgh Steelers doctor, Richard Rydze, was on the customer list of Signature Pharmacy in Florida, whose owners have been indicted by a grand jury in Albany."

Report: Notorious Brooklyn Gang Leader Admits Involvement With More Than 80 Shootings. The New York Post (3/5) reported John "Bloody Hatchet" Hatcher "has admitted to involvement in more than 80 shootings - including 30 homicides - while operating a notorious gang that made tens of millions of dollars selling crack, cocaine and marijuana. During a two-decade reign of terror, Hatcher and his gang, The Rugby Boys, littered the streets in the heart of Brooklyn with victims and bodies, authorities said. 'He was the crack epidemic,' said John Gilbride, special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration's New York Office." Hatcher's "ring flourished like no other, before the DEA finally mounted a six-year operation buying $10 bags of crack that snared him. Rather than face a possible death-sentence prosecution, Hatcher, 43, spilled his guts."

UN Says Afghanistan's 2007 Opium Poppy Cultivation Could Expand. The AP (3/6) reports Afghanistan's 2007 opium poppy cultivation "could expand again after last year's record crop, the U.N. drug agency said Monday, underlining the weakness of an internationally backed drive against the country's booming narcotics trade. The Office on Drugs and Crime predicted an increase in a string of provinces, including southern Helmand — Afghanistan's largest poppy-growing region and an area wracked by a growing number of Taliban attacks. … The U.N. said poppy cultivation occurred in 100% of villages it visited in Helmand province; 93% of villages were growing opium poppies in neighboring Kandahar, the Taliban's former stronghold. The U.N. report did not detail how many villages were visited."

The New York Times (3/6, Gall) reports, "Although some of the country is showing a decrease in poppy cultivation this year, the south, which has been plagued by the insurgency and traditionally has been the biggest source of poppies, is showing a continued increase, 'which may result in an overall increase in opium poppy cultivation in 2007,' the report said."

BBC News (3/6) reports the UN "says although production of poppies…has fallen in the north and centre, a sharp rise is likely in the lawless south. It also cites a dramatic increase in cannabis growing, which it describes as a new and disturbing trend."

IMMIGRATION:

Congress Seen As Unlikely To Pass Immigration Reform. Roll Call (3/6, Stanton) reports, "With Republicans looking to regain control of the Senate and Democrats hoping to pad their majority in 2008, neither party appears inclined to make the political sacrifices necessary to pass a broad immigration bill this year and may be content to simply duel to a rhetorical draw this summer, lawmakers and strategists in both parties said." Leaders from both parties, Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy and Sen. Edward Kennedy "have all vowed to pass reform legislation this year, and Kennedy has been meeting with the White House and presidential hopeful Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) in recent weeks to work out a new compromise bill." But "despite these efforts, it still appears unlikely that comprehensive reforms will move out of the chamber before electoral concerns kill the bill." Roll Call adds, "In fact, GOP and Democratic aides contend that both parties may be best served by a political impasse over the issue, since such a scenario would allow Members to show they are standing firm on the hot-button issue while avoiding compromises that may upset base voters."

Chamber Of Commerce Opposes Hazleton Immigration Ordinance. USA Today (3/6, 2B, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) reports, "The US Chamber of Commerce Monday threw its considerable weight behind efforts to eliminate a groundbreaking Hazleton, Pa., law penalizing businesses that hire illegal workers and landlords who rent to them. The Hazleton ordinance, which also makes English the official language of the small town," has been challenged by the ACLU in a lawsuit set for trial next week. The Chamber "filed a legal document Monday in US District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania backing the ACLU position and calling the law unconstitutional" on the grounds that it "is pre-empted by federal law" and "violates due process protections because it doesn't give a business accused of hiring an illegal worker the right to challenge an allegation before losing its right to operate."

LATimes Criticizes Mexican Immigration Laws. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (3/6, 850K) writes, "When House Republicans last year sought to make the mere presence of illegal immigrants in the United States a felony punishable by one year in prison, the odious legislation sparked international condemnation. No country was more loudly indignant than Mexico." However, Mexico, where "foreign immigrants in Mexico illegally have been subject to prison sentences of two years" since 1974, is "hardly in a position to criticize."

TAX:

MyCFO Sold Tax Shelter Deal Later Nixed By IRS. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A1, Waldman) reports, "John Doerr is the dean of Silicon Valley venture capitalists, one who helped launch tech icons like Google and Sun Microsystems. A billionaire, he works with rock star Bono to fight poverty in Africa and with others to increase aid for education and medical research." The Journal continues, "Mr. Doerr is less well known for one investment that didn't pan out. Called myCFO Inc., the firm set out to provide rich people a full menu of financial services, from wealth management to estate planning. It succeeded with only one: tax shelters that helped clients shield hundreds of millions of dollars from taxes. Less than two years after myCFO began selling them in 2000, the Internal Revenue Service said they were bogus." The Journal adds, "MyCFO ceased independent operations five years ago, but it still casts a shadow. A bank that underwrote some of its tax deals has admitted that they were shams. Former clients, hit with back-tax bills, are fighting the IRS. Two ex-clients have alleged that myCFO's tax deals were fraudulent. … Two lawyers who worked with myCFO are under tax-fraud indictment for their work on similar tax shelters. The Manhattan U.S. attorney's office, which has charged more than a dozen people in connection with tax shelters, said in a court filing last April that it had 'an ongoing criminal investigation' involving 'various former employees of myCFO.' … The financial backers and board members of myCFO were Silicon Valley royalty. They included James H. Clark, co-founder of Netscape Communications and Silicon Graphics; John Chambers of Cisco Systems Inc.; Thomas Jermoluk, former chairman of Excite@Home; and former Netscape boss James Barksdale. The firm's outside legal counsel was Larry Sonsini, lawyer to Silicon Valley's stars. … The firm was Mr. Clark's idea. Mr. Doerr led its financing and took a leading role on the board. In typical Silicon Valley fashion, board members were closely involved with strategy and operations, according to company documents and legal papers reviewed by The Wall Street Journal. The documents show that directors pushed ahead with the tax-shelter business despite signs that all wasn't right with the product."

US Looking For Ways To Close Tax Gap. USA Today (3/6, 1B, Block) reports, "If you're self-employed, sell used items occasionally on eBay or own a home, now would be a good time to start keeping really good records. Your tax returns could receive more scrutiny, thanks to a growing push to narrow the 'tax gap' — the billions of dollars in federal taxes that go uncollected every year." USA continues, "Democrats and Republicans don't agree on much, but they do share a desire to narrow the tax gap. That's not surprising. The IRS estimates that the tax gap exceeds more than $300 billion a year. Collecting even half that amount would let Congress repeal the alternative minimum tax — a parallel tax system that increasingly threatens middle-income taxpayers — without raising taxes or cutting government programs." USA adds, "Taxpayers like the idea of closing the tax gap, too. More than 86% of taxpayers believe that cheating on income taxes is unacceptable, according to a survey released last month by the IRS Oversight Board. … But closing the tax gap is a lot more complicated than chasing down the proverbial deadbeats who hide money under the mattress. Government proposals to narrow the gap would affect people who probably don't think of themselves as scofflaws. And tax experts say the IRS can't make a serious dent in the tax gap unless it conducts more audits. … The IRS estimates that unpaid taxes from individuals, as opposed to big corporations, account for more than 70% of the tax gap. And within that group, the self-employed are considered the biggest offenders. Sole proprietors who underreport their income and self-employment taxes account for roughly one-third of the tax gap, the IRS says." USA notes, "The Treasury Department has proposed requiring credit card companies to report to the IRS payments made to small businesses and other self-employed workers. That would allow the IRS to compare the self-employed workers' tax returns with the payments and determine whether they're underreporting their income. … But groups representing small-business owners worry that the proposal could increase the costs that credit card companies charge small businesses. More fundamentally, they say, the IRS figures fail to distinguish between sole proprietors who deliberately hide income and those who make honest mistakes."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Congress Hears Emotional Testimony From Soldiers About Walter Reed. Lawmakers yesterday heard testimony, described in media reports as "riveting," and "heart wrenching," from wounded servicemen and family members about poor living conditions and a bureaucratic morass during treatment at Walter Reed Army Hospital. Members of a House Oversight and Government Reform subcommittee also grilled top Army officials and medical officers about substandard conditions at Walter Reed and throughout the military medical system.

The emotional hearings were the top story on ABC and CBS last night, and garnered significant attention from major daily newspapers and wire services. ABC World News (3/5, lead story, 3:00, Kerley, 8.78M) reported, "Members of Congress that were here today say the problems are beyond the walls of Walter Reed." Rep. Henry Waxman: "What is going on here is Walter Reed may be the tip of the iceberg of what's going on all around the country." Kerley: "Annette McLeod had to take a leave to help her husband, Dell, through the red tape and paperwork." Annette McLeod: "My life was ripped apart the day that Dell was injured. But then having to live through the mess we've had to live through at Walter Reed has been worse than anything I've had to sacrifice in my life." Kerley: "That prompted an apology from the General who a week ago was dismissing reports of substandard care. George Weightman was fired as head of Walter Reed." In addition, an "internal Army investigation found 87 deficiencies within the entire medical system in the Army."

The CBS Evening News (3/5, lead story, 2:30, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The bullet that cost Sergeant Dan Shannon his left eye still leaves him groping for words. But when a House Committee investigating conditions at Walter Reed Army Medical Center asked time key question of the day, he let it rip." Sgt. Shannon: "My biggest concern?" Unidentified member: "Yes, sir." Sgt. Shannon: "My biggest concern is having the young men and women that have had their lives shattered getting taken care of." Martin: "The most riveting testimony came from the wife of a National Guard soldier injured in Iraq." Annette McLeod "told of battling a system that wanted to blame her husband's mental problems not on his head injury but a preexisting condition." Annette McLeod: "He was considered fit enough to serve in the National Guard for 16 years. He was fit enough for deployment, but now they were saying his mental problems he had before he went to Iraq."

NBC Nightly News (3/5, story 3, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "This was an emotional day in Washington where the topic was the unfolding scandal over treatment at Walter Reed Army Hospital." NBC (Miklaszewski) added, "Today's testimony was heart wrenching." Spc. Jeremy Duncan: "It was like a ghetto." Miklaszewski: "Specialist Jeremy Duncan wounded in Iraq is the one who blew the whistle on conditions at Walter Reed." Spc. Duncan: "It was unforgivable for anyone to live in the room like that." Miklaszewski: "Congressional lawmakers were outraged. Their wrath aimed primarily at the Army's Surgeon General, Lieutenant General Kevin Kiley, former commander at Walter Reed."

On NBC Nightly News (3/5, story 4, 1:20, Williams, 9.87M), Washington Post reporter Dana Priest said the problem is "quite large. We have received thousands of tips, documents, stories pouring in from all over the country from Army and Navy facilities, from people in Baghdad where you are. They are coming from soldiers and family members and veterans and doctors and nurses. And they all have one message and that is it is not just Walter Reed. They are talking about a dysfunctional bureaucracy. About neglect, about indifference from people who treat them. About substandard housing. And really, many, many of them are coming and telling us about horror stories in veteran's hospitals all over the word. These are issues that the government says it will start to address."

USA Today/AP (3/6, 2A, Flaherty) reports Army leaders "said Monday that they accept responsibility for substandard conditions at the service's flagship Walter Reed Army Medical Center but also said they hadn't known about most of the problems." At an "emotional House subcommittee hearing at the hospital, lawmakers suggested the failings go far beyond the hospital for wounded soldiers in Washington. They demanded action. Military leaders — and Vice President Cheney — promised they'd get it." Meanwhile, Veterans Affairs Secretary James Nicholson "said his office will hire 100 patient advocates, speed benefit claims and improve medical screenings for veterans at its facilities." On NPR's All Things Considered, Nicholson said, "Our goal is to do things that serve the veterans in the manner that they deserve the best way that we can."

McClatchy (3/6, Goldstein) reports the generals "in charge were apologetic, even as several said they were unaware of the conditions that blackened the reputation of the Army's premier medical facility." Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, said, "I couldn't be madder; I couldn't be more embarrassed. I'm ashamed." McClatchy adds McLeod, Duncan and Shannon "described a system in which the injured have to justify their wounds in order to earn their disability payments. They said that Army medical personnel can diagnose their conditions, but case managers can question the diagnoses, prolonging their ordeal."

The Los Angeles Times (3/6, Neuman, 850K) reports Gen. Weightman, "who was fired after reports of substandard medical care for veterans at Walter Reed Army Medical Center said today he agreed with critics that there was a failure of leadership at the facility." Weightman, who "headed Walter Reed for less than a year, acknowledged he did not realize how frustrated veterans and their families had become in dealing with a gargantuan bureaucracy overwhelmed by injured soldiers returning from war." The committee "also heard from the Army's top brass. Gen. Peter Schoomaker, chief of staff of the Army, said he was 'extraordinarily angry and embarrassed' by the disclosures."

The Washington Post (3/6, A1, Abramowitz, Vogel, 690K) reports in a front page story under the headline, "Army Chiefs Plead Ignorance, But Lawmakers Are Skeptical," that lawmakers "expressed skepticism that the generals had been unaware of the problems until they were spotlighted by the media two weeks ago." Lawmakers – "Democrats and Republicans alike -- seemed receptive to the candor voiced at the hearing of a panel of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, but they also cited earlier warnings from internal memos, government audits and news reports."

USA Today (3/6, Stanglin, 2.27M) reports Chairman Tierney "said problems at" Walter Reed "are only the 'tip of the iceberg' of poor treatment that extends throughout the military health care system." Tierney said, "Rats and cockroaches don't burrow and infest overnight. Mold and holes in ceilings don't occur in a week. And complaints of bureaucratic indifference have been reported for years." Tierney also "suggested that the treatment of a large number of wounded soldiers from Iraq reflected 'terrible planning' by the administration over the war."

On MSNBC's Hardball (3/5), Tierney said, "I hear from my colleagues who were on this committee in the last session - I was not, I was on leave of absence - that they actually did have some hearings on this issue. And when they had witnesses in from the Army, they were assured that all of the matters that were brought up before them were being dealt with. Obviously, that turns out not to be the case." Rep. David Dreier said, "There is bipartisan horror and outrage over this. We have an all-volunteer military. And Chairman Tierney knows very well that one of the most difficult -- the most difficult -- thing that we do is to talk to the families of those who've lost their lives in Iraq and Afghanistan, or anyplace in the world. And as we try to encourage people to serve in our military, the thought of not providing them with adequate care, to see something like building 18 is just outrageous."

Roll Call (3/6, Singer) reports Democrats "suggested that weak Republican oversight contributed to the problems experienced by wounded soldiers there." Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) "issued a statement proclaiming the beginning of 'long overdue oversight of the Bush administration.'" Roll Call adds Republicans "rejected the notion that they had failed to investigate conditions at Walter Reed, and cited a range of hearings and oversight activities on military health care that preceded the Democratic majority."

The New York Times (3/6, Luo, 1.16M) reports members of Congress "heard wrenching testimony on Monday from wounded soldiers treated at Walter Reed Army Medical Center and contrite promises from top Army officials to correct the conditions there." The Bush Administration "has been thrown on the defensive, and members of Congress have been quick to express outrage."

The Hill (3/6, Kaplan) reports the Walter Reed hearing "could further pressure Democratic leaders to adopt a more stringent approach to paying for the war in Iraq. House Democratic leaders are considering how to proceed on several war-related spending bills. After passing a resolution condemning Bush's troops surge with just 17 Republican votes, Democrats spent last week discussing how to challenge President Bush's authority to manage the war." A Democratic aide said, "The real pressure will be on Republicans to support our troops by voting for the supplemental spending bill." Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.), "chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC), attended yesterday's hearing and said he saw 'political dangers' ahead for the Bush administration." Van Hollen added the scandal "adds further support for the Democrats' position 'that the administration just botched this war from the beginning, not just in Iraq but to address the needs of returning soldiers,' he added."

The Los Angeles Times (3/6, Neuman, Schreck, 850K) reports the story under the headline, "Walter Reed Hearing Brings Outrage And Apologies," noting that "top Army officials faced angry lawmakers during an emotional hearing Monday on shoddy medical treatment and living conditions at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, acknowledging that they had failed in the care of wounded veterans." Rep. Henry Waxman said the "scandal at Walter Reed" was "the tip of the iceberg of what is going on all around the country." Waxman "said veterans and their families were 'flooding us with complaints' about bad medical care."

Cheney Promises Quick Action To Remedy Army Medical Care Deficiencies. ABC World News (3/5, story 2, :30, Vargus, 8.78M) reported, "Vice President Cheney promised, on behalf of the Bush Administration, to change the way injured troops are treated. He told a gathering of war veterans that President Bush is creating a commission looking at the care being given to wounded servicemen and women when they return from war. And that fixing the Army's most fabled hospital would come first." Vice President Cheney: "There will be no excuses, only action. And the Federal bureaucracy will not slow that action down. We're going to fix the problems at Walter Reed, period."

The CBS Evening News (3/5, story 2, :25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "President Bush is appointing a bipartisan commission, and in an address to a veterans group today, Vice President Cheney promised quick action."

Acceptance Of Responsibility By Kiley, Weightman Contrasted. In the Washington Post's "Washington Sketch" column (3/6, A1), Dana Milbank says, Kevin Kiley, "the three-star general in charge of all Army medical facilities, seemed stumped as he testified yesterday about his responsibility for the Walter Reed scandal. 'I'm trying not to say that I'm not accountable,' he told members of the House oversight committee. But try as he might, he couldn't fix blame on himself." Sitting "shoulder to shoulder with Kiley was one such commander, Gen. George Weightman, who last week was fired as chief of Walter Reed after just six months on the job. Weightman and Kiley, who ran Walter Reed from 2002 to 2004, wore matching Army dress uniforms, but their responses could not have been more divergent. While Kiley deflected blame, Weightman freely admitted failure -- even though the victims of Walter Reed's neglect testified, and the House committee members agreed, that he was not to blame."

WPost Says Army Needs To Revamp Hospitals, Bureaucracy. The Washington Post (3/6, 690K) editorializes about the Walter Reed scandal, "Being sorry is only the first step ... Fixing veterans' outpatient care will take a lot more than putting a new roof on Walter Reed's Building 18. It means revamping buildings and bureaucracies across the country. ... These men and women deserve clean accommodations and straightforward assistance -- not adversity -- from administrators."

Robinson: Harvey Firing An Exception For Bush Administration. In his Washington Post column (3/6, A19), Eugene Robinson says, "So this is what accountability looks, sounds and feels like. It's been so long -- since George W. Bush moved into the White House -- that we hardly recognize what used to be a commonplace phenomenon, as much a part of Washington's behavioral DNA as megalomania and mendacity. Imagine how surprised Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey must have been when Defense Secretary Robert Gates fired him last week over the shocking neglect of injured veterans at Walter Reed Army Medical Center." This administration's "nonchalance about its most grievous transgressions has been stunning, and the only inference that fits the facts is that the people running our government don't really believe in government at all. They certainly haven't taken it seriously."

Eaton Faults JCS Acquiescence, Rumsfeld's Legacy For Reed Scandal. In an op-ed for the New York Times (3/6, 1.16M), retired Maj. Gen. Paul Eaton writes, "Regrettably, the silence of our top officers has had a huge impact not just on the battlefield but also on how we have brought our injured warriors home from it. These planning failures led to the situation at Walter Reed Army Medical Center recently reported by The Washington Post." Fired Walter Reed commander George Weightman "has gone down with his ship — the victim of Mr. Rumsfeld's wrongheaded cost-cutting and the joint chiefs' failure to stand up to the civilian leadership." Eaton makes nine recommendations, including "increase financing for research into traumatic brain injuries," "revamp the Medical Evaluation Board process," rein in "the general effort by Mr. Rumsfeld and Mr. Harvey to privatize services," and keep money for health care out of the [cutback-prone] "Defense Department budget."

Cheney Treated For Blood Clot. The Wall Street Journal/AP (3/6) reports, "Doctors found a blood clot in Vice President Dick Cheney's left leg, but he was not admitted to a hospital and will be treated with blood thinning medication 'for several months,' his office said." USA Today (3/6, 11A, 2.27M) also runs a brief story on Cheney's ailment, which was covered by all three network newscasts last night. On the CBS Evening News (3/5, story 3, 1:55, 7.66M), Dr. Jon Lapook said, "We know back in 2005, Mr. Cheney had surgeries on the blood vessels in his legs and perhaps that played a role in increasing his risk. On the other hand, he developed this complication, like many people who do have no known medical problems, after a long plane flight. So I think he'll do very well. Mortality for this is less than 5% if it's treated early and correctly." ABC World News (3/5, story 3, 1:40, Vargus, 8.78M) said Cheney's condition "is known as the economy class syndrome. The Vice President had just spent 65 hours in the air, flying to Afghanistan and back." And NBC Nightly News (3/5, story 6, 1:45, Mitchell, 9.87M) also reported Cheney's "recent travels may have contributed to this new problem." The Los Angeles Times (3/6, Gerstenzang, 850K), New York Times (3/6, Stolberg, Altman, 1.16M) and Washington Post (3/6, A4, Stein, 690K), among other newspapers, also report the story.

"Wage Insurance" Issue Could Be Central To Trade Debate. The Washington Post (3/6, D1, Montgomery, 690K) reports "congressional leaders want to expand" a "little-known federal program that pays up to $10,000 to certain workers dislocated by trade." The program is "known as wage insurance," and "some" argue that "it should be available to any worker who loses a job for almost any reason." The proposal "is part of a broader effort to ease the anxieties of middle-class Americans who feel threatened by the globalization of business and a churning U.S. labor market that creates and destroys about 30 million jobs a year. The proposal is also central to the debate in Washington over trade." Democrats "warn that it will be difficult for them to extend the Bush administration's authority to negotiate trade agreements unless the social safety net for US workers is significantly expanded. That authority expires in June."

Groups Lobby Budget Committee For Funding Increases. The Hill (3/6, Holzer) reports, "The farm lobby, higher-education advocates, veterans' organizations and a host of other groups are pressing their cases with budget committee staffers for increased funding as Democratic lawmakers look to release their spending blueprint as early as next week." The Veterans of Foreign Wars, "for example, wants a $4 billion increase in funding for veterans' healthcare over last year's level. The request is likely to resonate at least somewhat this year in the wake of the Walter Reed scandal." Meanwhile, hospital groups, doctors and "other recipients of payments under Medicare and Medicaid are pushing to forestall any program cuts in an environment where Congress is under intense budget pressure." The budget resolution "is not binding," but it "does cap the total amount of spending and revenue legislators have to work with without running afoul of budget rules."

Right To Life Group Clashes With Waxman Over Lobbying Disclosure. In the Washington Post's "In The Loop: On K Street" column (3/6, A17), Jeffrey Birnbaum says, "The National Right to Life Committee and Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) are locking horns -- not over abortion, but over whether thousands of top executive branch officials should have to disclose the names of people who lobby them." Driven by the "over-the-top, clandestine lobbying of Bush administration officials by now-convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Waxman's House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform has unanimously approved the Executive Branch Reform Act. A spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said that she backs the measure, which would require senior bureaucrats to report quarterly whom they speak to about government actions, and that she expects it to get a vote in the House." But Douglas Johnson, "legislative director of the National Right to Life Committee, is vowing to stop the bill at all costs. He thinks it would discourage officials from meeting with citizens, including his own members. That makes it downright undemocratic. And he is consistent: He led a coalition that helped kill broad ethics reform legislation last year because it would have imposed a similar type of reporting requirement on grass-roots lobbying."

Hispanic Caucus To Meet On Leadership Dispute. The AP (3/6, Werner) reports members of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus "scheduled a special meeting Tuesday to try to resolve an embarrassing leadership dispute that led one lawmaker to quit the group. Among the options is a power-sharing arrangement that would dilute the authority of the caucus' controversial chairman, Rep. Joe Baca, D-Calif." Baca has thus far "resisted any changes to the caucus' power structure, according to caucus members and staff. Baca is under fire from female lawmakers, including fellow California Democratic Rep. Loretta Sanchez, who quit the 21-member, all-Democratic group after accusing Baca of calling her a 'whore.'" The AP adds Baca "denies that. A meeting last Thursday broke up without resolution or a vote, and afterward Baca insisted that he was still in charge and that he was focusing on the future."

McConnell Wins Praise As Minority Leader. The Politico (3/6, Budoff) reports Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell "returned to the Senate in January with a conference slashed in size and chastened by voters. Neither the Republican president nor the Democratic-controlled Congress had much use for him. Colleagues whispered that the senator, with all the pizzazz of plain oatmeal, was terrible on television." But two months later, McConnell has "managed to make the Republican stance on Iraq -- oppose a rebuke of the president while pressing for continued war funding -- look downright vogue. In the process, even skeptics have acknowledged that McConnell knows how to work a chamber." Sen. Lindsey Graham said, "His stock is very high right now." The Politico adds that McConnell is "threading the needle between a conference in need of an opposition identity and a public mood divided on the position he has staked out. Insiders admire his tactical maneuvers on Iraq, but could he lose the broader public relations battle outside of Washington?" Norm Onstein of the American Enterprise Institute says, "They have a potential double whammy. They could ultimately be portrayed as obstructionists, and obstructionists in favor of a policy that deteriorates anyhow."

President, First Lady Dined At Rove's Home On Sunday. The Washington Post (3/6, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) reports in its "Reliable Source" column, "In a rare foray out of the White House, George and Laura Bush had Sunday night supper at the Palisades home of Karl and Darby Rove. The presidential adviser took pity on the press outside in vans and sent out sausage and...quail wings? Sounds like something John Kerry would serve."

NYTimes Comes Out In Favor Of House Labor Legislation. The New York Times (3/6, 1.16M) editorializes, "There are many reasons for the long decline in the membership rolls for private sector unions, including powerful changes in the economy and the unions' past corruption scandals. And there is little doubt that federal rules and regulations for union organizing have also become increasingly hostile to labor, helping to drive unions' share of the work force down from a peak of 35 percent in the 1950s to a mere 7.4 percent today." The House of Representatives "passed a bill last week that would strengthen the rights of employees to form unions, and it drew an immediate veto threat from President Bush. But if Mr. Bush were, as he claims, truly concerned about rising income inequality and truly committed to improving the lives of America's middle class, he would support the legislation and urge the Senate to approve it." The Senate "should take up the House bill promptly and send it to the president for his signature."

WSJournal Calls For Expanded School Choice Under Reauthorized NCLB. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A18, 2.04M) editorializes that the biggest priority for Congress's impending talks on reauthorizing No Child Left Behind should be to "do more to expand public and private school choice." The piece praises the increases in funding and attention to the achievement gap between white and minority students, but faults it for not sufficiently promoting school choice in its efforts to improve public schools. Moreover, the Journal faults NCLB's supplemental education services provisions as a "watered-down" version of President Bush's erstwhile school voucher plan. Meanwhile, "the Education Department has too often allowed school districts to skirt even these limited choice provisions, either by granting exemptions or looking the other way." The Journal criticizes the NCLB Commission's report for not promoting vouchers, while offering qualified praise to President Bush's proposed "promise scholarships."

OTHER NEWS:

US Stock Markets Down Again. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, C1, McKay, 2.04M), under the headline "Stocks Decline As Weakness In Asia Trumps Other News," reports "a big drop in oil prices didn't stanch the bloodletting in the stock market. As was the case last week, weakness in overseas markets, especially Asia, trumped any shreds of good news elsewhere. Signs of so-so growth in the US service sector didn't help matters." ABC World News (3/5, story 7, :25, Vargus, 8.78M) reported "late selling brought the Dow down by more than 60 points [to close at 12,050.41]. And the NASDAQ down by 27 [to close at 2,340.68]. Losses had been feared from the start, after a repeat of sharp losses in Asia, following further declines on major European markets." NBC Nightly News (3/5, story 5, :15, Brown, 9.87M) said "investors were bracing for a rough ride after Tokyo's Nikkei average plunged. But the US markets were pretty subdued. The Dow was down almost 64 points [to close at 12,050.41]. NASDAQ was lost more than 27 points [to close at 2,340.68]."

USA Today (3/6, 1B, Krantz, 2.27M) reports, "Money flowed out of global stock markets again Monday as fears of a coming economic slowdown continued to discourage investors around the world." The Los Angeles Times (3/6, Hamilton, Petruno, 850K) titles its report "US Stocks Drop As Investors Avert Risk," and the Washington Post (3/6, D1, Tse, 690K) says the markets went down as "concerns mounted about the health of a high-risk part of the home mortgage industry." The New York Times (3/6, Peters, Timmons, 1.16M) reports "the fallout from last week's global stock dive showed few signs of letting up yesterday, as markets from Hong Kong to New York deepened their losses."

Fed Governor Says Markets "Functioning Well." The Financial Times (3/6, Guha) reports, "Financial markets are 'functioning well amid higher volatility' while 'overall liquidity does not appear to be in short supply', the Federal Reserve governor Kevin Warsh said on Monday." Warsh, "who acts informally as a point of contact between the Washington-based Fed governors and Wall Street, said market discipline 'appears to be effective, as investors are reviewing their positions.'" The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A2, Ip, 2.04M) says Warsh also "cautioned it is too soon for a 'comprehensive' assessment."

Service Sector Growing At Slower Pace. The Financial Times (3/6, Pimlott) reports, "The US service sector saw a sharp drop off in activity last month, growing at its slowest rate since during the Iraq war in April 2003, according to data released on Monday." The Institute for Supply Management "said that its index of business activity for the services sector stood at 54.3, down 4.7 percentage points from January. The report badly missed economists' forecasts of a level of 57." The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A2, Dougherty, 2.04M) says that "given the weakness in housing and manufacturing, economists had expected the service index to drop: If companies make fewer goods, that will mean less demand for shipping, and with people buying fewer homes it follows that demand for services such as loans and homeowner's insurance would also slow. Though economists expected a decline, the drop was steeper than anticipated."

Bernanke Meeting With Eclectic Group Of Consultants. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A2, Blackstone, Paletta, 2.04M) reports, "A Who's Who of economists from Wall Street, academia, consulting and central banking scored coveted meetings with Ben Bernanke during his first months as Federal Reserve chairman. Topping a list that included Wall Street heavyweights like Bear Stearns Cos. and Morgan Stanley, however, was a small St. Louis-based forecasting firm: Macroeconomic Advisers." Former Fed Gov. Laurence Meyer and former Fed economist Brian Sack, both now with Macroeconomic Advisers' Washington office, "enjoyed the greatest access to Mr. Bernanke among private-sector economists, the Fed chairman's visitor logs show." Bernanke's visitor log "was obtained by Dow Jones Newswires through a Freedom of Information Act request. It lists only the names of people cleared through security to meet with him specifically. He may have also met with other people who were cleared to meet with other Fed officials."

EU Economy 20 Years Behind US. The Financial Times (3/6, Buck) reports, "The European Union's economic development is only now reaching the level achieved by the US more than two decades ago, according to a study released yesterday. The US reached the EU's current level of gross domestic product per capita in 1985, according to the report by Eurochambres, the pan-European business lobby. The EU's employmentrate and level of investment in research and development were reached by the USin 1978, and its level of productivity (expressed in GDP per employed) was reached by the US in 1989, the report said. … Compared with the first such report by Eurochambres published two years ago, it shows the time lag widened between 2003 and 2006. The most drastic gap appears in R&D spending, where the time lag expanded from 23 to 28 years."

Democrats Debate Whether Clinton Or Obama Had Better Reception In Selma. The CBS Evening News (3/5, story 6, 2:30, Couric, 7.66M) reported the "debate today among Democrats is who won the first serious showdown involving the frontrunners, Senators Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama. They appeared yesterday at ceremonies in Selma, Alabama, commemorating a 1965 civil rights march when white police officers beat mostly black marchers. And for the first time, the Clinton campaign employed its not-so-secret weapon." CBS (Borger) added, "The decision to send Bill Clinton to march in Selma alongside his wife was made at the last minute and it was a delicate mission, to prop up Hillary Clinton's standing with African Americans while not overshadowing her. So while his wife preached at a Selma church, Bill Clinton was not sitting in the congregation." Bill Clinton: "All the good speaking has been done by Hillary and Senator Obama today already. I'm just sort of bringing up the rear." Borger: "It's a lesson the Clinton campaign learned after the President upstaged his wife at the funeral for Coretta Scott King." Before Obama "entered the Democratic race, there was a sense of inevitability about Hillary Clinton's nomination. But now there's a real political fight and on lots of levels, the big question is this: Will Bill Clinton help her or hurt?"

On CNN's Anderson Cooper's 360 (3/5), CNN national correspondent John King said, "I think President Clinton's presence certainly helped Senator Hillary Clinton. But I think the fact that he needed to be there is the lead of the story, in the sense that she is very much threatened by Senator Obama's continued inroads and advancing inroads in the African- American community. John Lewis, a congressman who is a hero of the civil rights movement, quoted in 'The New York Times' last week, saying he was leaning Obama's way -- then, President Clinton called him and said: Well, give my wife a chance. So, the fact that she needs to play the Bill card so soon in the community where he is so beloved is a sign of weakness, not strength."

On MSNBC's Hardball (3/5), Rep. Artur Davis, a supporter of Sen. Obama, said, "Three or four months ago, all the black community knew was that Senator Obama was popular and attractive. Over the last several months, he started to talk in detail about his passion for universal health insurance, his passion for universal college access. And what's happened is that the black community has realized he has a progressive agenda, and that's what resonates in the black community. Now, the black community has a lot of experience with politicians over the last 15 years who became famous but who didn't have a progressive agenda." Davis added, "The enthusiasm for Barack Obama in Alabama is off the charts now, in the black and the progressive white community."

On MSNBC's Hardball (3/5), G. Virginia Fields, former Manhattan Borough president and a supporter of Sen. Hillary Clinton, said, "I have worked with Hillary Clinton. I know of her commitment to the black community, as well as others, and this is not new for her. And I think at the end, people do want to know, who is going to be the best person to move forward the agenda on universal health care, health care disparities, education, eliminating poverty? And Hillary Clinton has been fully committed and with real results in all of those areas. That is part of why I have chosen to support Hillary, and I will be doing all that I can, including in my home state of Alabama, working for Mrs. Clinton."

On Fox News' Special Report roundtable (3/5), Morton Kondracke said, "I thought Obama got the better of the day. One, he confronted this issue, is he black enough, by saying that yeah, his mother was white and his father was an African, and yet his whole political career is based, in fact, it's existence is based on the opportunities created by the Civil Rights Revolution. … But, more importantly, I thought, to the extent that any white people were watching that around the country or got wind of it, he took the Bill Cosby view of what's wrong with African-American society. Kids think that to succeed in school is to act white, people don't turn out to the polls, parents do not watch with their children are doing, fathers abandon their children after conception, and stuff like that."

On Fox News' Special Report roundtable (3/5), Mara Liasson of National Public Radio said, "I think that Barack Obama is thrilling to African-Americans. That doesn't mean that they're going to abandon the Clintons, who they feel very strongly about, but there's going to be a real race for those votes."

On Fox News' Special Report roundtable (3/5), Fred Barnes of the Weekly Standard said, "She's not Rich Little, that's for sure. She's a bad impersonator. I'll bet she doesn't try that again [using a Southern accent], it was very strange, particularly coming from. It was not a good weekend for her. … There's not be fierce competition for the African-American vote. Obama's going to get it."

Obama Said To Have "Won" Selma. In his Washington Post column (3/6, A19), Richard Cohen says, "If you had to pick a winner in last weekend's Selma bake-off between Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama, it would have to be Obama. It is not just that he performed better than Hillary Clinton; it's that he had something very important to say to black America." Clinton's "speech was a recitation of Democratic Party cliches. Not so Obama's. As Clinton did, he voiced the expected obeisance to Democratic Party shibboleths about school funding, health care, pensions and such, some of which matter, some of which don't. But then he turned to what clearly does matter: 'discipline and fortitude . . . sometimes I feel like we've lost it a little bit.'" There was "nothing particularly new about this message. You might call it warmed-over Bill Cosby or even an echo of Jesse Jackson. But Cosby is an entertainer and Jackson never stood any chance of getting to the White House. So the uniqueness is not the message; it is the refreshing combination of this particular man and what he is saying."

Clinton Tells Gay Rights Group She Wants "Partnership." The AP (3/6, Barrett) reports Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton "told the nation's leading gay rights group in an unpublicized speech that she wants a partnership with gays if elected president." Clinton also "said she opposes the 'don't ask, don't tell' policy regarding gays in the military that was instituted during her husband's presidency." In a keynote speech to the Human Rights Campaign on Friday, Clinton said, "I am proud to stand by your side." The AP adds that neither Clinton's campaign "nor her Senate office made any announcement that she would be making the Friday address. Asked twice at a Monday campaign stop in Iowa why she did not publicize her speech to the group, Clinton said: 'You'll have to ask my campaign.'" The AP adds that in the speech, Clinton "joked that she shares the same initials as the group, and pledged to maintain the same close working relationship that last year helped defeat the federal amendment which would have banned same-sex marriage."

Clinton Plans Outreach To Women. The New York Times (3/6, Healy, 1.16M) reports Sen. Clinton "will begin an ambitious effort on Tuesday to enlist thousands of women to play roles in her presidential campaign, hoping to build on the enthusiasm her candidacy has stirred among female voters at early campaign events." Clinton will "announce the drive, which will unfold through March to coincide with Women's History Month, in a speech at the annual luncheon held by Emily's List, a political group favoring Democratic female candidates who support abortion rights that has already endorsed her." The campaign "intends to use social networking tools and other Web technology to develop a thousands-strong Women's Leadership Network, which would promote Mrs. Clinton's candidacy nationwide and, by this fall, hold campaign events and take part in fund-raising."

Clinton Carefully Reconstructing Image. The New York Times (3/6, Leibovich, 1.16M) reports in a 2200 word story that to "watch Mrs. Clinton up close during these 'rollout' weeks of her presidential campaign is to see a familiar political figure try to reclaim her name." Lamenting that "her public image has been distorted by caricature, she often says, 'I may be the most famous person you don't really know.' In the cliché of contemporary politics, Mrs. Clinton is 'reintroducing herself to the American people.'" Clinton is, "in this latest unveiling, the Nurturing Warrior. She displays a cozy acquaintance ('Let's chat') and leaderly confidence ('I'm in it to win it'). She is a tea-sipping girlfriend who vows to "deck" anyone who attacks her; a giggly mom who invokes old Girl Scout songs and refuses to apologize for voting for the Iraq War Resolution in 2002. Her aim, of course, is to show that she is tough enough to lead Americans in wartime but tender enough to understand their burdens."

Obama Questioned For Rescinding Invitation To Controversial Pastor. The New York Times (3/6, Kantor, 1.16M) reports the Rev. Jeremiah A. Wright Jr., "senior pastor of the popular Trinity United Church of Christ in Chicago and spiritual mentor to Senator Barack Obama, thought he knew what he would be doing on Feb. 10, the day of Senator Obama's presidential announcement." In January, Obama "had asked Mr. Wright if he would begin the event by delivering a public invocation. But Mr. Wright said Mr. Obama called him the night before the Feb. 10 announcement and rescinded the invitation to give the invocation." Wright said, "Fifteen minutes before Shabbos I get a call from Barack. One of his members had talked him into uninviting me." The Times adds, "Some black leaders are questioning Mr. Obama's decision to distance his campaign from Mr. Wright because of the campaign's apparent fear of criticism over Mr. Wright's teachings, which some say are overly Afrocentric to the point of excluding whites."

Obama's Experience Praised. In his New York Times column (3/6), Nicholas Kristof says, "The conventional wisdom about Barack Obama is that he's smart and charismatic but so inexperienced that we should feel jittery about him in the Oval Office. But that view is myopic. In some respects, Mr. Obama is far more experienced than other presidential candidates. His experience as an antipoverty organizer in Chicago, for example, gives him a deep grasp of a crucial 21st-century challenge — poverty in America — that almost all politicians lack. He says that grass-roots experience helps explain why he favors not only government spending programs, like early childhood education, but also cultural initiatives, like efforts to promote responsible fatherhood." In foreign policy "as well, Mr. Obama would bring to the White House an important experience that most other candidates lack: he has actually lived abroad. He spent four years as a child in Indonesia and attended schools in the Indonesian language, which he still speaks."

Edwards Says Jesus Would Be Unhappy With Iraq War, Americans' Selfishness. The AP (3/6, Baker) reports that ex-North Carolina Sen. John Edwards (D) "says Jesus would be appalled at how the United States has ignored the plight of the suffering, and that he believes children should have private time to pray at school. Edwards, in an interview with the Web site Beliefnet.com, said Jesus would be most upset with the selfishness of Americans and the country's willingness to go to war 'when it's not necessary.' 'I think that Jesus would be disappointed in our ignoring the plight of those around us who are suffering and our focus on our own selfish short-term needs,' Edwards told the site. 'I think he would be appalled, actually.' Edwards also said he was against teacher-led prayers in public schools, but he added that 'allowing time for children to pray for themselves, to themselves, I think is not only OK, I think it's a good thing.' … Edwards was interviewed by David Kuo, a conservative Christian who served as deputy director of President Bush's Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives until 2003. Kuo wrote a book, 'Tempting Faith, An Inside Story of Political Seduction,' that said Bush aides privately called conservative Christians 'nuts,' 'ridiculous' and 'goofy.'"

Giuliani Asks For Privacy To Deal With Family Issues. ABC World News (3/5, story 4, 2:30, Vargus, 8.78M) reported, "Twenty-one year-old Andrew Giuliani has gone public with his strained relationship with his father, following the former Mayor's bitter and public defense from Andrew Giuliani's mother. He said, 'I got my values from my mother. I have problems with his father. But it doesn't mean he won't make a great president.'" ABC political correspondent Jake Tapper added: "For almost any other candidate, the questions would spell political doom. But today in California, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani calmly discussed the damage he did to his children when he divorced his second wife in order to marry his third." Rudy Giuliani: "The responsibility is mine. And I believe that these problems with blended families, you know, are challenges. … And the challenges are best worked on privately." Tapper: "For now, at least, Giuliani seems coated in political teflon, even when the former big city Mayor with liberal views on abortion, gay rights, and gun control addressed a conference of red-meat conservatives."

The AP (3/6, Blood) reports, "Campaigning in Southern California, Giuliani faced questions about his family after his son, Andrew, publicly said their relationship had become distant after Giuliani's messy divorce from Andrew's mother, Donna Hanover, and his later marriage to Judith Nathan. 'My wife Judith is a very loving and caring…mother and stepmother. She has done everything she can. The responsibility is mine,'" Giuliani said, adding, "The more privacy I can have for my family, the better we are going to be able to deal with all these difficulties." In an article Saturday, The New York Times reported "that Andrew Giuliani and his father have recently tried to reconcile after not speaking 'for a decent amount of time.' In the Times article, Andrew said, 'There's obviously a little problem that exists between me and his wife.'" Giuliani was in California for an "event that was intended to highlight his crime-fighting credentials. He met privately with sheriffs from Southern California and Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, who later introduced him at a brief news conference."

Capeheart Reflects Negatively On "Vindictive" Giuliani's Terms As Mayor. In a piece in the Washington Post (3/6, A19, 690K) discussing Giuliani's temperament, columnist Jonathan Capehart relates that "when Giuliani was mayor, he brooked no criticism -- no matter how minor, no matter how constructive. Having been on the receiving end of one of Giuliani's withering verbal assaults, I know of what I speak." Capeheart goes on to recount a Jan. 7, 1999 telephone conversation he had with Giuliani, in which the former mayor "was spitting fire over my column in that morning's New York Daily News, in which I likened his second term to the sitcom 'Seinfeld.'" Capeheart says that "Giuliani ripped me apart, calling my column 'intellectually dishonest,' among other things," then called back shortly later "launching into another 10-minute monologue." Asserting that Giuliani's "skin is as thin as America's Next Top Model," Capeheart also says that "Giuliani could be vindictive," "had no qualms about using government to settle a score," and that the former mayor displayed a "tone-deafness" on issues of race. Capeheart concludes that Giuliani, "who became the face of a bloodied but unbowed nation on Sept. 11, 2001, was a difficult mayor. Many wonder whether the trauma of that day has mellowed Giuliani. We'll soon know. There's nothing like the stress of a presidential campaign to find out for sure."

Moving Toward White House Bid, Giuliani To Sell Investment Firm. The New York Times (3/6, Buettner, Archibold, 1.16M) reports that Rudy Giuliani announced Monday "the planned sale of his boutique investment bank to an Australian company, a transaction that a company official said was part of Mr. Giuliani's increasing focus on his presidential campaign. The firm, Giuliani Capital Advisors, is being sold to the Macquarie Group, a financial services business based in Sydney, Australia, with more than 9,600 employees worldwide. Terms of the sale, which is expected to be final in June, were not released. 'It's indicative of his gearing up and focusing on his candidacy,' said Sunny Mindel, a spokeswoman for Giuliani Partners, Mr. Giuliani's core consulting business."

The Financial Times (3/6, Daniel, Politi) reports that while terms of the deal weren't disclosed, "analysts said that Giuliani Capital Advisors could be worth as much as $100m. … GCA advises on mergers and acquisitions and restructurings in sectors such as infrastructure, energy, and property. Although largely US-based, it has advised on several international deals, particularly in Germany and the UK. It came under Mr Giuliani's umbrella in 2004, trebling the size of his business interests, which were mostly confined to Giuliani Partners, a management consultancy."

The Wall Street Journal (3/6, A8, Cooper, Block, 2.04M) reports that "Giuliani Capital has maintained a steady list of clients, particularly for its restructuring work. Its clients include Delta Air Lines Inc., which sought bankruptcy protection in 2005. It handled similar work recently for US Airways Group Inc. and Aloha Airgroup Inc., a regional carrier. … Of the two units of Giuliani Partners, it is thought to have the greater value. It also may be the most problematic politically for a potential presidential candidate. Analysts say the nature of the firm's client list may make Mr. Giuliani politically vulnerable. It remains to be seen whether a sale of the company will quiet such criticism. The Democratic Party said in a memorandum sent to some reporters that Giuliani Capital Advisors had displayed 'greed' when it sought millions of dollars in fees from troubled airlines."

The Washington Post (3/6, A4, Mosk, Shear, 690K) reports that some "viewed the sale as Giuliani's first step away from the lucrative private-sector career he built during the years he spent outside the public spotlight. Eric Abrahamson, a Columbia Business School professor, said he thinks Giuliani will have little choice but to start building a higher wall between his campaign and his business activities. 'The organization has dealt with all varieties of clients over time, some of whom would expose his image to certain perception problems,' Abrahamson said yesterday. 'I would imagine that, fairly soon, he would have to completely distance himself from the business.'"

The AP (3/6, Westfeldt) reports that "Doug Muzzio, a politics professor at Baruch College, said Giuliani is trying to head off any future conflicts in the campaign. 'Doing it now signals that they consider what they're doing for the clients will be politically problematic for a run for president, so they're getting rid of it early so that even if a story emerges, they will be politically inoculated from it,' said Muzzio."

Simon Outlines Romney Battle Plan. In an article in The Politico (3/6), Roger Simon writes that ex-Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) "may be low in the polls right now, but he is a man with a plan, a plan to make him the Republican nominee for president." Simon says "that in the coming weeks and months," Romney aims "to take advantage of the various and complicated rules governing the primaries. The prime example is the change in the way California will conduct its Republican primary on Feb. 5." Usually, GOP "primaries are winner-take-all." However, "California Republicans have changed the system. Now it is winner-take-all by congressional district." So, Romney "will target his TV ads to certain congressional districts" and "intends to treat California as if it were a 'retail' political state." Romney also intends to emphasize "the differences between himself, Rudy Giuliani and John McCain." Romney aims "to exploit what he perceives as two of McCain's great vulnerabilities in the Republican primaries:" the McCain-Feingold campaign finance law and the McCain-Kennedy immigration reform bill. Romney also is drawing "distinctions between Giuliani's rather turbulent personal life -- he has been married three times -- and Romney's own marriage of nearly 38 years." In an interview with The Politico, Romney said "The breakdown of the family…is an issue that needs to be spoken about." Romney is also keying heavily on the "the straw poll in Ames, Iowa, on Aug. 11" as a crucial "summer showdown." And on the issue of his Mormon faith, Romney "intends to recast the issue by emphasizing that he is a person of faith and that that is more important to voters than what faith he is."

Healthcare Emerges As Key Issue Early In '08 Contest. The Washington Post (3/6, A3, Lee, 690K) reports that ex-North Carolina Sen. John Edwards (D) "says providing health coverage to the 47 million Americans who lack it is so important that he is willing to raise taxes to do it." Illinois Sen. Barack Obama (D) "says he is determined to enact universal health care by the end of his first presidential term." New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) "calls universal coverage 'not only a moral and health imperative, but an economic and jobs imperative as well.'" And "at least two GOP contenders -- former governors Mitt Romney of Massachusetts and Tommy G. Thompson of Wisconsin -- are expected to use their extensive track records on the issue as campaign selling points, especially if either emerges as the party's nominee. All of which illuminates the reality that no White House hopeful can be taken seriously in the rapidly evolving 2008 race without confronting what many Americans have long said is one of their biggest concerns: the availability and affordability of health care. 'Every candidate is going to have to have a health-care plan, because it is the number one domestic policy issue on the minds of voters,' said Karen Ignagni, president of America's Health Insurance Plans."

Kemp Says GOP Working To Be "The Party Of Herbert Hoover." Jack Kemp criticizes "GOP

DOJ_NMG_0140506

Protectionists" in a Wall Street Journal op-ed this morning (3/6, A19), writing, "As the GOP stumbles around Washington trying to be the party of Herbert Hoover, it's sad to see so many Republicans drifting so far and so fast from the Reagan model that helped pave the way for the great, non-inflationary economic and jobs expansion of the past 25 years. Sen. Lindsey Graham, (R., S.C.) threatens China with a 28% tariff for daring to tie the yuan to the dollar. Rep. Tom Tancredo, running for president, is miffed at…Bush for trying to design comprehensive immigration-reform legislation. The president wants a guest-worker program that could help alleviate border problems in the Southwest." But "Tancredo is a sissy compared to my old pal Duncan Hunter, the congressman from San Diego. He's also running in the GOP primaries as an unambiguous Hoover-like protectionist and anti-globalization candidate. Then there's my other old friend Pat Buchanan, railing against Japan and Toyota for having the chutzpah to sell so many cars in the US, even going so far as to build manufacturing plants right here under our noses." Kemp concludes "the answers to our challenges in today's global marketplace can be found in sound money, lower tax rates on capital and labor, an easing of regulatory burdens, and the welcoming of foreign investment and trade with nations like Japan. Isolationism and protectionism are not worthy of 21st century America."

Jenna Bush To Publish Book For Teens. USA Today (3/6, 1D, Minzesheimer, 2.27M) reports, "Jenna Bush, in a rare interview, says her forthcoming book for teens -- about a 17-year-old single mother in Panama who is living with HIV -- will end with a 'call to action.'" HarperCollins "announces today that it's publishing Bush's Ana's Story: A Journey of Hope this fall. It will be illustrated with photographs by Mia Baxter, a former classmate of Bush's at the University of Texas." The president's daughter "says the book is not political. It's aimed at 'getting kids thinking and involved,' Bush said Monday by phone from Panama, where she has worked since September as an unpaid intern for UNICEF."

Ahead Of Latin America Trip, Bush Outlines Plans To Help Region. USA Today (3/6, Jackson, 2.27M) reports, "President Bush said Monday that the United States will help the working poor of Latin America as part of a plan meant to show the region it has not been forgotten by the United States. Preparing for a seven-day, five-nation swing, Bush outlined past efforts to help the region while offering new plans for health care, education and business development." Bush told members of the United States Hispanic Chamber of Commerce, "The working poor of Latin America need change." USA Today adds, "During a Monday briefing, national security adviser Stephen Hadley said the trip will emphasize the continuing US efforts to bolster Latin American democracies and economies. Those efforts, Hadley said, have not received the attention they deserve. 'That's one of the reasons we're doing this trip.'" Bush leaves Thursday "for São Paulo, Brazil, the first stop on a trip that includes Uruguay, Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico."

The Wall Street Journal (3/6, Pulizzi, 2.04M) reports that in his speech, Bush "unveiled plans to send a Navy vessel to dispense medical care throughout Latin America, spend $75 million over three years on English-language training for the poor and develop a new small-business loan initiative." The Journal adds that "since taking office, Mr. Bush has doubled US foreign assistance to Latin America to about $1.6 billion a year. The money includes development assistance, military assistance and counter-narcotic assistance. Colombia is the largest recipient of US aide outside the Middle East and Afghanistan, with most of the money earmarked for anti-drug efforts."

In response to "criticism he has ignored Latin America," says the AP (3/6, Hunt), Bush said "the region's grinding poverty is a scandal that has caused some to question the value of democracy." To combat this trend, the President said the US "will spend tens of millions of dollars to improve education, housing and health care across the region."

On its front page, the New York Times (3/6, A1, Rohter, 1.16M) reports Bush will arrive in Brazil Thursday "with an energy partnership plan to create jobs and decrease poverty and inequality, a marked shift in Washington's priorities for Latin America aimed at countering the challenge posed by President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela." While US policy in the region has "focused on free-trade agreements and related economic measures, with a secondary emphasis on drug interdiction," the "growing leftward and anti-American trend in regional politics, led by Mr. Chávez" has led to "a modified agenda and a renewed effort to rebut complaints by Latin Americans that the president has ignored their concerns in favor of the campaign against terrorism." Despite the policy shift, "promises of American support and assistance are likely to fall short of what Mr. Chávez, with his oil wealth, has been delivering recently."

The Washington Post (3/6, A11, Baker, 690K) says Bush "is launching a new campaign to compete with Chávez for the region's hearts and minds, employing language mirroring the Venezuelan leader's leftist populism but rooted in traditional American conservatism." After six years "of focusing elsewhere in the world," Bush in his final two years "wants to convince the nation's neighbors that, as he put it yesterday, 'we care.' But he faces an enormous gulf between ambition and reality, analysts say."

The Los Angeles Times (3/6, Reynolds, McDonnell, Kraul, 850K) also says "the emphasis on addressing inequality marks a shift for the president, who has been assailed for stressing free trade and democracy south of the border and ignoring the social ills that continue to stymie the region." Bush, "whose poll numbers are at least as bad in Latin America as at home, is likely to meet skepticism and protests as he tries to portray a kinder, gentler face of US policy."

The Washington Times (3/6, Ward, 88K) reports Eric Farnsworth, vice president of the Council of Americas, "an advocacy group for businesses with interests in Latin America, said 'the specter of Chavez [is] overhanging the region right now,' and that 'the standing of the United States in the region has decreased.'" Farnsworth, however, "applauded Mr. Bush's speech, which he said pushes back against Mr. Chavez's populism in the right way." Dan Restrepo, Latin America analyst at the Center for American Progress, "a left-leaning think tank, was not impressed. 'You can't have a year of engagement every six or seven years and think it's going to answer the mail,' Mr. Restrepo said."

GOP Signals Willingness To Compromise On Panama, Peru, Colombia Trade Deals. The New York Times (3/6, Weisman, 1.16M) reports, "When the Democrats swept to victory last fall, after a campaign fueled partly by attacks on…Bush's trade policies, trade deals promoted by the administration seemed doomed in the new Congress. But that was then. In the last week, the administration and its Republican allies on Capitol Hill have signaled a new willingness to work with Democrats to try to secure their support for three pending trade deals -- with Panama, Peru and Colombia." The Times adds, "The focus of their talks has been guarantees for the rights of workers in countries with which the United States has negotiated trade accords, including a ban on child labor and forced labor." Rep. Charles Rangel, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, said yesterday, "There's no question that there's been a change on the Republican side. … They refused to talk about these things before, and now they're talking." But "it is still not clear how Democrats will respond. Mr. Rangel said that they remained highly skeptical about signs of Republican flexibility on trade and that he had not seen anything "acceptable to a broad number of members" on his side."

Meanwhile, The Hill (3/6, Swanson) reports, "Freshman Democrats seeking a direct role in congressional trade policy have won a meeting this week" with Rangel. No freshmen "sit on the prestigious Ways and Means Committee, which oversees trade policy, but class members pressed for a role in trade in a Jan. 17 letter to Rangel that said opposition to the Bush administration's trade policies had been 'vital to our electoral successes.'" The Gill adds, "A spokesman for freshman Rep. Betty Sutton (D-Ohio), a former labor lawyer who has led the freshman efforts, said the meeting was scheduled with the hope that all 39 Democrats who signed the Jan. 17 letter would be able to attend."

UN Environmental Official Assesses US-Brazil Ethanol Alliance. The AP (3/6, Astor) reports, "A proposed ethanol alliance that President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva is expected to forge with President Bush later this week poses both opportunities and risks for the environment, a top U.N. environmental official said Monday. Achim Steiner, executive director of the U.N. Environment Program, said growing international demands for ethanol and other biofuels can threaten the Amazon rain forest if safeguards are not put in place." The AP adds, "Brazil's main biofuel is ethanol made from sugarcane. While sugarcane cultivation is minimal now in the Amazon, some environmentalists fear that growing demands for the fuel could push cane growers into the rainforest." Bush "and Silva are expected to forge an 'ethanol alliance' Friday aimed at creating quality standards for the alternative fuel, while joining forces to promote production of ethanol in nations lying between Brazil and the United States."

Guatemala To Ask Bush For Assistance In Drug War. The AP (3/6, Llorca) reports, "In a case that has laid bare the extent of corruption" in the Guatemala, "FBI agents are trying to help discover who ordered the murders of three Salvadoran politicians and the Guatemalan police officers who said they were told to kill them." The killings and apparent cover-up "has exposed the seemingly insurmountable challenges President Oscar Berger faces as he tries to regain control of a defiant and even criminal police force." Berger "says he needs more help in fighting organized crime and will ask President Bush when he visits March 12 to provide US helicopters, planes and radar equipment."

New Colombian Foreign Minister Was Held Hostage By Rebels. The Washington Post (3/6, A10, Forero, 690K) profiles newly appointed Colombian foreign minister, Fernando Araújo, who up until only weeks ago had been held hostage by Marxist rebels for the past six years. As foreign minister, Araújo is expected "to speak passionately about a crime that the largest rebel group here, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), has long used to generate ransom money and wield leverage to win the release of jailed guerrillas" and to "explain the difficult challenges the Uribe government faces in reaching a deal with the rebels."

Bolivian Women Leading Way From Rural To City Life. In a front page article, the Washington Post (3/6, A1, Reel, 690K) reports on Bolivian women leading the way from the country's "tiny mountain villages and worn-out mining towns" to larger cities. According to the U.N., "For the first time in the world's history, more people next year will live in cities than in rural areas," and women, like those in Bolivia, "are leading the urban push, leaving the countryside at higher rates than men, lured in large part by domestic service jobs."

US, North Korea Begin "Historic" Talks In New York. The AP (3/6, Lederer) reports the US and North

Korea opened "historic talks" Monday on steps to establish diplomatic relations. However, USA Today (3/6, 5A, Slavin, 2.27M) reports State Department spokesman Sean McCormack "downplayed expectations for quick progress," calling the meeting between North Korean Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Gwan and Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill "just an initial discussion."

The Washington Times (3/6, Sands, 88K) calls the talks "groundbreaking," but also notes Administration officials "were trying to tamp down expectations of a major breakthrough, saying difficult issues such as US financial sanctions and designation of Pyongyang as an official sponsor of terrorism will require many negotiating sessions."

UNDP Suspends Work In North Korea. The New York Times (3/6, A11, Hoge, 1.16M) reports the UNDP "announced Monday that it was suspending work in North Korea because the country had failed to meet conditions set up in response to American complaints that United Nations money was being diverted to the government of Kim Jong-il." David Morrison, director of communications for the agency, said, "We have decided to suspend our operations, and the ball is really now in the court of the D.P.R. Korean authorities."

US Urged To Address Subject Of Abductions. Deputy editor Melanie Kirkpatrick writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/6, A18, 2.04M), "Among the promises the US made to North Korea as part of the Feb. 13 nuclear disarmament deal is a pledge to begin the process of removing it from the list of terror-sponsoring states. When Vice President Dick Cheney visited Tokyo last month, [Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo] Abe urged the US not to do so until the abduction issue is resolved. While President Bush has spoken eloquently in the past about human-rights violations in North Korea, that issue appears not to be high on the US agenda these days. Chief US negotiator Christopher Hill is holding talks in New York with his North Korean counterpart this week. A good question for him to ask is, Where is Megumi" Yokota, a Japanese citizen kidnapped by North Korea who remains missing today.

Israeli Security Chief Says Iran Training Hamas.

The New York Times (3/6, A8, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports the chief of Shin Bet, the Israeli internal security service, "said Monday that the Islamic movement Hamas had sent dozens of men from Gaza to Iran for military training." In "a rare on-the-record briefing," Yuval Diskin told reporters, "We know that Hamas has started to dispatch people to Iran, tens, and a promise of hundreds." The training would "last months, perhaps years," he said, adding, "I see this as the strategic danger, more than any weapons smuggled into Gaza." Responding the allegations, Ahmed Youssef, an adviser to Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, said Hamas "has not sent anyone to Iran," and that Diskin's comment was "propaganda, to hurt a new government."

On its front page, the Washington Times (3/6, A1, Mitnick, 88K) quotes Diskin as saying, "One of the bad fruits of the international siege on Hamas is that once all the doors were closed, the only window open was to Iran." His analysis of the Palestinian "political and military scene painted a bleak prognosis for peace negotiations with Israel and included a warning about a possible Israeli offensive in the Gaza Strip." The Los Angeles Times (3/6, Boudreaux, 850K) also reports the development.

State Department Says Palestinian Aid Hinges On Hamas. The AP (3/6) reports the State Department "said Monday full funding of a proposed $86 million in security assistance for the Palestinian Authority hinges on whether US officials receive assurances that none of the funds can benefit Hamas." State Department spokesman Sean McCormack commented after four House Foreign Affairs Committee members "urged Secretary…Rice to reconsider the plan in light of the recent agreement between Fatah and Hamas to form a national unity government." McCormack said the Administration "is asking the same questions as members of Congress about whether Hamas would benefit from the program."

France Calls For Closer EU-Palestinian Ties. The Financial Times (3/6, Dombey, Morris) reports France "pushed on Monday for the European Union to step up preparations for deeper ties with a Palestinian government of national unity, despite misgivings from countries such as Germany and the Netherlands." The question of whether to resume contacts with and direct funding for the Palestinian Authority is "set to race up the EU's agenda as the rival Fatah and Hamas factions move closer to working together." While France argues that the momentum of last month's Mecca agreement to set up a unity government "cannot be wasted," other countries "give greater emphasis to making sure the administration fully meets international demands that it recognises Israel."

Webb Introduces Bill Requiring Congressional Authorization For Iran War. The Washington Times (3/6, A1, Bellantoni, 88K) reports in a front page article that Virginia Sen. James H. Webb Jr. yesterday introduced legislation "to force President Bush to seek congressional authorization before using force against Iran." Democratic leaders, "who indicated general support" for the plan last week, are "still deciding whether they will attach it to an upcoming spending bill."

IAEA Says Iran May Have Halted Nuclear Program.

The AP (3/6, Jahn) reports IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei said Monday that Iran "seems to have at least temporarily halted" its uranium-enrichment program. The "pause" could represent "an attempt to deescalate Iran's conflict with the Security Council, which is deliberating a new set of harsher sanctions." Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "had been expected to announce last month that Iran had started installing 3,000 uranium-enriching centrifuges at a facility in the desert outside the central city of Natanz," but the announcement "never materialized," in what was seen as "an apparent step back." ElBaradei said, "I do not believe that the number of centrifuges has increased, nor do I believe that (new) nuclear material has been introduced to the centrifuges at Natanz."

However, USA Today (3/6, 11A, 2.27M) notes ElBaradei said "quite a few uncertainties still remain" because "Iran's lack of cooperation with the International Atomic Energy Agency" means the agency "can't determine" whether Iran's nuclear activities "are purely peaceful."

Agreement On UN Iran Sanctions Does Not Appear Close. The AP (3/6, Burkhardt) reports diplomats met Monday to discuss possible new sanctions against Iran, "but differences emerged and an agreement did not appear to be close," diplomats said. After meeting late Monday at Britain's U.N. Mission, China's U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya said there are "some different views here, so we will continue to work." He said the ambassadors would meet again on Tuesday afternoon.

The Christian Science Monitor (3/6, LaFranchi, 59K) reports the Bush administration, "convinced that punitive financial measures played a role in moving North Korea to accept a deal designed to shut down its nuclear operations, is now spearheading a multilateral effort to use sanctions to turn the screws on Iran and its nuclear program." Among the measures being considered for the new resolution, according to US and European officials, "are expansion of the list of Iranian officials whose assets would be frozen, a travel ban on more Iranians who are involved in the country's nuclear research and development, and additions to the list of parts, material, and technology that would be banned from Iranian trade."

Iranian Women Arrested During Rights Protest. The New York Times (3/6, A11, Fathi, 1.16M) reports Iranian authorities arrested 33 women Sunday "after protests outside a court where five of them were being tried for leading a campaign to gain more legal rights for women," Iranian newspapers reported Monday. Human Rights Watch condemned the arrests and called for the women's immediate release.

Interpol Recommends Arrest Warrants For Former Iranian Officials. McClatchy (3/6, Bachelet) reports Interpol's legal department "has recommended issuing capture notices for five former Iranian officials in connection with the 1994 bombing of a Jewish community center in Argentina, which killed 85 people," Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R) said Monday. Argentina "requested the capture notices…triggering anger in the Iranian government, which has denied any involvement in the bombing."

Rice, Jordan's King Abdullah Discuss Iraq Refugees, Mideast Peace. AFP (3/6) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice Monday met with Jordan's King Abdullah to discuss "Iraqi refugees and an Arab peace plan for the Middle East," diplomats said. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters that providing assistance to Iraqi refugees, an issue that will be addressed at a regional conference on Iraq this weekend in Baghdad, was "an issue of serious concern" for King Abdullah. "I know that there is a lot of concern about the pressures on the support network within Jordan and the ability of the NGOs working in Jordan to meet those humanitarian needs" of some 600,000 Iraqi refugees in the country, McCormack said.

Agreement Between Lebanese Factions Expected Within Days. The Washington Times (3/6, Knapp, 88K) reports that "a deal to end the standoff between Lebanon's US-backed government and Hezbollah, the nation's worst political crisis since its 1975-1990 civil war, is expected to be finalized within the next few days, key political figures say." A possible agreement follows a meeting between Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Saudi King Abdullah Saturday.

US Urged To Empower Saudi King Abdullah. Rob Sobhani, president of Caspian Energy Consulting, writes in a Washington Times (3/6, 88K) op-ed, "While the United States and Europe stood by powerless for months…King Abdullah [of Saudi Arabia] brought together the leaders of Hamas and Fatah in Mecca and got them to agree to bury their differences." Sobhani says it "is in America's interest for Washington to recognize the important role of Saudi Arabia's wise monarch and make him an equal partner in bringing about peace and stability in the combustible Middle East." If Washington "does not empower King Abdullah, the negative force and path of extremism exemplified by Mr. Ahmadinejad, Lebanon's Hassan Nassrallah and Iran's Ali Khamenei will fill the current power vacuum in the Middle East with hate and destruction."

Columnist Urges Support For Islamic Moderates. The Wall Street Journal's (3/6, A18) Bret Stephens writes from the "landmark Summit on Secular Islam" in St. Petersburg, Florida that "for more than five years, the Bush administration has been attempting to enlist the support of the so-called moderates in the war on terror -- its definition of 'moderate' being remarkably elastic, to put it charitably." But Undersecretary Karen Hughes "is not at this summit, of course, nor is anyone else from the State Department, nor is the US-funded al-Hurra Arabic TV station. … Al-Jazeera, however, is here, suggesting that the real Arab mainstream better appreciates the broad interest the conference's speakers attract in the Muslim world, as well as their latent power."

Russia Revises Stance On US Missile Shield. The Financial Times (3/6, Buckley, Dombey, Williamson) reports Russia "said it was revising its military doctrine to reflect other powers' growing use of military force, while a Russian general warned again that Moscow could knock out elements of the US missile defence system planned for eastern Europe." The comments came as German Chancellor Angela Merkel "added her voice to the heated international debate over the missile defence system by calling for Nato to be given responsibility for defusing concerns over the plan." In an interview with the Times, Merkel said "Nato is the best place for discussion of this issue," arguing that Washington "should step up consultation with its western allies and Russia." Her statement "reflects concerns over increasing east-west tensions" over the proposed missile plan.

Meanwhile, the New York Times (3/6, A3, Shanker, Cooper, 1.16M) reports under the headline "US Moves To Soothe Growing Russian Resentment," that the Bush administration "has decided to reach out more often and more intensively to Russia at a time when the leadership in Moscow is harshly criticizing American policy and some scholars say the United States has not sufficiently tended to an important relationship." In the wake of growing tensions over the missile shield, "there is a growing acknowledgment among officials in Washington that the United States has not responded as rapidly or eloquently as it might have to a widespread sense of grievance in Russia."

Russia, US To Discuss START Treaty. In a front page article, the Washington Times (3/6, A1, Kralev, 88K) reports the Bush administration "has rebuffed Russian overtures to negotiate a legally binding replacement of the 1991 START I treaty" that is set to expire in 2009, US and Russian officials said yesterday. An "expert-level meeting…to discuss options after the treaty's expiration is expected to take place as soon as this month, but their differences are not likely to be resolved," the officials said. While the Russians "insist on a legally binding agreement," the Americans have focused on "transparency and confidence-building measures" that would still allow both sides to verify each others' arsenals and capabilities.

Putin Critic Dies In Fall From 5th-Floor Window. The Washington Times/London Daily Telegraph (3/6) reports that Ivan Safronov, a Russian journalist who had "criticized" President Vladimir Putin and "frequently irritated Russia's powerful intelligence services," died after falling from a fifth-floor window of an apartment building. Russian investigators said they believed that Safronov "committed suicide -- an interpretation that was challenged by colleagues."

US Official Says "Very Aggressive" Chinese Spies A Threat. In a front page article, the Washington Times (3/6, A1, Gertz, 88K) reports, "China's intelligence services are among the most aggressive at spying on the United States, followed by Cuban, Russian and Iranian spy agencies," according to the US government's top counterintelligence coordinator. In an interview with the Times, Joel F. Brenner, the new head of the Office of the National Counterintelligence Executive, said the US remains the No. 1 target of "virtually every significant espionage service on the face of the Earth." Specifically, Brenner said "China's intelligence activities have been 'very aggressive' at acquiring US advanced technology, often before it is fully developed here."

US Warns China On Military Build-Up. AFP (3/6, Knox) reports Washington "warned China Monday that its announced military spending boost was 'inconsistent' with peaceful growth and hinted that Beijing was understating its defense expenditures." National security council spokesman Gordon Johndroe told AFP, "This kind of spending not only concerns us but raises concerns among China's neighbors. This is inconsistent with China's policy of peaceful development."

Former Shanghai Stock Exchange Official Urges Changes To System. Fang Xinghai, former deputy chief executive of the Shanghai Stock Exchange, writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/6, A19, 2.04M) that following last week's unexpected drop in the Chinese stock exchange if the "government to intervene now as it did before, it would likely cause unnecessarily large volatilities, with serious results for the economy." A "better alternative than government intervention to ensure the smooth functioning of China's stock market," he says, "is to build in a self-adjusting mechanism," including the approval of "more new mutual funds, increase quotas under the Qualified Foreign Institutional Investor scheme so more overseas institutions can enter the market, and allow more insurance and pension money to be invested in stocks. And yes, hedge funds should be legalized."

Mixed Genocide Ruling Puts Pressure On Serbia. The New York Times (3/6, A10, Simons, 1.16M) reports last week's ruling by the UN's highest court "that found fault with Serbia under the Genocide Convention complicates Serbia's diplomatic rehabilitation, several legal experts said." They said the ruling "would bind diplomats of the European Union and NATO, whose ties with Serbia have been growing," even though the court "did not find that Serbia was directly responsible for the genocide" of Bosnian Muslims in 1995. The ruling also "had important effects reaching beyond Serbia, because any country sheltering" Bosnian Serb leaders Ratko Mladic and Radovan Karadzic "would now be considered in violation of the convention."
